A fourth need is for a selective service act—conscription—at once. Under the present system of voluntary enlistment the Southern States have led the Nation in enlistments. This is not fair to the South and is relieving other sections of the Nation of their fair share of the duties to be undertaken. Conscription would make every county in the Union, every State, contribute its just and proportionate share of men to the colors. It would not give an unfair advantage to those who did not enlist, because every person would be on the same footing. It would also give to our armed forces a representative cross-section of the country's abilities and intelligence, and a representative cross-section is practically impossible of achievement unless men are drawn from every kind and condition of life within the age groups called. And last, but not least, the boards which would and will administer the Selective Service Act when it is at last passed by the dodderers who are sitting in the Halls of Congress should be composed of highly patriotic men who will stay clear of politics.

RESULT: A REAL FIGHTING FORCE

If our Nation can at once attain more efficiency in its armed forces, give them better training in body and put iron in their spirit, furnish every piece of necessary fighting equipment at the place it is needed, and set a policy of recruiting its numbers by the democratic method of conscription, it can build a fighting force which will cause European dictators to lay off the American Hemisphere.

If any of these needs are overlooked or compromised with, our Nation is giving aid and comfort to the enemy, just as Congress is giving such aid and comfort by its habits of indecision and aimless meandering.—W. E. H.

Ask Exemption of Military Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES SECCOMBE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 4, 1940

RESOLUTION OF THE DUNKARD BRETHREN CHURCH

Mr. SECCOMBE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution of the Dunkard Brethren Church:

THE PRESIDENT.

SIR: The Dunkard Brethren Church, in annual general conference, Quinter, Kans., June 5, 1940, petition you to hear and consider the following:

"As a Christian people, throughout more than 200 years we have maintained nonresistance as an integral part of our faith; therefore we petition that we may be granted exemption from any and all forms of military service in case this country becomes involved in war.

"Since the National Constitution grants freedom of religious worship, and since we have no code or confession of faith other than the New Testament, we follow its teachings: 'If any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of His.' 'Recompense to no man evil for evil' (Romans 8: 9 and 12: 17). 'Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath: for it is written, "Vengeance is mine; I will repay" said the Lord.' 'Therefore, if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink; for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good' (Romans 12: 19–21). The Saviour said, 'My kingdom is not of this world. If my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight' (John 18: 36). Romans 13: 9 renewed the command 'Thou shalt not kill. Ye have heard that it hath been said, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor, and hate thine enemy." But I say unto you, "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, pray for them which despitefuly use you, and persecute you; that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven; for He maketh His sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust"' (Matthew 5: 43–45).

"'And behold, one of them which were with Jesus stretched out his hand, and drew his sword, and struck a servant of the high priest's, and smote off his ear. Then said Jesus unto him, "Put up again thy sword into his place; for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword. Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to my Father, and He shall presently give me more than twelve legions of angels? But how then shall the Scriptures be fulfilled, that thus it must be?"' (Matthew 26: 51–54).

"Our brethren are ready and willing to suffer for the cause of their faith, if need be, rather than be forced to bear arms, which they cannot conscientiously do. They are largely farmers; when manpower is in demand, as in wartime, it would seem more rational to permit them to remain at work on farms, or to place those not already in agriculture into that industry or into reconstruction work, rather than to penalize them for refusal to bear arms by placing them in camps or perhaps by imprisonment, thereby keeping them out of productive activity."

A copy of paper passed unanimously at general conference referred to.

Yours truly,

THEODORE MYERS,
North Canton, Ohio.

Transfer of United States Naval Vessels to Great Britain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD KNUTSON

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 4, 1940

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, in commenting upon the transfer of our destroyers to Great Britain, in exchange for the island naval bases, the New York Times of today says:

The object of the arrangement with Britain is to build a 4,500-mile iron fence in the Atlantic to assure this country's safety for a century, an authoritative State Department source said.

Mr. Speaker, instead of characterizing this unprecedented action upon the part of the President as the building of an iron fence to assure the safety of this country, it should have been described as a 4,500-mile water gate, through which the taxpayers of this Nation will be forced to toss billions of dollars in the next century. This is just another step, Mr. Speaker, on the part of the New Deal in their effort to streamline the road to ruin for the United States.

[From the New York Times of September 4, 1940]

DICTATOR ROOSEVELT COMMITS AN ACT OF WAR

Mr. Roosevelt today committed an act of war.

He also became America's first dictator.

Secretly, his Secretary of State, Mr. Hull, entered into an agreement with the British Ambassador that amounts to a military and naval alliance with Great Britain. This secretly negotiated agreement was consummated yesterday, September 2.

Today Congress is informed of the agreement. Note well the word "informed." Although the President referred to his under-cover deal as ranking in importance with the Louisiana Purchase, he is not asking Congress—the elected representatives of the people—to ratify this deal. He is telling them it already has been ratified by him—America's dictator.

The President has passed down an edict that compares with the edicts forced down the throats of Germans, Italians, and Russians by Hitler, Mussolini, and Stalin.

He hands down an edict that may eventually result in the shedding of the blood of millions of Americans; that may result in transforming the United States into a goose-stepping, regimented slave state.

Under our Constitution, treaties with foreign powers are not legal without the advice and consent of the Senate. This treaty, which history may define as the most momentous one ever made in our history, was put over without asking the Senate either for its advice or its consent.

The authority which the President quotes for his fatal and secret deal is an opinion from the Attorney General. Whatever legal trickery this yes-man may conjure up, the fact is that the transfer of the destroyers is not only in violation of American law, but is also in violation of the Hague Covenant of 1907, solemnly ratified by the United States Senate in 1908. It is an outright act of war.

Undeterred by law or the most primitive form of common sense, the President is turning over to a warring power a goodly portion of the United States Navy, against the repeated statements of Senators, Navy Department officials, and officers of the Navy that the ships are needed for our own defense.

But that is only one phase of this insane performance. We get in exchange leases on British possessions in this hemisphere—but only leases. What good will these leases be if Hitler should acquire title to these islands by right of conquest? There is even the possibility that, in the course of a negotiated peace, Great Britain might be forced to cede these islands to Hitler.

What, then, will become of Roosevelt's leases? Obviously, to avoid all sorts of possible complications, we should have full sovereignty over our own naval and air bases.

Of all sucker real-estate deals in history, this is the worst, and the President of the United States is the sucker.

Thomas Jefferson did not lease Louisiana from Napoleon Bonaparte. He acquired it outright, to have and to hold forever.

Woodrow Wilson didn't lease the Virgin Islands from Denmark, with the advice and consent of the United States Senate; he bought them.

In the case of Newfoundland and Bermuda, Mr. Roosevelt tells us that the right to bases "are gifts—generously given and gladly received." In other words, the great and rich United States is taking largess from a nation that owes us more than five and a half billion dollars! We are accepting a tip, according to the President.

For at least 10 years this newspaper has repeatedly called attention to the urgent desirability of acquiring Caribbean islands owned by Britain and France for our own defense purposes. In that belief we are ardently in agreement with Mr. Roosevelt.

No move was made to this end by Roosevelt or his predecessors, despite the fact that we had a trading argument in the billions of war debts owed to us by France and Britain.

No; Roosevelt saw France go down without negotiating for the islands in exchange for the debts; and only now, with Britain in the throes of a desperate war, does the President move to protect our shores.

But in doing so he commits an act of war. He strips our Navy of 50 valuable ships, and he enters into leases which might not be worth the paper they are written upon in a month's time.

And all this is done in utmost contempt of democratic processes and of the Constitution of the United States.

If this secretly negotiated deal goes through, the fat is in the fire and we all may as well get ready for a full-dress participation in the European war.

If Roosevelt gets away with this, we may as well say good-bye to our liberties and make up our minds that henceforth we live under a dictatorship.

If Congress and the people do not rise in solemn wrath to stop Roosevelt now—at this moment—then the country deserves the stupendous tragedy that looms right around the corner. —An editorial from yesterday's St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Keep America Out of War

EDITORIAL FROM THE GAELIC AMERICAN (NEW YORK)

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Gaelic American of New York:

[From the Gaelic American (New York) of August 31, 1940]

KEEP AMERICA OUT OF WAR

The present administration at Washington is steadily and surely moving us toward war.

The President of the United States endeavored to transfer naval vessels to England. Legal restrictions prevented the President from carrying out his purpose.

Now, the desire is to classify certain of our destroyers as outmoded, and to let them go to England upon the plea of General Pershing.

Whether these destroyers be given or sold or traded to England direct, or whether they find their way to England by way of Canada, the net result is the same.

That is not the spirit of neutrality. That is not the spirit of the Constitution of the United States of America.

Article I, section 8, of the Constitution of the United States says that "Congress shall have power to provide and maintain a navy."

Article II of the Constitution of the United States defines the power of the President. There is nothing in article II which gives the President power to give that Navy, or any part of it away. Or to trade that Navy or any part of it away.

But the public utterances of the present administration have not been neutral utterances. The policy of the present administration is to hamstring one side in the present European conflict and to assist the other side.

If those utterances and those policies be long enough continued, then sooner or later the United States of America will be openly and officially in the war.

And the people of the United States of America do not want any part in this war.

Instead they want the bringing about of a just peace. That is the objective toward which every honest effort of a neutral administration at Washington should be directed.

Regretfully—almost shamefacedly—we are obliged, as Americans, to admit that President Roosevelt has disqualified himself for the role of peacemaker, for the role of arbitrator in the discussions which must necessarily take place before there can be any just peace.

It appears to be extremely unlikely that any contribution of naval destroyers from the United States to England can prevent Hitler from delivering the knockout blow to the present English Government.

If this be correct, what are the alternatives? Are we, the United States of America, going to go very much further in the effort to avert that knock-out blow? Or, are we going to suddenly reverse our administrative policy; refuse to go further; merely watch the delivery of the knock-out blow; and then sit idly by without anyone who would be accepted as a spokesman in the interest of a just peace to replace the tragedy of Versailles?

If the German people decide to avenge themselves for the injustices of Versailles, the retribution will be indeed terrible, and the men and women of England will have cause to curse until their dying day those leaders who have misled them for the past twenty-odd years.

But coming back to our own problems. As Americans, we want no part in this present war. We want defense, ample defense, for every square foot of the United States against any foreign aggressor. And we want defense, ample defense, for every American institution and for every American tradition.

The Senate and the House of Representatives have their duty to perform. They must hold the gap from now to November.

Then the people of the United States of America have their duty to perform. Like it or not, our system of Government can only be safeguarded by common sense, intelligence, and patriotism. The time has come to exercise that eternal vigilance which is the price of freedom. Let Congress know that you are unalterably opposed to the Old World's imperialist wars which are not worth the life of one young American.

REMARKS

HON. MATTHEW J. MERRITT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1940

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to be here again for the first time in 5 months [applause], not only happy to be back here but to be amongst the living; and I want to take this occasion to bring to the Members of the House the fact that we are losing tomorrow one of the finest men who ever graced the Cabinet of a President of the United States, the Honorable James A. Farley. In his resignation the country loses a very competent and able Postmaster General, and the national Democratic Party loses a very able and conscientious leader.

Many things have been said in just eulogy of this great outstanding American. Therefore I will not attempt to add or enlarge upon these well-deserved phrases and comments. But before asking the privilege of extending my remarks I just wanted to bring out one thought: My very dear friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER] at one time paid me a very high compliment when he said I was a hand-picked candidate of Jim Farley. Of that I am proud. If I have in any way emulated the practices and teachings of this great man, I am indeed happy. Therefore I trust that my services in this House have met with his entire approval.

It may also be said that those who disagreed with him politically were among the first to recognize his great ability, his conscientiousness, his straightforwardness, and, above all, his friendship. I know that he held in high esteem the members on both sides of the aisle.

Now for the more important part, the public role played by Jim Farley. From a career started in the humblest way at the lowest scale of the political ladder he has climbed rung by rung with a sure, steady step, never interrupted by dishonor or dishonesty—he has climbed to the topmost rung of the political ladder until at the peak of his career he has been the greatest, most beloved, and, as the record shows, the most efficient national political chairman ever known in the history of any party in our country.

This is material success in a political way in the highest degree. Yet there is something vastly more important; that is the spiritual success of this man Farley in his public life.

Never has the finger of suspicion been pointed at him. Never has the voice of the opposition been directed at him in a harsh way. Always has he been loved and respected by the opposition as well as by the members of his own party. His word has never been broken. Finally, when confronted with the question of career on one side and the sacrifice of what he considered principle on the other, he never hesitated, but, statesmanlike, chose to stand firm on the side of principle. I am speaking of a man who is supreme in the practical field of politics. Yet I make this one point for the RECORD that there is no higher degree of statesmanship ever exemplified in the history of our country than this one of a man who would sacrifice his career rather than sacrifice a principle. This is the true test of statesmanship which will endure long after the signs or records of material success have faded.

I have searched the records of history and can find no example to equal the one set by Jim Farley wherein he has combined the highest degree of political skill and his statesmanlike character and intelligence.

If I were given my choice of the privilege of returning here today for one purpose only I can think of no other purpose which would better serve my country than to bring to the attention of the youth of America the example of my chief, my friend, and my ideal, the Honorable James A. Farley, "Jim" to me and to millions of others like me. Thank you.

The March of Democracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 4, 1940

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, The Women Investors in America, Inc., headed by Catherine Curtis as national director and with offices at 535 Fifth Avenue, New York City, adopted as a slogan this truthful expression—We are all investors in America, whether we are stockholders, bondholders, jobholders, or husband-holders.

This organization of patriotic women have from time to time published their views on matters of national importance. Recently there appeared a timely article entitled "The March of Democracy," in the organization's bulletin of August 30 and which I wish to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this time.

With the word "democracy" and all it represents being threatened with extinction in the light of present developments abroad, it is refreshing to pause and realize that we in America have not yet lost our precious heritage and priceless blessing—a free democracy.

The Women Investors in America, Inc., and other patriotic organizations imbued with a burning desire to expose the pitfalls that obstruct this Nation's pathway to national unity, are to be warmly congratulated for their contribution to the cause of good government.

The article follows:

THE MARCH OF DEMOCRACY

Today, public officials and others in this country speak of our American democracy and state that—to protect it and our liberties—we must join in the defense of the democracies. The founding fathers evidently did not intend our Government to be a democracy—for that word is not found in either the Declaration of Independence or the Constitution. But they did specify a form of government for us in the Constitution in article IV, section 4, which states:

"The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government."

What is a democracy? The United States Army Manual, 2000–25, on "Citizenship," states on page 91:

"Democracy: a government of the masses. Authority derived through mass meeting of any form of 'direct expression.' Results in mobocracy. Attitude toward property is communistic—negating property rights. Attitude toward law is that the will of the majority shall regulate, whether it be based upon deliberation or governed by passion, prejudice, and impulse, without restraint or regard to consequences. Results in demagogism, license, agitation, discontent, anarchy."

This same publication states on page 88:

"The Government of the United States is not a democracy but a republic."

United States Army Manual 2000–25 is no longer used in teaching our soldiers citizenship. It was withdrawn from use a few years ago as some of the matter contained was found to be of "a controversial nature," according to official statements.

That international authority on world revolution, the late Duke of Northumberland, in his book History of World Revolution, published in 1931, declared:

"The adoption of democracy as a form of government by all European nations is fatal to good government, to liberty, to law and order, to respect for authority, and to religion, and must eventually produce a state of chaos from which a new world of tyranny will arise."

But we were told we entered the World War "to make the world safe for democracy." Let us see what has happened to nations that adopted that form of government.

RUSSIA

Kerensky brought "democracy" to Russia with the revolution of February 1917. All power was centralized in Moscow. Lenin and Trotsky seized that centralized power in the bloody revolution of October 1917, and established the first Soviet Communist nation. They would have been unsuccessful had not Kerensky first centralized all government power.

Women were "freed" under Russian "democracy." Children became property of the State. Women were given equal opportunity to work beside men in factory, field, and ditch, while their children were cared for in state-controlled nurseries. Women were even "nationalized," all men being given equal right to them, with the husband having first choice providing he was a member in good standing of the state.

Family ties were broken. Divorce was simplified in keeping with the new "democratic" freedom, for marital ties could be broken by either party appearing before a public official and declaring the marriage ended. Is it any wonder Russian men flocked to its "democracy"? Liberty, such as it is in that country, is for members of the Communist Party only.

HUNGARY

With the collapse of Hungary in late 1918, Count Karolyi seized control of the government and established a "democracy." He offered the Allies more of his country than they asked in return for recognition of his regime. Son of a wealthy and aristocratic family, he suffered from physical impairment and was ignored by his own class. He entered politics to satisfy his ego and for political advancement; associated himself with the rabble in his country.

Under his "democracy" Hungary was thrown into chaos, governmental powers centralized, later to be seized by Bela Kuhn Cohen, Trotsky lieutenant operating under orders from Moscow. He established a Soviet state, resulting in the slaughter of 160,000 Hungarian men, women, and children in 9 months. The masses ran riot. Privileges and protection were only for those holding cards in workers' unions. Cohen and his associates, most of whom were imported from Russia, looted the public treasury and taxed wealth into poverty.

His regime continued until Cecile Tormay, noted Hungarian woman author, inspired and organized Hungarian women, revived courage and fight in Hungarian men, and drove Karolyi, Cohen, and their followers from the country. Admiral Horthy then took control of the government. He has continued as dictator. Liberty in Hungary at present is for members of Horthy's party only.

GERMANY

"Democracy" was established in Germany with the fall of the Kaiser after the World War. Again came complete government centralization and Hitler—slowly but steadily—marched to dictatorship. Long before this war, basic property rights were ignored.

Women were urged to bear more and more children for the protection of the state. "Liberty" in Germany is for members of the Nazi Party only.

MEXICO

Calles promoted "democracy" in Mexico. He centralized complete powers in Mexico City. He moved to the United States when his term of office ended. His successor immediately began to abuse the centralized powers. Calles returned to Mexico to end that abuse—was thrown in jail, his wealth confiscated—and eventually was expelled from his native land.

His successor seized American oil properties in Mexico. American investors in those properties do not know how much—if anything—they will salvage from their investments. But they do know investors in Russian properties seized by the Soviet "democracy" never salvaged a penny.

Newspaper reports of the recent election in Mexico claim citizens not members of—or in accord with the ruling party, were barred from voting. The present ruling party will continue in power—unless the opposition stages a successful revolt, with its usual destruction, suffering, and misery. "Liberty" in Mexico is for members of the Labor Party only.

ITALY

Following the World War, Italy limited the powers of her King and established a partial "democracy." The usual centralization of power followed—and eventually was seized by Mussolini. Without such centralization, Mussolini never could have become dictator. Property rights are negligible in Italy—were so even before the present war. Women have been granted "equal opportunities"—and "Il Duce" urges them to bear more and more children for the state. "Liberty" in Italy is for members of the Fascist Party only.

AUSTRIA

Following the World War, Austria became a Republic. Within a few years, it changed to a "democracy." Today, Austria is no more. It is part of Germany. "Liberty" in Austria is for members of the Nazi Party only.

SPAIN

Also, following the World War, Spain established a republic. Soon it too changed to a "democracy," followed by centralization of power in Madrid. The people discovered this centralization was leading to dictatorship, that a plot was well advanced to declare Spain part of the Soviet Union.

That discovery resulted in the most horrible civil war in world history. Spaniards revolted against the communistic plot. The internationalists—Communists, radicals, and liberals—rushed to its defense from all parts of the world. The story of that civil war is one of the most atrocious in the civilized world. While the internationalists were in control of the government, women were given equal opportunities, only to find themselves in the trenches, their womanly rights disregarded and assaulted. Russia, France, and other "democracies" sent arms and munitions to bolster the Spanish Internationalists' resistance, but General Franco's Nationalist army won. Franco now is dictator of Spain. Liberty there is for members of the Nationalist Party only.

FRANCE

For many years France was a republic, with nationalist policies. Following the World War, step by step, it abandoned its nationalism and republican form of government. Finally, under Leon Blum, called Father of the French New Deal, it adopted democracy and internationalism as its government policy.

Under Blum's regime France followed the usual trends of a democracy, centralized planned economy, government-controlled prices, unbalanced budgets, riotous government spending, currency revaluation, harassment and restriction of private enterprise with lowered production, less jobs, and lowered living standards for all except those in power.

"Sit-in" strikes originated in France under Blum, quickly followed by sit-down strikes in the United States. He led European democracies in aiding the Spanish Internationalists by stripping his country of defense weapons and sending them to Spain. These were captured by General Franco, turned over to Hitler, and used against France.

France, at war, found her industries in chaos due to Blum's social-reform laws; her munitions, airplane plants, railroads, and communications practically under control of Communists and internationalists who had risen to power under Blum's protection.

France is now a dictatorship—the result of joining the march of democracy. Liberty there is for members of the dictator's party only.

THE UNITED STATES

The trend toward more and more centralization of power in Washington has steadily increased during recent years. This has resulted in continual encroachment, bit by bit, on individual freedom and basic property rights. We have been forced to accept centralized, planned economy, currency revaluation, unbalanced budgets, and riotous Government spending. Private enterprise is harassed and restricted by government.

Today centralized Government control extends over our railroads, radio, utilities, banks, stock and commodity markets, agriculture, labor, and education. Under guise of emergency, we are asked to accept more and more centralized control.

But we have not quite reached the final stage of democracy where liberty in the United States is for members of the ruling party only.

Rarely in the messages or statements of our former Presidents do we find democracy mentioned until popularized by President Wilson during the World War. Since then our people have been insidiously propagandized to accept democracy and forget our guaranteed form of government.

Washington, Jefferson, Madison, John Quincy Adams, Jackson, Harrison, Lincoln, Garfield, Cleveland, and McKinley all spoke and wrote of our republican traditions and institutions. They termed to leaders of our War for Independence the "Fathers of our Republic."

The founders of our Republic purposely separated the functions of the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of our Government. Each was made independent of the other to protect the rights and liberties of all—minority as well as majority.

The majority of power was placed in the hands of the people's representatives in the Congress and the States. They intended we should look to our elected representatives for protection—not to any one individual in whom all power was centralized. They knew—from Old World experience—centralization would lead to dictatorship and loss of liberty.

In view of all this—it is time we gave careful consideration to the famous statements of two signers of the Declaration of Independence. The first is that of Samuel Adams, who declared:

"Remember, democracy never lasts long! It soon wastes, exhausts and murders itself! There never was a democracy that did not commit suicide!"

And the second is that of Benjamin Franklin who, when asked at the close of the Constitutional Convention what type of government we were to have—a monarchy or democracy—replied:

"A republic—if we can keep it!"

Will we continue to travel the low road of democracy to national suicide, or will we regain the high road of the republic and keep our independence?

* * * * * * *

The women of these United States must not forget the part their foremothers played in founding this country—those brave women who stood shoulder to shoulder with their menfolk against wilderness, redskin, and redcoat. Their determination, inspiration, and spiritual ideals spurred on their men to make the vast wilderness a great productive land. Those qualities gave our forefathers the courage to revolt against the tyranny of Old World centralized control and to establish our Republic.

As we salute our Stars and Stripes, we should remember with pride that a woman gave our Republic that flag—made by her own hands.

Therefore our women have three powerful investments in these United States—first, the spiritual, which conveys the right to preserve that inspired quality of citizenship directly responsible for founding this free country; second, the physical, which includes the right to a higher standard of living than that enjoyed by women in any other country; and, third, the financial, with the right to own property and freely invest their savings in the private-enterprise system for profit, security, and advancement.

Because of women's great contribution to our country—and the preferred position they have achieved under our Republic—I recommend they give serious thought to the facts set forth in this bulletin.

As has been pointed out—we have not yet reached the final stage of democracy.

However, I am convinced that unless our women revive the spiritual ideals and courage of our Revolutionary ancestors—organize as did the women of Hungary—we may well witness the loss of our liberty and independence, and the death of our Republic in the days that lie ahead.

Sincerely yours,

CATHRINE CURTIS,
National Director.

EDITORIAL FROM COLLIER'S MAGAZINE

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, no one in the House is more opposed to monopolistic practices than I am. In my opinion the consuming public should always have protection against any practices that would tend to overcharge them or discriminate against free and open competition. I have always been a supporter of the antitrust laws and expect to continue to support legislation of that character.

I want to say, however, that some questions arise in my mind as to the policy of the Department of Justice in carrying on a program of prosecution of American industry. My attention has just been directed to an editorial in a current issue of Collier's magazine, which has just been released on the newsstands. This deals with the question of tobacco and various companies that are engaged in its manufacture and distribution.

The editorial is as follows:

How now, whither are we drifting, what the blazes, and all that? We refer to the Sherman Anti-Trust Act criminal charges brought by Thurman Arnold's antimonopoly committee against the eight biggest tobacco companies operating in the United States—American Tobacco Co., British-American, Imperial, Liggett & Myers, P. Lorillard Co., Philip Morris & Co., R. J. Reynolds, Universal Leaf Tobacco Co.

Arnold charges these outfits with creating assorted tobacco trusts, then works around to this remarkable accusation:

"By Nation-wide advertising and sales promotion schemes the Big Four and Philip Morris & Co., Ltd., Inc., created such a perfect acceptance and demand for their major brands that—the offering of such products for sale being a necessary adjunct to the conduct of numerous wholesale, retail, and service establishments—such establishments are forced to handle the products even on unreasonable and arbitrary terms and at such prices."

In plainer English, the Big Four and Philip Morris build more attractive mousetraps, so to speak, than anybody else in the tobacco game, and let the world know they do, so the world beats paths to the doors of Camels, Chesterfields, Lucky Strikes, Old Golds, and Philip Morrises—and Arnold calls these typically American successes crimes. There can be no quarrel with legitimate Government efforts to stop actually unfair trade practices. But this particular squawk is absurd.

The tobacco companies don't force retailers to sell their cigarettes. The smoking public, because it prefers these brands, forces the dealers to handle them. And the cigarette business, far from being monopolistic, is fiercely competitive. These brands have battled for years. When Camels nose out Luckies for a quarter year, or Philip Morrises edge ahead of Old Golds, or Chesterfields outrun the field for a spell, it's news.

As for cigarettes' unreasonable prices, the Government certainly isn't doing anything to make them more reasonable. It now taxes popular-price cigarettes 6½ cents a package—meaning the manufacturers have become so efficient that cigarettes could retail at something under 9 cents per package of 20 with reasonable profits if it weren't for the taxes.

Sure, we take all kinds of reputable tobacco advertising, and are glad to have it, and Mr. Arnold is welcome to make what he can out of that. So what? So just the same, Arnold's committee has gone off the deep end on a cockeyed, fantastic prosecution, or else the Sherman Antitrust Act needs some drastic amendments. Probably a bit of both.

ARTICLES FROM THE MINNEAPOLIS STAR-JOURNAL

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, the following articles taken from the Minneapolis Star-Journal of September 2 indicate the high esteem in which Senator ERNEST LUNDEEN was held by the people of our State, and I ask that they be made a part of the permanent RECORD in connection with the services following his death.

[From the Minneapolis Star-Journal of September 2, 1940]

LUNDEEN IS EULOGIZED BY TOWNSENDITES—PICNIC SPEAKING PRAISE SENATOR'S BACKING OF PENSION PLAN

Senator ERNEST LUNDEEN, killed Saturday in an airplane crash, was praised by speakers at a State-wide Townsend Club picnic at Excelsior Amusement Park Sunday for his efforts on behalf of the movement.

He was on his way here from Washington to be principal speaker on the picnic program when the crash occurred.

Dr. Paul Hartig, a friend of the Senator, called upon the several thousand Townsendites present during his memorial address to emulate Senator LUNDEEN's determination "which carried him forward in the face of discouragement."

He said, "Of all the men in public office none could come here with a clearer conscience than Senator LUNDEEN."

"The uphill road could have been smoothed had he been a little less sincere, a little less honest," Dr. Hartig said, "but he did not choose the easy way.

"He could have been more of a politician, but he was a statesman, living not for the next election, but for the next generation."

C. W. Smeltzer, Townsend State headquarters committee chairman, presented a resolution calling upon the Governor to fill the vacancy in the Senate by appointment of someone "who will work for adoption of the Townsend plan as did Senator LUNDEEN." It was adopted unanimously.

Herbert F. Haren, national Townsend representative for Minnesota, declared LUNDEEN fought in behalf of Townsend members and in behalf of "all the common people of America."

Glen S. Wilson, Chicago, Townsend club national director of visual education, declared the Townsend plan, for which Senator LUNDEEN worked, is necessary now to bring the Nation back to normalcy.

Officers of the Spanish-American Veterans and auxiliary asked members to be at Great Northern station at the time of arrival of the funeral party.

Senator LUNDEEN's body was identified at the accident scene by office attachés and taken to Washington Sunday. He had left Washington only an hour and 15 minutes before his death Saturday. He was to have kept a speaking engagement in Minneapolis.

President Roosevelt, in a wire to Mrs. Lundeen Sunday from his special train carrying him to Chattanooga, Tenn., expressed the sympathy of himself and Mrs. Roosevelt.

Tributes to Senator LUNDEEN continued to come from his colleagues and other sources. Senator CHARLES MCNARY, Senate minority leader and Republican Vice Presidential nominee, described his death as "a very great loss."

Paul J. Kvale declared: "His successive defeats never embittered him nor caused him to swerve from his principles. He was never more needed in the Senate than now."

Dewey Johnson declared: "The Nation has lost a leader who feared no issue or cause. He battled to preserve our democratic institutions and privileges."

In a resolution the Third District Farmer-Labor Women's Federation declared: "The passing of Senator LUNDEEN is that of one of the finest, bravest, and most patriotic Americans who ever lived. Let us hope all he died fighting for may yet be won."

The Senator's colleagues recalled today his last words in the Senate were:

"I am glad to know that for the next 30 days we shall be safe."

The words were spoken in debate with Senator NEELY of West Virginia on the Burke-Wadsworth conscription bill, which LUNDEEN opposed. The words were in response to a statement of NEELY'S that "I don't think we'll be invaded during the next 30 days, but beyond that I do not venture."

In his last Senate address, Senator LUNDEEN bitterly attacked the $5,000,000,000 defense bill, declaring such appropriations meant "panic, depression, and bankruptcy."

Senator SHIPSTEAD revealed today LUNDEEN loved to travel by airplane but that he had once warned his colleague to be careful.

Senator LUNDEEN is survived by his wife; a daughter, Joan Jessie; a son, Ernest, Jr.; three sisters, Mrs. C. J. Lagergren, Galesburg, Ill., Mrs. Otto Carlson, Oakland, Nebr., and Mrs. Edward Widen, Minneapolis, and two brothers, Joel and David, of Minneapolis.

Drive for Anglo-American Alliance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN L. SWEENEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 4, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE GAELIC AMERICAN (NEW YORK)

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Gaelic American of New York entitled "Drive for Anglo-American Alliance":

DRIVE FOR ANGLO-AMERICAN ALLIANCE

The negotiations, at present, going on between the United States and Canada, for the acquiring of air and naval bases in the English-owned islands from Halifax to Jamaica, are a covert move for an Anglo-American alliance. More than once since the beginning of the century attempts to bring about such an alliance have been defeated by the United States Senate. The last attempt was in 1912 when Taft's treaty was so amended in the Senate that its author could hardly recognize it and he decided not to affix his signature to the revised version.

The English regard the air- and naval-bases proposal as a step towards a military alliance. An Associated Press dispatch, which is in part as follows, refers to the American-Canadian talks as preliminary steps toward a British-American alliance, offensive and defensive.

"London, August 21.—Unofficial but well-informed sources indicated today that the British Government is seeking a military alliance with the United States. Canadian-American discussions on mutual defense are considered in these quarters to be the opening wedge in a British effort to obtain a full military accord."

The full details of the new scheme have not yet been revealed. In well-informed quarters it is said that England refuses to sell outright any of the islands, but agrees to lease sites for the air and naval bases to the United States. This phase of the deal was revealed recently in the House of Commons by Winston Churchill, who emphasized that the bases would be leased for a limited period and that the outright sale of them could not be considered. No doubt he would be less specific in his statement if he had not already come to an agreement with the Washington Government. England will retain her sovereignty over the islands and the bases rented to America regardless of the fabulous prices that the United States may have to pay for them. A special dispatch to the New York Times, which is in part as follows, hints that the deal may cancel England's war debts to the United States:

"WASHINGTON, August 23.—One proposal which is before the President, with some congressional backing, would have for its ultimate objective a leasing deal which would cancel the entire British war debt to the United States. It would involve writing down the present book value of the British debt, which runs to about $5,650,000,000, with all accrued interest, to something like $2,800,000,000, by granting the British a retroactive interest rate of 0.42 percent instead of the 3.5 percent now applicable to the British debt, and by applying against the funded principal all amounts already paid, which total $1,469,000,000."

This is an exorbitant price to pay for air and naval bases in England's islands. A liberal price for their use would be about $50,000,000, and at this figure they would be far from being a bargain, even if permanent possession of them were assured. The whole scheme is questionable and seems designed to evade the Johnson Act and thus give England again unlimited credits and enable her after the war is over, even should she win out, to repudiate her obligations to America. Will a great part of the cost of the present war, like that of the World War, be shunted to the shoulders of the American taxpayers?

The American-Canadian negotiations recalls Carnegie's prophecy, made as far back as 1893, of a reunion between the American Republic and the British monarchy. Carnegie's prophecy was not at that time taken seriously and his suggestion of a title for the new state—the British-American Union—was regarded as the dream of an old man in his dotage. It is now evident that Carnegie had only given expression to the views and hopes of England's ruling caste. By accident or mischance we have at present Americans in key positions who are as pro-English as Churchill and as anxious as the late "iron king" to bring the United States back under the British flag.

The propaganda that a Hitler victory would menace America is not credited by any honest or well-informed American. Europe will always have troubles of her own to engage the attention of her big powers. No king or dictator will have the means, even if he had the desires, to attempt an invasion of the Americas. The Anglomaniacs shriek that if Hitler wins he will get possession of the English Navy and this added to his own will enable him to invade the American Continent. When the war ends the English and German Navies will be so crippled and battered that the combined remnants will be in no condition to venture 3,000 miles of the Atlantic in a futile effort to invade the United States or any part of the American Continent.

The danger to the United States is from within, not from without. With interventionists in high station, fired with zeal to save the British Empire, America is in danger of being pushed from the traditional moorings and the Anglomaniacs may engage in adventures which may establish a dictatorship or monarchy. A Carnegie-British-American Union may be established and King George VI installed in Ottawa from which he could bestow titles on his "fifth columnists" in the United States. Decorations and titles would be showered on the interventionists.

As Canada is a belligerent it is doubtful neutrality on the part of the United States to enter at the present time into a military defense agreement with a country at war. In an agreement for bases outside Canadian waters the negotiations will be directly with England. The main concern of some of our great statesmen is to safeguard the British Empire.

The time has come for Americans to snap out of their indifference. Let it be understood that the danger to American institutions comes from native not foreign dictators. Wake up, America.

ARTICLE FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, does the following New York Times article by Arthur Krock, former ardent New Dealer, indicate a new trend of the Times? It is said that the New York paper is rapidly changing, hence this article by Krock, which a year ago would not have appeared in the Times. The article follows:

[From the New York Times]

DEMOCRATIC STRATEGY RISKS COUNTERATTACKS—HAZARDS OF THE PLAN OF CAMPAIGN AS NOW LAID DOWN MAY BE EXPLOITED BY AGGRESSIVE OPPOSITION—THE RECORD ON "APPEASEMENT"

(By Arthur Krock)

The pattern of the Democratic campaign, as the President departs to make speeches which he firmly labels "nonpolitical" and Mr.

Willkie's open and acknowledged drive for votes is about to begin, has been very clearly drawn. Unless some momentous event shall change them, the outlines will be as follows:

(1) The President will take every advantage of his incumbency in a critical time to emphasize that everything he does is official and designed solely to establish national security; that whatever his opponent offers by way of suggestion or criticism is mere "politics." A host of supporters, in and out of office, will fortify his position in every way they can.

(2) The President will comment freely on pending legislative or other questions when he chooses, giving the interest of national defense as his reason for deviation from the "1933 rule" that such is not his practice. When he chooses not to comment he will point to the "1933 rule." This was illustrated at two successive press conferences. A week ago Friday he registered opposition to the pending Maloney amendment to the Burke-Wadsworth bill. Last Friday he invoked the "1933 rule" against comment on the Overton-Russell amendment to the same bill, which would give the Executive unlimited powers to take over industrial plants and probably other forms of business.

(3) The President and his spokesmen will continue to urge that world conditions require the third-term tradition be broken to assure this Nation's safety, and that the same situation makes it either "bravado" or "disrespect" to ask Mr. Roosevelt to debate any issue. At the same time they will continue to point to the tradition, established in normal times, against a President undertaking joint discussion.

ATTITUDE TOWARD BUSINESS

(4) While making every official use of important businessmen in the defense commission and elsewhere in the Government, the Democratic campaign and congressional trend will continue to register and foster distrust of the attitude of industry and finance toward reforms and suggest the inability of the business community to forget profits and other selfish concerns for the general welfare.

(5) As emphasized by Mr. Wallace in his acceptance speech—an address which the President warmly praised on Friday—the effort will be made to show that appeasement of Hitler is an inevitable consequence of Republican victory because "appeasers have contributed largely * * * to the Republican cause" and will demand and receive what they want.

(6) By the automatic operation of this general strategy, Democratic discussion of domestic issues will be deprecated or declined.

It will be difficult to maintain that strategic front for various reasons. The aggressiveness and penetration of the Republican candidate himself form one obstacle. And this will be assisted by questionings and criticisms in the press and on the radio. The success of the venture depends on the impact of the foreign situation on electoral decision in this country and the skill of the President. If he is entrenched to the degree his more enthusiastic admirers believe he is, the program, despite its inconsistencies and its daring, will be ratified in November by Mr. Roosevelt's election to a third term. Then, indeed, a political miracle will have been accomplished. For not only is the project vastly difficult, this is the first occasion when an American President has sought a third term.

THE HAZARDS

Examination of the outlines of this campaign pattern makes its hazards readily apparent. They are not to be found so much in point 1; Presidents who are candidates have always sought to emphasize the office over its quest. But in point 2 they emerge. Anyone with good hearing or good eyesight knows Mr. Roosevelt has no fixed rule about comment on pending questions; that he comments when he sees an advantage in so doing and refrains when he doesn't. Point 3 is equally inconsistent, because if the times call for the disregard of the two-term tradition for a President they may also require that he cannot fall back on the fact that predecessors have refused to engage in discussion.

It will be up to the vast voting group, called the middle class for lack of a better term, to decide point 4. This group gains its living through private industry and has always seemed to prefer free enterprise to Government operation. It must be persuaded that while a draft from business and finance is indispensable to national security the same citizens cannot be trusted to subordinate their personal concerns to the national emergency. And this group must also be convinced that when the President's spokesmen in the Senate endorse a proposal like the Overton-Russell amendment there is still no truth in the repeated charge that Federal industrial ownership and control are eventual objectives of the New Deal.

APPEASEMENT CHARGE

Point 5—to convict the Republican Party exclusively as harboring appeasers of Hitler who will have their way if Mr. Willkie wins—is very vulnerable also. There is Mr. Willkie's acceptance speech to refute it, and the widespread belief that he was nominated without any obligation and is the type of man who would neither contract nor underwrite such commitments. And then there is the open record of the man who was the titular leader of the Republican Party until the hour of Mr. Willkie's nomination, former Governor Landon of Kansas.

It was as early as May 1938, in a speech to the Inland Press Association, that Mr. Landon condemned Hitler and all his works, and denounced any moves to try to reconcile totalitarian policy with our own. In December of that same year the President sent Mr. Landon to the Lima Conference as a delegate. Speaking over the radio from there, he said that the Americas as a unit could never maintain their system and its liberties and compromise with the Hitler way of life in any way.

Mr. Wallace's appeasement thesis is also complicated by portions of the President's own record. For a long time he was an "appeaser." His purpose was to avert the war that has come to the world, but the moves were "appeasement" moves. There was the telegram in September 1938 pleading with Hitler to take what Great Britain and France offered him at Munich and what they promised he should have in addition. In this telegram the President assured the Fuehrer that, if he would do this, he would earn the gratitude of mankind. Then, after Hitler had seized Czechoslovakia in violation of his Munich pledge, the President urged a peace conference, which in its essence was a move for "appeasement", too.

A ROOSEVELT HANDICAP

In view of this record, it may not be possible to charge the mood of appeasement to the political group in this country whose recent leaders have spoken so uncompromisingly of Hitler.

The last point in the outline, No. 6—to deprecate or decline effective discussion of the domestic issues—will be easier for the President himself to maintain. But if Mr. Willkie can sustain his argument that a sound domestic status is the base of any effective defense policy, Democratic spokesmen may find themselves forced to engage in the argument. The emergence of the Overton-Russell amendment should also assist in breaking down this point of campaign strategy.

National Defense Program Is Strengthened by Acquisition of British Islands

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 4, 1940

EXCERPTS FROM EDITORIALS OF WASHINGTON NEWSPAPERS

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, in the first part of March I introduced a joint resolution which called for the President to enter into negotiations with Great Britain looking toward the acquisition of certain islands which we would use as defense bases. Yesterday Congress received a message from the Chief Executive explaining what had been done in the way of immediate acquisition of British island bases in exchange for 50 American destroyers. It is not my purpose at this time to discuss the merits of our trade but I do believe that these islands will be of real value to American defense. I quote from portions of the following editorials, all from National Capital newspapers:

[From the Washington Post of September 4, 1940]

PROTECT PANAMA CANAL

The desirability of the naval and air bases which the United States is now in a position to build on British soil in this hemisphere is beyond dispute. The prospective sites extend all the way from Newfoundland to British Guiana. When developed they will serve as an additional protective barrier for the Panama Canal. They will be of incalculable value in the defense of the entire Western Hemisphere.

A ring of protective bases in the Atlantic will make the invasion of North America by a European aggressor more difficult and far more costly than would otherwise be the case. Through their possession the range and effectiveness of the United States fleet and air force will very greatly be increased. That fact is of particular importance to the Nation at a time when the contemplated additions to the Navy are still largely in the blueprint stage.

The transfer to Great Britain of 50 over-age destroyers is a small price to pay for the advantages we gain from this transaction. Nor can it be forgotten that, to the extent that these destroyers enable Great Britain to continue the war and thus possibly avert a Nazi victory, their transfer serves our national interest. Looking at the transaction in its entirety, our defenses, as well as those of Great Britain, have been very substantially strengthened.

There is the risk, of course, that Hitler may regard the transfer of the obsolescent destroyers to Great Britain as a hostile act by the United States. But as long as Great Britain remains in the field that risk is small.

On the other hand, if Great Britain goes down, the peril to the United States and the entire Western Hemisphere will enormously increase. But even in that event this country now has the solemn and twice-repeated assurances of Premier Churchill that the "British Fleet would in no event be surrendered or sunk, but would be sent overseas for the defense of other parts of the empire."

Great emergencies call for courageous action. In the present emergency the two great English-speaking democracies, one fighting for its very existence, the other girding its loins for the defense of a hemisphere, have shown that they possess the requisite vigor, foresight, and determination to act boldly and promptly. The position of each in its respective sphere of action has been notably strengthened.

[From the Washington Times-Herald of September 4, 1940]

LONG-RANGE VALUE

The North and South Atlantic air and naval bases will certainly be of great long-range value to us. We pick up some extremely valuable leased property by this deal—valuable from a strategic point of view, that is; in the world of today strategically valuable property is about the most valuable property a nation can have.

The island of Newfoundland (42,000 square miles; population, 300,000) is Great Britain's oldest colony, having been discovered by John Cabot in 1497, only 5 years after Columbus discovered America. It is by way of being a large and effective cork, militarily, for the St. Lawrence River—and the St. Lawrence River is a logical route for some would-be invader to take for a jump at the United States' industrial heart via the Hudson Valley.

Bermuda, a group of 360 small islands (20 inhabited) about 600 miles east of North Carolina, has a harbor which will take ships up to 22,000 tons in its inner reaches. Since 1934 Bermuda, with its excellent naval dockyard facilities, has been the British Navy's main Atlantic station.

The Bahamas string away from our Florida coast toward Haiti. The Windward and Leeward Islands, containing the above-mentioned bases at Santa Lucia and Antigua, respectively, are part of the ring of Caribbean ramparts which is completed by Trinidad and British Guiana.

Acquisition by lease of these strategic points means—if we take prompt advantage of it as part of our general defense program—that our North Atlantic and Caribbean defenses should be pretty well lined up against the ambitions of any and all comers from overseas.

We and the British, or maybe just we, might be wise to round out the job by seizing Martinique in the Caribbean and St. Pierre and Miquelon off Newfoundland from the French.

As for the Falkland Islands, strategically valuable British-owned group in the South Atlantic off the lower end of the Argentine, we can't imagine how they came to be overlooked in this 50-destroyers deal. Maybe they're in reserve for the next deal.

[From the Washington Daily News, of September 4, 1940]

BASES NEEDED NOW

"Time is the essence." And in terms of time alone, fortification of those island bases acquired in the deal with Great Britain may well prove, as President Roosevelt says, the most important national-defense action since the Louisiana Purchase.

Experts have estimated that such fortification is possible within 1 year. Naval construction to do a comparable defense job would take from 4 to 5 years. That might be too late. Nothing is certain, but 1 year as against 4 or 5 may mean the difference between disaster and safety.

When the fortification job is done, the air fields laid out, the underground airdromes, hangars, and machine shops constructed, and supplies laid in, a national Sigh-of-Relief Week should be declared. May our luck hold out?

Col. H. A. Toulmin, Jr., one of the experts, described picturesquely what is involved. We quote him again: "Nature has given us a whole series of aircraft carriers in the form of these islands. No fleet of an invading enemy or air corps would be in a position to attack the United States if we could use this chain of primary defenses."

To Puerto Rico, Guantanamo Bay and the Virgin Islands, huddled much too closely in the Caribbean, is now added a sweep of defense territory which extends from Canada to South America.

"In this tense international situation," says Brig. Gen. George V. Strong, Assistant Chief of Staff, United States Army, "the country cannot afford to wait until the completion of our Atlantic Navy. The equivalent of that Navy can be secured for defense purposes within a year."

[From the Washington Evening Star of September 4, 1940]

GAPS ARE PLUGGED

The base facilities granted to us by Britain for 99 years plug what might soon become dangerous gaps in our defenses, vast undefended stretches of water along what have been called the northern and southern highroads of invasion. In the past these deficiencies in outposts have not been considered vital, for we have depended to a large extent upon the friendly British Fleet for our security in the Atlantic. But if that fleet were to be destroyed, or even if it should be driven from its bases in the British Isles, our safety would be put in gravest jeopardy.

A study of the strategic importance of the prospective chain of naval and air bases across the two-thousand-odd miles from Newfoundland to British Guiana, on the South American mainland, will show convincingly how the security of the Western Hemisphere will be enhanced by the President's deal. The Monroe Doctrine takes on new force, for it will be implemented for the first time since its promulgation by a stationary "ring of steel" in the Atlantic Ocean of formidable defensive potentialities. The psychological effect of the very existence of such outer defenses should be considerable in this era of aggression on the march, of dictators looking for new worlds to conquer.

The proposed bases will strengthen our Atlantic defense system in its weakest points—the northern and southern flanks—and will provide a frontal outpost at Bermuda of incalculable value in an emergency, both as a listening station and as an intermediate supply base for warships and for planes. The Newfoundland base site was inspected recently by members of the joint Canadian-American defense board. The vulnerability of Canada—and hence of our northern border—to attack by way of Iceland and Greenland has been a matter of grave concern since the invasion of Norway by the Nazis. Canadian troops have occupied Danish-controlled Iceland for protective purposes, but if Britain fell, Iceland undoubtedly would have to be abandoned by the Canadians. Iceland is a stepping stone to Greenland, which, in turn, is only a short jump to Canada. Greenland must be considered as a part of the Western Hemisphere, and its invasion by a European power could not be countenanced under the Monroe Doctrine any more than an attack on Canada could be permitted by the United States. To forestall such a threat it is necessary that we should have not only a military understanding with Canada regarding joint defense, such as the joint board is working on now, but that we should have in the vicinity for our own self-protection a major operating base for fleet units and aircraft. Newfoundland is ideally situated for this purpose.

From Newfoundland the new defense line will extend southward to Bermuda, far off our bulging Atlantic coast line. It was indicated that two bases would be established in Bermuda, one on the east coast and another on the Great Bay, at the western end of the island. If Bermuda should be captured by a hostile power, bombing planes would have a convenient springboard for attacks on the populous Atlantic seaboard of the United States. Both Newfoundland and Bermuda are vital to the defense of Canada, and the British Government probably had this consideration in mind in making an outright gift of base sites in those locations.

The Bahamas are militarily important because they stand guard over the Florida Straits, between Cuba and the American mainland. This passage now is protected by a military station at Key West and by the big base at Guantanamo, Cuba. To the south of Cuba lies Jamaica. Bases in the Bahamas and Jamaica will vastly reinforce the security of the Greater Antilles. We have naval and air facilities in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands, but the remainder of the Lesser Antilles group, bending southward to Venezuela, are now virtually unguarded and hence very inviting to an aggressor with an eye on the Panama Canal or on the Venezuelan and Colombian oil fields. This alarming gap in the Canal defense scheme will be closed when bases are set up in Antigua, St. Lucia, and Trinidad and on the coast of British Guiana. Antigua is less than 300 miles southeast of the Virgin Islands. St. Lucia is about 500 miles below Antigua, and Trinidad is another 500 miles to the south and close to the Venezuelan shore. The last fortified area in the great chain will be on the mainland, in British Guiana.

Other links may be added to this chain shortly. Mr. Roosevelt indicated that negotiations for several more bases are under way. The United States could use profitably an air base in Nova Scotia, where the British already have one. A base in Danish Greenland would be worth a flotilla of destroyers in time of war with a European foe. Naval stations and air fields are needed in Central and South American regions close to the Panama Canal, life line of the fleet. The American people are certain to view with satisfaction any further acquisitions which add to the impregnability of the continent and thus complicate the problem confronting a would-be invader.

RADIO TRANSCRIPTION OF HON. KNUTE HILL, OF WASHINGTON

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio transcription made by me:

Friends and fellow citizens, the present are the most critical days of this generation. Only twice before in our history have our people faced so serious a situation. First, during the Revolution, when we were struggling for independence, and the critical years following when it became necessary to form a permanent Federal Government out of our 13 jealous Colonies. Again, when a civil war shook the foundations of this Nation and threatened to forever shut the door against a real attempt at democracy.

Today the world is aflame with war, the Four Black Horsemen, death, disease, famine, and pestilence are again riding with chacs in their wake, and even the Western Hemisphere is threatened with disaster. At such a time it is the duty of all elected servants of the people to remain at their posts no matter what the consequences to their political fortunes. In the past few months we here at the seat of our Federal Government have been building up an adequate defense against any attack, be it from Europe or Asia. We have no desire nor intention to take any part whatsoever in wars abroad. We joined once with the Allies in an attempt to make the world safe for democracy and failed miserably. So much so that dictatorship stalks abroad in Europe today, waging war on the helpless, and the specter of death, disease, hunger, and hatred hovers over a once prosperous continent.

We here in America must make this Western Hemisphere safe for democracy so that it will be a starting point again for civilization and Christianity when a war-weary and insane world is again ready to walk down the pathway to peace. This is not selfishness—it is self-preservation and a resulting preservation of democracy.

In this defense program it is necessary not only to build up an army and a navy and an air force to ward off any threat of a foreign invasion, but it is also our duty to so solve our own economic problems as to make this country a real democracy where all who seek employment and opportunity for work and advancement may not be denied that American right; where our youth, coming out of our high schools and colleges, may not find their ambition to serve their country and their fellow men frustrated at the very threshold of life; where justice and equity and fair play may prevail; and where freedom of speech, of press, of religion, and of peaceable assembly may always be maintained.

To this end if we in Congress conscript the youth and manhood of our land to leave their accustomed duties and make the sacrifice of serving their country for nominal wages, and, mayhap to risk their lives in its defense, so we must and shall conscript the industries to make a like sacrifice in defense of the country which protects them and make it possible for them to survive.

We must and shall refuse them excess profits when our boys are giving to the utmost. We must, and shall levy a heavy tax on those best able to pay (and that includes those of us right here in Congress), so that we may pay for this preparedness program as we go.

A definite and necessary part of this defense program is the permanent solution of our unemployment problem. Let it not be said that we who live in the land of opportunity shall deny anyone seeking a job the right to work; that we who live in the land of abundance shall permit hunger and want to exist in our great cities and even in the countryside; that we who boast of our genius and inventiveness, our public schools and colleges, our great laboratories of science and medicine, art, and economics, cannot solve the most important and most pressing problems of a democracy: the common good of all our people. We can do this, if we will, and we must, if we purpose to continue as a democracy and be a type and a guide to the peoples of all the world.

The present is no time for petty boasting on the part of those in authority nor for carping criticism on the part of those who seek high office. Least of all, is there any justification for either party to charge the opposite party with un-Americanism or the attempt to destroy democracy. Although we may have different methods of solving these problems we are all sincere in our efforts. We, who are for the time being acting servants of the American people, should earnestly search our past records and correct any errors which inevitably occur where something is really done and accomplished. On the other hand, the opposition should exercise the privilege and duty of constructive criticism. This, again, is the essence of democracy. Above all, we should and must unite our forces against the common foe.

We, your elected officials, respectfully submit that performance is better than promises. Our record is open for public inspection. Can the same be said for some of our opponents? Some even have no official public record, as for instance, the Republican candidate for President and the Republican candidate for Congress in the Fourth Congressional District. The latter proclaims vociferously that he secured by his very active campaign, a raise in the spray residue tolerance on apples. How can a mere novice in public affairs claim credit for such an accomplishment? All of you, my listeners, are intelligent enough to know that we who are here on the job, through our experience and influential contacts secure these important benefits. That it is we who through our incessant efforts, secured the adoption of the food-stamp plan and other good results. Far rather should credit be given to the many civic groups and organizations who have united to support such worth-while projects and are cooperating to make it a success.

Primary election comes next Tuesday. Let us thank God that here in the United States we still have the free ballot to express our honest conviction and choices—that we here peaceably abide by the will of the majority expressed at the polls. This is democracy in action, and no Stalin nor Mussolini nor Hitler shall ever be able to deprive us of this inalienable right. We are not only a free people but we have the courage of our convictions, and will defend them and our homes and institutions from any and all attacks from foreign foes. Let us also make our country the land of happy home owners and cheerful workers, of busy industry and prosperous agriculture. Then there can be no fertile field for subversive "isms" from within our gates. This is as necessary a part of our defense program as an army and navy and air force. For this reason, I repeat, it is incumbent on us to remain here as long as the emergency lasts, and to rationally solve the many pending problems that press for immediate solution. May we, each and all, here in Washington, D. C., and back there in Washington State, see clearly our duties, performing them to the best of our abilities and with full faith in our God, in our fellow men, and in our splendid democracy.

National Defense Materially Strengthened by Courageous Act of President Roosevelt

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON EVENING STAR

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the very interesting and informative editorial from the Washington Star of September 4, 1940:

[From the Washington Evening Star of September 4, 1940]

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

President Roosevelt, in one courageous and far-sighted move, has written a new chapter in American history—a chapter whose full implications only the future can adequately appraise. But the immediate benefits of the trade with Great Britain, in which we acquire leases to eight vitally important naval and air bases at strategic points in the Atlantic Ocean and the Caribbean Sea in exchange for 50 over-age destroyers, are obvious.

The base facilities granted to us by Britain for 99 years plug what might soon become dangerous gaps in our defenses, vast undefended stretches of water along what have been called the northern and southern high roads of invasion. In the past these deficiencies in outposts have not been considered vital, for we have depended to a large extent upon the friendly British Fleet for our security in the Atlantic. But if that fleet were to be destroyed, or even if it should be driven from its bases in the British Isles, our safety would be put in gravest jeopardy.

One immediate result of the agreement reached between the President and the British Government, then, is to give us an opportunity to make ourselves strong where we have been weak. According to Admiral Stark, Chief of Naval Operations, the traded destroyers are not essential to the defense of this country, and, in his judgment, the "total defense" of the United States will be strengthened as a result of the transfer if Congress grants the funds for proper development of the new bases.

On the other side of the picture there is the strong probability that we also stand to gain in security from the uses to which Britain will put the destroyers received from us. If these old but still useful fighting vessels should enable the British to stand off the German assault, our security will be assured for years to come. But if that is not to be—if Britain is beaten despite this assistance—the newly acquired bases, properly developed, will be more useful to us in resisting aggression from across the Atlantic than would be the aging destroyers. And it is not inconsistent to expect that these ships—old though they are—will give a good account of themselves in convoy or combat operations, under the desperate circumstances prevailing in England; that if they should be lost in action, our potential enemies will be proportionately weakened in achieving their destruction.

The President will be criticized for concluding this agreement with the British through use of his executive powers instead of through the more formal treaty process, which requires ratification by a two-thirds vote of the Senate. It is, indeed, most unfortunate that circumstances made inadvisable the normal procedure of submission of the plan to Congress. But the President certainly considered that, and it is to his credit that he elected to assume possible political penalties in order to pursue a course he believed to be right rather than pass the responsibility of making the decision to the Senate, where, in all probability, a treaty covering the same matters would have been long delayed if not defeated. Mr. Roosevelt, in this instance, has taken a long look into the future. And, in the Star's opinion, the position of the United States in a turbulent world has been greatly strengthened by the decision he has made and acted upon.

A study of the strategic importance of the prospective chain of naval and air bases across the two thousand-odd miles from Newfoundland to British Guiana, on the South American mainland, will show convincingly how the security of the Western Hemisphere will be enhanced by the President's deal. The Monroe Doctrine takes on new force, for it will be implemented for the first time since its promulgation by a stationary "ring of steel" in the Atlantic Ocean of formidable defensive potentialities. The psychological effect of the very existence of such outer defenses should be considerable in this era of aggression on the march, of dictators looking for new worlds to conquer.

The proposed bases will strengthen our Atlantic defense system in its weakest points—the northern and southern flanks—and will provide a frontal outpost at Bermuda of incalculable value in an emergency, both as a listening station and as an intermediate supply base for warships and for planes. The Newfoundland base site was inspected recently by members of the Joint Canadian-American Defense Board. The vulnerability of Canada—and hence of our northern border—to attack by way of Iceland and Greenland has been a matter of grave concern since the invasion of Norway by the Nazis. Canadian troops have occupied Danish-controlled Iceland for protection purposes, but if Britain fell, Iceland undoubtedly would have to be abandoned by the Canadians. Iceland is a stepping stone to Greenland, which, in turn, is only a short jump to Canada. Greenland must be considered as a part of the Western Hemisphere, and its invasion by a European power could not be countenanced under the Monroe Doctrine any more than an attack on Canada could be permitted by the United States. To forestall such a threat it is necessary that we should have not only a military understanding with Canada regarding joint defense, such as the joint board is working on now, but that we should have in the vicinity, for our own self-protection, a major operating base for fleet units and aircraft. Newfoundland is ideally situated for this purpose.

From Newfoundland the new defense line will extend southward to Bermuda, far off our bulging Atlantic coast line. It was indicated that two bases would be established in Bermuda, one on the east coast and another on the Great Bay, at the western end of the island. If Bermuda should be captured by a hostile power, bombing planes would have a convenient springboard for attacks on the populous Atlantic seaboard of the United States. Both Newfoundland and Bermuda are vital to the defense of Canada, and the British Government probably had this consideration in mind in making an outright gift of base sites in those locations.

The Bahamas are militarily important because they stand guard over the Florida Straits, between Cuba and the American mainland. This passage now is protected by a military station at Key West and by the big base at Guantanamo, Cuba. To the south of Cuba lies Jamaica. Bases in the Bahamas and Jamaica will vastly reinforce the security of the Greater Antilles. We have naval and air facilities in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands, but the remainder of the Lesser Antilles group, bending southward to Venezuela, are now virtually unguarded and hence very inviting to an aggressor with an eye on the Panama Canal or on the Venezuelan and Colombian oil fields. This alarming gap in the Canal defense scheme will be closed when bases are set up in Antigua, Santa Lucia, and Trinidad and on the coast of British Guiana. Antigua is less than 300 miles southeast of the Virgin Islands, Santa Lucia is about 500 miles below Antigua, and Trinidad is another 500 miles to the south and close to the Venezuelan shore. The last fortified area in the great dam wil be on the mainland side British Guiana.

Other links may be added to this chain shortly. Mr. Roosevelt indicated that negotiations for several more bases are under way. The United States could use profitably an air base in Nova Scotia, where the British already have one. A base in Danish Greenland would be worth a flotilla of destroyers in time of war with a European foe. Naval stations and air fields are needed in Central and South American regions close to the Panama Canal, life line of the fleet. The American people are certain to view with satisfaction any further acquisitions which add to the impregnability of the continent and thus complicate the problem confronting a would-be invader.

For legal authority to consummate the exchange of destroyers for bases by Executive agreement, the President relied on an opinion by Attorney General Jackson upholding his authority in this respect. In brief, Mr. Jackson held that the President derived authority to acquire the bases by Executive agreement from both constitutional and statutory sources, the constitutional authority being applicable because the agreement imposes no future obligations on the United States, but merely grants the privilege of developing the bases if Congress chooses to appropriate funds for that purpose.

In the more controversial matter of disposing of the destroyers, the Attorney General held that "the right of the President to dispose of vessels of the Navy and unneeded naval material finds clear recognition in at least two enactments of the Congress and a decision of the Supreme Court." One prohibitory statute, that of June 28, 1940, was eliminated when the Chief of Naval Operations certified that the destroyers were not essential to the defense of the United States, and another, enacted in 1917, was held by Mr. Jackson to be applicable only to armed vessels built with intent that they should enter the service of a belligerent.

The one remaining legalistic argument against the transfer—that it would be in violation of international law and an act of war—was rejected by Mr. Jackson, who cited authority which seemed clearly to support his position on this point. Certainly, to a layman, there does not appear to be any real difference between the sale or transfer of a destroyer to a belligerent and the sale or transfer of a military airplane or a field gun to the same belligerent. If the turning over of the destroyers to Great Britain is an act of war, then we have already committed acts of war in the past.

On the whole, it is more reasonable to believe that the transfer of the destroyers is not an act of war, and that it will not be interpreted as such by Germany, who went to much greater lengths on her own account in the Spanish civil conflict. With respect to the legality of the transfer by Executive agreement rather than by treaty, it should be conceded, perhaps, that Mr. Jackson does not make out an unanswerable case. It is seldom that that can be done in any legal dispute. But if his arguments in support of Mr. Roosevelt are not conclusive, they are at least strongly persuasive, and those who contend that the President has exceeded his authority have not as yet made out a stronger case in support of their position.

What's Happening in Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED BRADLEY

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

ADDRESS BY HON. FRED BRADLEY OF MICHIGAN

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me before the Michigan Commercial Secretaries Association, Grand Hotel, Mackinac Island, August 30, 1940:

Mr. Toastmaster, distinguished guests, ladies, and gentlemen, I bid you good evening. I am indeed highly honored to have had your cordial invitation to visit with you for a few hours this evening. I hope none of you will fall asleep. After all, you selected this topic, not I.

Incidentally, I do not know what individual among you is responsible for assigning me this subject, "What's Happening In Washington," but I do know that Harvey Campbell is not guilty. He agrees with me that it would take a week to tell you all that's happening in Washington. That is if any of us actually know everything that's happening, including the under-cover stuff in Washington. But you picked the subject, and you will have to pay the penalty. After all, I must remind you that while the rules of the Senate permit Senators to talk as long as they can stay on their feet, our rules in the House limit us to 1 hour on any subject. For that reason some of us aspire to be Senators, and so I am going to try an experiment on you tonight. If you will bear with me, I will talk as long as I can stay on my feet. But do not misunderstand me, I am not in the market for Senatorial robes, not now nor in the future. Yet I do confess to enjoying my work in the House and I have great admiration for my colleagues.

Now you have asked me to tell you, "What's Happening in Washington." Well here is just one little item in which you secretaries ought to be very much interested. Whether because it's an election year, or whether because there is a war in Europe, the fact remains that we continue to pile bureaucrat upon bureaucrat—office upon office. Our Government in Washington owns and occupies within the District of Columbia blocks upon blocks of the most beautiful and huge office buildings in this Nation. Nevertheless, during the past 4 months Uncle Sam's local rent bill has jumped more than one-half million dollars per year. According to Government figures we learn that from May 1 to August 1 the total leased space for Government offices in Washington increased by almost one-half million square feet, or nearly 10 acres. In that same period the annual rentals increased from $3,866,000 to $4,393,000. And so we now find ourselves with over 21,000,000 square feet of leased office space or approximately 482 acres, right in the city of Washington itself. We pay for that space approximately $1.33 per square foot per year. Therefore, I humbly suggest to you secretaries that you should agree with us Republicans who advocate decentralization of government. Wouldn't it be fine to be able to rent Uncle Sam several thousand feet in your own city at $1.33 per square foot? Think it over.

Now to get back to the subject matter.

Of course, the all-important subject in Washington today is the war and what we may or may not do about it. War brings with it serious propaganda. Washington is flooded with it. By act of Congress, the State Department is supposed to register every foreign propaganda agent or agency in the United States. Much German, Italian, Japanese, and Chinese propaganda floods our offices daily. In addition to that we are subject to all sorts of propaganda in this entire Nation of a more subtle nature—that by word of mouth, through the press, and through the radio and motion pictures. It's the old story of the World War. We in this Nation must be constantly on the alert. There is no question in the minds of Congress as to the sympathies of the American people in this current war. They are overwhelmingly pro-British. Likewise in Congress there is an overwhelming feeling that the American people are determined to keep out of active participation in the war—at least we feel that the American people are determined that American blood shall not be shed across the Atlantic Ocean. We are told, and many of us feel, that we may properly aid and should aid England and her colonies in every way "short of war." There comes a point, however, when one may justly question just how close he is approaching the precipice over which one more step will plunge us into the maelstrom of the European conflagration. We must be constantly on our guard lest clever propaganda create in American public sentiment a demand for that last unwise, ill-conceived, fatal step.

In his acceptance speech recently Wendell Willkie ably said—and I quote him: "No man can guarantee to maintain peace. Peace is not something that a nation can achieve by itself. It also depends upon what some other country does." I agree very much with that sentiment. We in Washington charged with preserving our peace for this Nation must beware of the actions of all nations—those presumed to be friendly as well as those presumed to be unfriendly. An incident which I witnessed in the Senate on Monday is illustrative. The able Democratic Senator from Montana, Senator WHEELER, told about a conversation he had in his office for several hours with a very prominent British statesman, Sir George Paish.

Sir George, incidentally, explained to him that the downfall of France had been caused by the fact that the French black colonial troops, upon whom they counted to stem the German advance in the front-line trenches, became panicky and ran before the dive bombers, tanks, and later, the foot soldiers armed with automatic rifles, and then he went on with the recital of such a serious conversation and made such alarming statements, that Senator WHEELER not only dictated these statements to his secretary, after the visitor had left, but likewise immediately discussed them with several of his colleagues on the Senate floor. Sir George told him that he had been sent over here in 1916 by the British Government, officially, to create a wave of sentiment in America which would lead us into the World War. He made this statement, and I quote him from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, "I am responsible for getting this country into the last war, and I intend to get it into this one." Senator WHEELER said to him, and I quote him, "That is a broad statement," and then he qualified it to the extent of saying, "Well, everything short of war." Sir George went on to say, and I quote him again, "I am over here now, and I am going to cross the United States on a speaking tour, and I am going to get this country into this war." When Senator WHEELER told him that he did not believe this country would go to war, he said, "Senator, the sentiment in this country is going to roll up, and roll up like the ocean waves. Regardless of what you want, you will be forced to vote for it."

That, gentlemen, is typical of some of the propaganda pressure we are up against. Of course, Lord Lothian, the British Ambassador in Washington, was very quick to deny, and I do not dispute his denial, that Sir George is over here simply as a private citizen, but I do say to you that I agree with the sentiment expressed on the floor of the Senate, that that gentleman, and others of his kind, should not only not be permitted entrance into the United States, but upon discovery should be sent back whence they came as fast as we can get them on the first boat headed eastward. America has no room for that type of propagandist.

Yes; war is the all-important topic in Washington and, indeed, in the Nation today. The war blinds us to our own internal difficulties. We must not forget that the greatest defense any nation can have is a strong internal economy. We must have internal unity.

We must have less internal hatred, less internal strife between capital and labor, between race and creed. We must have an end of class hatred. Above all, we must have internal unity, but that does not call for unity under a dictatorship of any form.

It calls for our traditional form of unity under our republican form of government.

When we are considering this very important question of rearmament and preparedness we must not lose sight of our internal weaknesses. These must be eliminated, because therein lies our greatest strength against enemies from within or enemies from without. Of one thing we must be certain, and we must not be afraid to face that fact with clear heads. When this war ends, America will find itself leading a different life. We are faced with a different economy both nationally and internationally. The whole world appears to be in the process of change and unquestionably we will have to rearrange our national economy accordingly. Just what the future holds in store for us no one can accurately predict at this moment. It is, however, a subject in which you secretaries of chambers of commerce must of necessity be as vitally, or more vitally, interested than the average person, because it is you who are, in large measure, charged with the economic welfare of your own community. If you are fortunate, and your town is prosperous, your job is safe. If your town is on the skids, you may be looking for a new job. You are very much like the coach of a football team. If the team wins, it's a great team; if the team, loses, it's a poor coach. And, therefore, if I can give you a little picture of the international situation as it looks to us in Washington these days and try to give you some of my own forecasts for the future, possibly that may give you some thoughts as to how to devise new plays for your team.

Speaking of teams and teamwork, I am reminded that some time ago, over my radio, I heard some remark to the effect that in our Government the executive and legislative departments were a team, and that teamwork must be the order of the day. That may be so over the radio, and maybe it makes good reading in newspapers, but in Washington we see little evidence of it. Maybe we in Congress are too stubborn, like Casey's mule, or maybe we are too dumb and, therefore, incapable of being taken into the confidence of the driver. In any event it has lately become necessary for us to await the news reports from foreign correspondents to learn what international agreements are being made between the United States and Great Britain. For instance, we recently heard a rumor to the effect that we were offering to trade some 50 old destroyers to Great Britain in exchange for 99-year leases on air and naval bases in British possessions in this hemisphere. When questioned about it, the President replied rather irritably but very flatly and emphatically that the reports were "just another story." And yet, 24 hours later, the Chief Executive announced the negotiation on British bases but still refused, and refused again, to comment on the trading of American destroyers.

Some weeks ago the New York Times came forward with an editorial advocating universal conscription. Senator PEPPER had introduced a resolution or made a speech about it. Senator PEPPER is generally considered the "trial balloon" spokesman for the White House. The President then said he had no comments to make and no thoughts about the question. Just a week ago, Senator JAMES W. WADSWORTH, of New York—now a Member of the House and a good friend of mine—told me personally that the President had never favored conscription, and yet, within 24 hours, the President came out in no uncertain terms and demanded that the Senate act promptly and put through the conscription bill immediately and that to do otherwise would be courting disaster.

Again a week ago, we in the House increased the lending capacity of the Export-Import Bank one-half billion dollars to make loans to the Latin-American countries. Now in the hearings before the House Committee on Banking and Currency, but one witness was permitted to be called, Jesse Jones, the Chairman of the R. F. C. Mr. Jones, you will recall, was a Hoover appointee when the R. F. C. was first organized. He has made a very enviable record. He has been quite properly called one of the outstanding and most astute bankers in the Nation. His record has been quite remarkable. And, therefore, when he asks for more money, based upon that record, he generally has very little difficulty getting it, although sometimes we have felt that he has had his tongue in his cheek when he has requested additional funds. Nevertheless, the House has felt that when Jones had money to lend, or "splend" as we call it, we had a reasonable chance of expecting the loans to be well supervised and with a reasonable chance of collection. What that much money in other, and perhaps irresponsible, hands might cost the taxpayers has always disturbed us. And hence, the committee members have always endeavored to have other witnesses called to substantiate Mr. Jones' requests. In this last instance, because of the fact that Secretary Hull may possibly have made some commitments at the recent Habana conference, the minority members of the Banking and Currency Committee—ably led by two of my Michigan colleagues, JESSE WOLCOTT, of Port Huron, and FRED CRAWFORD, of Saginaw, demanded that Under Secretary Welles or someone from the State Department be asked to testify. Majority members of the committee, however, denied this privilege and, consequently, the bill was rushed through and the funds voted by the House.

We were rather surprised then to learn on Saturday, out of a clear sky, that Harry Hopkins had resigned as Secretary of Commerce—he should have resigned months ago—and who, above all, was to be offered his post but Mr. Jesse Jones. Of course, the President has suggested that Mr. Jones occupy both duties, that of Secretary of Commerce and watchdog of the R. F. C. Whether or not the Congress will permit this, I do not know. But if it does, most assuredly he will be unable to personally supervise R. F. C. loans as closely as he has in the past. To handle both of these tremendously important jobs, I fear will sooner or later result fatally for him. Regardless of that, this Export-Import Bank bill only got by the House by less than 40 votes, and I know just as well as I'm standing here that had it not been thought by minority and majority Members as well that these loans would be personally supervised by Jesse Jones that that money would never have been voted, because in my opinion—and in the opinion of 144 Members of the House who voted against that measure—it is laden with dynamite and fraught with no end of possibilities for danger to this Nation.

For instance, we were told by its proponents that these loans would be made to the nations, or the banks or individuals thereof, in Latin America and in Canada. If in Canada, as a part of the British Empire, it is a direct violation of the Johnson Act, which is still upon our books, as well as our Neutrality Act.

We were told that some of this money would go to Latin America to purchase agricultural surpluses—which they have in abundance—in order to aid England in her blockade of Germany and prevent the central powers from purchasing these surpluses to feed their own nations and the occupied nations. Then some of the money will be loaned to buy American agricultural equipment to help improve their farming methods and indeed some of it is perhaps scheduled to go into some farm-subsidy program for South America to create additional surpluses which must either flow into European markets after the war or into American markets—in either case in direct competition with our already tremendous agricultural surpluses in this country. And so while we pay our farmers to kill little piggies, to plow under crops, and we subsidize our own surpluses, we again reach into the taxpayer's pocket and send more money into South America to create more surpluses in the world market in which we ourselves are playing a pathetic part at this moment.

Then we were told that some of this money would go into the construction of huge industrial plants and in the exploitation of wonderful iron mines, ore deposits, etc., in Latin America. Now consider the menace in all this. We all know, of course, that the wage scale and, therefore, the standard of living in Latin America is very much lower than in the United States. There is nothing in this bill which would prohibit our own American citizens from borrowing this money and operating those plants in Latin America. Operating on the lower-wage scale and under standards of living to which those natives are accustomed—and in their ignorance they know no better—it certainly takes no Solomon to see that your money and mine can conceivably be going into Latin America to create manufactured articles for world trade—indeed, possibly for trade in our own country—again in direct competition with industry in this country. And so we find ourselves in this "picklement" as Andy Brown would say.

With a mountainous and rapidly increasing national debt on our hands, and a heavy defense program ahead of us, both of which must of necessity immediately tremendously increase our own taxes and therefore our cost of production, endeavoring to keep our own heads above water, nationally and internationally on the one hand, while at the same time paying money out of our own empty pockets to subsidize newly formed industries in Latin America to directly compete with our own industries within our continental borders.

And that's not all. Private American capital has been invested abroad for many years. As a matter of fact one and three-quarter billions of it has been invested in Latin America, of which some one and one-quarter billions is still in default—both in principal and interest. Many times in past years, our Government has been asked—and has—sent our armed forces to protect our foreign investments. Our marines have done yeoman duty in that service. In fact it has been their principal duty. In some other instances, we have not yielded to that investment-banker pressure and have seen hundreds of millions of dollars of property expropriated as recently in Mexico and in Bolivia; two countries for which these loans are presently intended.

Now to carry the picture a bit further. In the recent pan-American conferences, it was agreed not only that we would undertake the defense of the Western Hemisphere—the entire Western Hemisphere—but also that any nation could take such steps as it deemed necessary to prevent invasion, or to put down the threat of invasion, or to protect its own interests.

Now, we have long known of a tremendous infiltration of Germans and Japanese into South America. We just recently gave the President the power to call out the National Guard and Reserves and use them outside of the continental United States. I ask you, then, is there not the possibility that we might very shortly be expected to send a military force to police part or all of Latin America? If so, do you suppose that those nations are going to feel any more friendly toward us than they do now? We are told that they are democracies. There's about as much democracy in most of those countries as there is in Chicago or Jersey City. Instead, by reason of the very ignorance of the millions of peons living in those countries, they have of necessity, in fact, been autocracies throughout the years.

Oh, yes; we were told that those loans were necessary to build up good will in order to obtain naval and air bases. I was down in Panama last winter and I discussed this very subject at length with our high Army officials in the Canal Zone. They told me that we could have all of the air bases we wanted in any of those Central American countries in almost any strategic location we demanded, because they themselves realize that to keep from being totally overrun by any of the European nations they had to look first to Uncle Sam as the big brother to defend them in time of trouble. But I want you gentlemen to think over that Latin American picture. In my humble opinion, it is dynamite from the word "go." Is there no other method we know of obtaining good will in this Nation but the spendthrift method of a "good time Charlie"? After all, gentlemen, in my opinion, real, sincere friendship is never for sale.

Now I want to go into the highly controversial subject of compulsory training as opposed to voluntary enlistment. And I want to summarize if I can for you some of the arguments that are being used on both sides of this question. In the first place, by way of background may I say this. We have at present under arms in this Nation nearly 1,000,000 men. Our Army has at present 303,000 officers and men. Recruits are pouring in at the rate of 30,000 per month and the goal is set at 375,000. The National Guard with 237,000 men at the present time is up to its authorized strength. Our Navy which now has a total of 154,516, and which accepted 9,080 recruits in July, has an authorized strength of 170,000 men. The marines are almost at their authorized strength of 32,000, although they recruited 7,200 during July. We have in the Naval Reserve over 40,000 and in the Marine Reserve over 15,000. In addition to this, we have 120,000 Army Reserve officers and 17,500 Enlisted Reserves. Therefore, by the 1st of October—whether the conscription bill passes or not—we should have under arms in this country over 1,000,000 men.

It is now proposed to register all men between 21 and 31 to a total of about 12,000,000 men and to select therefrom by January 1, 1941, approximately 400,000 men presumably for 1 year's training.

The Army General Staff now estimates that for the protection of the entire Western Hemisphere, it will require at least 100,000 men to garrison the outposts in Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, Philippines, and Canal Zone; another 50,000 men for harbor defense to protect naval and airplane bases on American shores. Because of the importance of aircraft and defense, the Army now believes this country must have an air force of 150,000 men. And to back up all of these outposts, it is felt that an expeditionary force of at least 800,000 men should be subject to immediate mobilization. Therefore, the Army feels that it should have 1,500,000 trained troops under arms or subject to immediate call in order to adequately make good on recent commitments to defend the entire Western Hemisphere. Now that is all well and good, and I am willing to take their word for it. Meanwhile, we must not blame General Marshall nor the General Staff for stating, as they have many times previously, that a standing army of 350,000 is sufficient to protect this country and our own possessions. If the President and the State Department decide that the entire hemisphere is now the United States, that is a horse of a different color.

Now, when we talk about conscription, and an army to be trained for a 1-year period, many people seem to have the idea that it means we will put these boys into training camps and under some forced draft method of training as we did in the early days of the World War. This is not the present program.

We have not the commissioned nor noncommissioned officer personnel in the Regular Army, National Guard, or Reserve Corps sufficiently trained in modern warfare to handle an army of 400,000 trainees, as a separate group. Consequently, as fast as these boys are taken into the service, they will be assigned to regular units of the Army or National Guard to bring their integral units up to full wartime strength and they will be trained along with the seasoned troops wherever they happen to be stationed, be it Fort Custer, Fort Brady, the Philippines, the Canal Zone, Alaska, or perhaps in Bolivia. Theirs will be a selective service—so far as I can tell—only in that they will be inducted for only 1 year of training and at the regular Army base pay of $21 per month. On the other hand, 200,000 boys will remain home in the C. C. C. camps, undergoing no military training, but still enjoying the same clothing, the same or better food, and probably far better heat, comfort, and sanitation, while drawing down a base pay of $30 per month, and enlisted for only a period of 3 months, with the privilege of reenlisting for another 3 or 6 months. This latter thought, it strikes me, is perhaps one of the strongest arguments the opponents of this measure have when they say that voluntary enlistment has not been given a fair trial.

But now the question naturally arises, With what are these new troops to be trained? I do not have to dwell at length upon the state of our physical unpreparedness. I do not have to remind you that in all of these recent war games, we have been training our men with antiquated automobiles with a sign on them marked "Tanks," with machine guns that were a piece of stovepipe stuck into a board, antitank guns that were a piece of 2-inch gas pipe mounted on a tin plate and on bicycle wheels.

I do not have to remind you of those distressing pictures, but let's get down to a few cold facts and figures while we are considering this problem of conscripting the youth of America. According to the United States News of last week we then had this on hand: A one-ocean Navy of 399 warships, 5,500 airplanes for all branches of the service, of which much less than 2,000 are reasonably modern fighting craft. Our production rate was stated at 900 monthly. Of that, however, not 10 percent is going into the armed forces of this Nation, the balance going to England. We had 500 light tanks with the remarkable production rate of 3 per day. We had 52,000 Garand rifles, with a production rate of 250 per day. In this connection it is interesting to note that in a recent comment from Europe I learned that what terrified the Allies over in France was not entirely the aircraft or tanks, but the fact that every German foot soldier carried an automatic rifle. The old Springfield apparently is not much more valuable today against a modern foe than would a sawed-off shotgun be against a gangster with a tommy gun. In short, therefore, we now have arms and equipment of a modern nature for an army of 300,000 men. What are the prospects? By October of this year we will be producing 500 new Garand rifles daily. By November we hope to produce 1,000 war planes per month. By January next we hope to step this up to 1,500 monthly and 6 new light tanks per day. By July of 1941 we expect to have 1,000 new Garand rifles per day and 1,500 tanks ready. And by August we will have critical arms and equipment for 1,000,000 men.

By January of 1942 we hope to have 5,000 antiaircraft guns ready for action, and in July 1942, if England doesn't take them all, we will have 25,000 war planes, or exactly half of what the President mentioned in his last "fireside chat." And so it goes, until we find that by October 1943 we will have our 50,000 war planes ready, if enough of them are up to date, and we'll have complete arms and equipment for 1,200,000 men, whereas the Army now states they need 1,500,000 men ready today. And in 1946, if everything goes well, we will have our two-ocean Navy with a total of 701 warships.

And so I raise the question again. With what equipment are these young men to be trained? I appreciate that it can be argued they can receive discipline, become physically hardened, and still they can receive some actual training on what little equipment we have today. And the argument is also advanced, what good is the equipment without men to man it? Well, in answer to the second argument, I dare say that England wishes she had in some hidden warehouse several thousand airplanes ready for pilots right at this moment. But on the other hand, if we do take these men into the service, as we are doing today, before we have the equipment with which to properly train them we may be killing off men as we are doing right now in Texas. My pilot has recently returned from Texas. He spent a number of weeks down there in a commercial air school which has a contract with the Government to train fledgling Army pilots in planes furnished by the Army.

He was taking these boys, many of whom, if you please, had never seen an airplane at close hand, and teaching them not only the rudiments of flying but aerobatics as well. He was teaching them the full prescribed Army primary training course. The airplanes that he was using were 14-year-old PT–1 Army planes equipped with J–5 motors, long outmoded, and with a flying speed of 80 miles per hour. No faster than any of these little "putt-putts" that you see around any of our airports these days with 4-cylinder 40-horsepower motors in them. In order to do a common Immelmann or loop with these planes, if you please, he had to teach the boys to roll them over on their back and dive them straight down in order to get sufficient momentum to bring them up into a loop and roll out on the top in an Immelmann turn which is an elementary maneuver for escaping an opponent who is riding on your tail. Cracking them up? Of course, they're cracking them up because any 10-year-old kid could put his finger right through the wings any place he chose. That's what we're doing with our boys right today, and yet there are many people crying for immediate conscription.

Well, the opponents to conscription have many additional arguments. Some of them point out that our good friends to the north, up here in Canada, have theoretically at least been at war for one year. They have not yet resorted to conscription. I understand that they have provided for registration and have provided for 30-day training, under some form of selective service, but none of their boys are required to serve overseas except on an entirely voluntary basis. Again we hear this argument. France conscripted 6,000,000 men and had them under arms at the time she capitulated to the blitzkrieg.

Did conscription save France? In fact, we learn in a dispatch from England that in the opinion of men like General DeGaulle, later of the French free forces, and Polish General Sikorsky that a whole nation may be mobilized and yet lose a battle. They have learned on the Continent that the old theory that victory is achieved by putting the greatest number of men in one place at one time is obsolete. The mobilization of industry is the first essential in modern warfare, with factories in isolated regions beyond the reach of the enemy, so that they can maintain a constant supply of airplanes, tanks, antiaircraft and antitank guns, secret weapons to combat secret weapons, and propaganda to encounter enemy-propaganda services. In England today the idea is expressed that the aim of modern warfare is to gain the maximum advantage with a minimum expenditure of manpower, with machines bearing the brunt of the battle. And they advise that until a nation grasps the full implications of this new theory of modern warfare its defeat is certain.

The Senate, possibly wisely, had this theory of mobilization of industry in mind when on Wednesday, by the overwhelming vote of 69 to 16, it adopted an amendment which provides for the conscription of "any existing manufacturing plant or facility necessary for national defense," and provided by order of the President the Government could immediately take possession of such industrial plants, to be operated either by Government personnel or by contract with private firms.

The Senate has finally passed the conscription bill with that amendment by a vote of 58 to 31, Wednesday night.

In addition to this conscription of industry the major provisions are, as you know, that it calls for registration of our manpower from 21 to 31 and calls for inducting into the service these 400,000 young men. They are limited to service in the Western Hemisphere only. Likewise, no more than 900,000 can be inducted into training in the armed forces of the Nation at one time. With those that we now have under arms, this time, at least, if those cards are in the deck that's about to be dealt, we will have the manpower under orders ready for shipment abroad if Sir George Paish's "wave of enthusiasm rolls on and on" and the Congress so decrees, but we still have to find out with what these boys are going to do battle. We in the House will probably start wrestling with this bill next week. What its fate will be there, or in what manner this bill may be changed in the House, I dare not predict. I believe it will have tough sledding to say the least. Nevertheless, there is this much to be said. There is unquestionably much merit in the argument that after all if it is honestly, correctly, and sincerely administered, conscription is probably the most democratic way to raise an army, because everyone should, and if properly administered would, be taken into the service if he were physically fit when his number came up.

If conscription does come to pass, let us hope that the question of exemption will be handled entirely by the local board rather than by bureaucrats in Washington subject to political domination. Local boards proved in the World War, in most instances, that they—because of their contact with local affairs—could differentiate between the conscientious objector and the slacker. In our next war there must be no Grover Cleveland Bergdolls.

Before I cast my vote for conscription—or against it—I want to know the answers to these questions:

1. Are we out to train young men or are we creating a standing army of over a million men for an indefinite period?

2. Is such an army necessary today before we have equipment and, at least, adequate housing facilities?

3. If our regular enlistment period is 3 years at a $21 base pay—why not try out 1 year at $30 pay as in the C. C. C.?

4. Where are these boys to serve—in possessions under our flag or in the entire Western Hemisphere—or elsewhere in the World?

5. What is our immediate danger of invasion—if not immediate just when? Let us be frank about that.

6. Is it contemplated that we will go now or later to England's aid.

7. By what authority does Sir George Paish speak when he says he's here to get us worked up into war fever as he did with England's sanction in 1916?

But remember this, when you conscript the manpower and industrial power of this Nation, you will next conscript the wealth of this Nation, and when you conscript all, America will go under a military dictatorship. And liberties once lost are seldom if ever regained. Believe me, you have not heard the end of the draft wealth amendment to this conscription bill, as recently proposed in the Senate. That Senate rejection came only on a technicality. At least two moves in that same direction are still to be made. It is expected in Washington that before the conscription bill is passed in the House, an amendment will be offered to register wealth and property. Its proponents will probably avoid any taxation proposal but merely ask for a complete survey so that the Government will know "who has it and where it is" in case of war. And, mark my word, most legislators in Washington, if they voted to conscript the youth and industry of this Nation, will find it very difficult to oppose such a wealth-conscription measure. It is also probable that after the conscription bill passes, and its proponents hope that it will be disposed of before the excise-tax bill comes up, it is proposed that some bill to conscript property will be tacked on to the excise-profits tax in the Senate. Now, what brings that about specifically? It has been said that many industrial corporations are refusing Army and Navy orders and aircraft orders because of the fact that an act of Congress limited profits on naval orders to 8 percent. But it is principally because of the fact that the British purchasing mission is willing to pay much higher prices for war matériel than that offered by the Army and Navy.

I have heard a number of the legislators feel that the public is becoming acquainted with these facts and the public opposition to the conscription of youth is demanding that adequate measures be taken to force the industrial giants and the international bankers, many of both of which groups they feel are forcing the issue on conscription, to carry their share of the burden rather than the mothers and youth of America carrying it all.

Well yesterday this tax bill was pushed through. It came out under a rule which was characterized in the press by Chairman SABATH, of the Rules Committee, as the most vicious gag rule upon which he had ever voted and no amendments whatsoever were permitted from the floor. We were given but 2 hours to debate this important measure before it was literally jammed through. Essentially it provides for the repeal of the Vinson-Trammell limitation of profits of 8 percent on aircraft and naval orders and permits industry to amortize plant expansions over a 5-year period. Consequently when, and if, this passes the Senate in this form, there could be no further excuse for delaying industrial rearmament orders. On the other hand, it is estimated that the bill will raise but $300,000,000 this year and perhaps seven hundred million next year and for the next 5 years. All of which is little more than a drop in the bucket when one stops to consider that we have already authorized some fourteen billions as the first expenditure for rearmament.

Aside from that argument, and with reference to the excess-profits tax question. Let me quote from an open letter by one of the members of the Ways and Means Committee: "When the hearings opened 3 weeks ago, we were assured that the administration's objective was to tax excess profits so heavy as to prevent another crop of war millionaires springing up. Practically all are in favor of that, but the bill finally worked out by the Treasury Department will have the very opposite effect, in that 1936, 1937, 1938, and 1939 will be used as the base years on which to figure normal income. That would be fine for United States Steel, General Motors, Chrysler, American Telephone and Telegraph, American Can, and many other industrial giants, all of whom had very satisfactory earnings during the depression years, but it is the little fellow who earned only 3 or 4 percent that will be hit, because everything he makes above those levels from now on will be taxed as excess profits. The big fellows would hardly be touched until their earnings exceed 10 or 12 percent. * * * The international banker continues to have his hooks in everything, but one of these days they are going to be pried loose."

And so, in conclusion, as it applies to you gentlemen in front of me here, let me again stress the fact that America apparently faces a changed world economy from here on. We must face the facts squarely and lay plans as to how best to meet the issue. As Wendell Willkie recently so ably said, and I quote:

"We shall not be able to avoid 'toil and sweat.'

"In these months ahead of us, every man who works in this country—whether he works with his hands or with his mind—will have to work a little harder. Every man and woman will feel the burden of taxes. Every housewife will have to plan a little more carefully. I speak plainly because you must not be deceived about the difficulties of the future. You will have to be hard of muscle, clear of head, brave of heart. * * *

"The only soil in which liberty can grow is that of a united people. We must have faith that the welfare of one is the welfare of all. We must know that the truth can only be reached by the expression of our free opinions, without fear and without rancor. We must acknowledge that all are equal before God and before the law. And we must learn to abhor those disruptive pressures, whether religious, political, or economic, that the enemies of liberty employ."

And so, with those words of wisdom from a truly great American, and the next President of the United States, I bid you goodnight.

Compulsory Military Training

OF

HON. USHER L. BURDICK

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 4, 1940

RESOLUTION OF THE NATIONAL FARMERS' UNION

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution of the National Farmers' Union:

DENVER, COLO., August 24, 1940.

To the Honorable Members of the United States Congress:

The officers and executive board of the National Farmers Union, convened here in our regular quarterly meeting, reiterate the often-expressed opposition of the farmers union to compulsory military training and to the conscription of our young men in time of peace.

We favor adequate preparation for defense and stand ready to offer our lives if necessary in the service of our country and in the defense of our rights and liberties as American citizens. Because we value our liberties and our country's welfare so highly, we are opposed to any measure which we believe would tend to take from us those liberties which we are ready to defend with our lives. We and millions of our loyal American fellow citizens believe that the passage of the Burke-Wadsworth bill would be a long step toward the propagation within our country of the foreign dictatorships against the introduction of which from the outside we are appropriating billions of dollars.

The United States has attained its greatness without the use of compulsory military training or conscription in times of peace. The British Empire has reached the height of its power largely depending upon a volunteer army in times of peace and many times even during war. France, with one of the largest, and according to orthodox standards the best-trained conscripted armies in the history of the world, lasted only a very short time against the impact of the German mechanized forces. There is no inherent advantage in introducing conscription for the military forces of this country if past history is any criterion.

Before adopting conscription we would like you to give thorough consideration to the following questions:

Why not modernize our Army and our voluntary enlistment system?

Why not liberalize the promotion system in the Army so any recruit with ability could climb even to the top of the Army ladder?

Why not do away with the undemocratic advantages given the graduates of our military colleges?

Why not provide men in the ranks with adequate courses to qualify them for commissions and as pilots, instead of restricting commissions and pilot training so largely to that small minority fortunate enough to get 2 or 4 years of college education, on the doubtful theory that a college education is necessary and desirable for a good officer, pilot, or ensign?

Why not increase pay for all ranks and grades to equal the best pay in industry for similar skills?

Why not require all present officers to show that they are alert to 1940 methods of warfare, and not so fossilized as to preclude the recognition of a new age and new methods?

Why reject volunteers because of slight physical defects, when we could remedy those defects at slight governmental expense and benefit both the volunteer and the country?

Why not provide in the Army auxiliary training useful in civilian life, both as a basis for better mechanized soldiers and as an incentive for enlistment equal to that which is inherent in service in the Air Corps and the Navy, whereby their quotas have always been more than filled?

We feel that our Army must be modernized, its enlistment and promotion system rationalized and made more democratic, and the existing law providing for 1-year enlistments enforced, and that if these steps are promptly carried out there would be no shortage of desirable volunteers. We repeat again, we are all agreed as to the necessity of adequate preparations for defense, but we believe that under a liberalized volunteer system, with promotions possible for all regardless of whether or not they are college (or West Point) graduates, there will be as many volunteers offer themselves for military service as it is possible for our factories to equip with 1941 implements of warfare, and more than it will be possible for the officers to properly train and for the Army to properly house. May we add that we certainly do not want our boys crowded into unsanitary and insufficient barracks with all the attendant dangers of epidemics.

We respectfully request you, Senators and Representatives, to give this proposition your most careful consideration before you take the first step toward dictatorship in this country by voting for compulsory military training and service in time of peace.

Stop, reason, consider before you vote in favor of the Burke-Wadsworth bill.

Most respectfully yours,

Officers and Board of the National Farmers' Union, by John Vesecky, president, Salina, Kans.; H. G. Keeney, vice president, Omaha, Nebr.; J. M. Graves, secretary-treasurer, Oklahoma City, Okla.; Geo. A. Nelson, chairman, Board of Directors, Milltown, Wis.; Tom W. Cheek, director, Oklahoma City, Okla.; James G. Patton, director, Denver, Colo.; Glenn J. Talbott, director, Jamestown, N. Dak.; M. F. Dickinson, director, Little Rock, Ark.

Jeffersonian Democrat Says "No" to "Boss" Flynn

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 4, 1940

ARTICLE FROM TYRONE (PA.) DAILY HERALD

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, during the present period of world unrest, people state their opinions in a sincere and frank manner.

This is especially true in the case of the Honorable William Robert Fuoss, of Tyrone, Pa., a noted platform orator and a close student of domestic and international affairs.

Recently, Mr. Fuoss, through the columns of the Tyrone Daily Herald, disclosed the exchange of correspondence between "Boss" Flynn and himself which is of interest to every right-thinking American citizen.

The newspaper article follows:

AUGUST 28, 1940.

Mr. WILLIAM ROBERT FUOSS,

1003 Lincoln Avenue, Tyrone, Pa.

MY DEAR MR. FUOSS: Four years ago your efforts did much to sweep our great leader, Franklin D. Roosevelt, into the White House. This year the cause is even more inspiring. America needs Roosevelt.

I invite you again to carry this message to your fellow citizens. Please fill out the enclosed sheet for the speakers' bureau and send it to me.

With kindest personal regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD J. FLYNN, Chairman.

Mr. Fuoss' reply:

TYRONE, PA., September 2, 1940.

Hon. EDWARD J. FLYNN,

Democratic Chairman, Hotel Biltmore, New York City.

DEAR MR. FLYNN: Thanks for your letter of August 28 in which you invite me to serve during the current Presidential campaign as a party speaker. I cannot do so.

Like thousands of Jeffersonian Democrats who pride themselves in their political independence, I would remind, at the outset, that I approved of much that was done in Mr. Roosevelt's first term; of little in his second. I twice voted for him, but I shall not do so a third time. I know of no good or sufficient reason for any President seeking a third term because we would have no assurances, at the end of the third term, that his highly placed workers, in the Federal service, would not stack again the convention, as they did the most recent one, bringing about a fourth nomination for the ambitious Mr. Roosevelt. Once power is had it is rarely surrendered and it is so easy to increase this power to dangerous dictatorial proportions on the too flimsy pretext that the Executive holds a mandate from the people. It is not, I contend, in the best interests of the whole people to encourage the building of a powerful political dynasty within a democracy. This is fraught with greater danger for a free people than appears on the surface. This Nation is not bereft of potential leadership, outstanding men of inherent strength, indomitable courage, and great vision. The Presidency, moreover, is not the exclusive private property of any man or family, no matter how likable the man or splendid the family.

Moreover, it is difficult for those of my conviction to forget the attempted purge of Senators by Mr. Roosevelt, elective representatives of the people who felt it within their right to exercise that political independence which is a cherished and essential element of democracy. We need this type of Senator. There are already too many "rubber stamps." You may not have detected in this purge attempt the sinister design of the dictator, but thousands of Americans, one such myself, did detect it and were duly alarmed by it. These attempts were despotic and undemocratic, alien to our form of representative government. What is the more, I did not approve of the highjacking of the recent convention, for I regarded this as nonrepresentative of the great rank and file of the party of Jefferson, Jackson, and Wilson. Space does not permit of an enumeration of the astonishing incidents of that convention, the shabby treatment of the venerable CARTER GLASS when he dared place in nomination for the Presidency so able and capable a Democrat as James A. Farley; the even greater disrespect, if possible, shown the candidacy of Senator MILLARD TYDINGS, of Maryland, and the further thought that Speaker BANKHEAD was virtually obliged to forego his commendable Vice-Presidential ambitions for no reason save that Mr. Roosevelt wanted Mr. Wallace.

In his acceptance speech, Mr. Wallace attempts to divert attention from the real issues of this campaign. Fear cannot be substituted for thought and fact. Mr. Hitler's supreme joy is not in contemplation of the defeat of Mr. Roosevelt in November as Mr. Wallace would have us believe; rather, I fancy his supreme joy is in the knowledge that we have had in the White House, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, one who, assuredly knowing the inadequacy of our defensive establishment, particularly our poorly equipped Army, persisted in giving to the world a display of the weak taunting the strong—the spectacle of illy prepared America engaging in a name-calling word battle with the creator and ruthless manipulator of the greatest, most modernized war machine the world has known. With what weapons were we to fight Germany? If it were not so tragic it would be amusing.

I shall, therefore, support Wendell L. Willkie in November. He believes in Jeffersonian principles and will cling to them after his election.

Very truly yours,

WILLIAM ROBERT FUOSS.

Anti-Semitic Groups Circulate False Document

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 29, 1940

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, the United States mails are being extensively used by some anti-Semitic groups in this country who are circulating a document entitled "Special Notice To All Jews," in which they call upon all Jews to refuse to take part in the military service. I want my colleagues and the country to know definitely that this document is an outright forgery, and that its purpose is to stir up anti-Jewish hatred throughout this country. It is not even a clever piece of work. It bears the alleged signature of "Anti-Defamation League, B. B." and then calls upon the recipient of the letter to repudiate the letter itself. It urges Jews not to fight, and yet it urges the draft and the continuance of the war in the Jewish interest.

In other words, it has all the earmarks of that type of contradiction which Mr. Hitler and his cohorts have made familiar to the people of the United States, and the same type of reasoning which has become familiar to Members of Congress through publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I deem it my duty as a Member of Congress to call it to your attention, and denounce it as an out-and-outright asinine and ridiculous forgery.

Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LUTHER PATRICK
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 4, 1940

LETTER FROM MRS. ELIZABETH H. MORROW, OF NORTH BIRMINGHAM, ALA.

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Speaker, this letter from a mother, an Alabama mother whom I know very well, is such a fine and intelligent expression of true Americanism that I feel it deserves a place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of my country.

MUNICIPAL COURT OF BIRMINGHAM,
NORTH BIRMINGHAM BRANCH,
North Birmingham, Ala., August 5, 1940.

Hon. LUTHER PATRICK,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR LUTHER: I am writing you, as I feel that every American mother should, to express my sentiment in regards to the program for training our young people for defense of our country and our way of life.

I know you will remember your contacts with me sufficiently to know I have taken motherhood very seriously, and I adore my boy but am willing for him to have whatever training that may be necessary for his welfare and the defense of our country.

I am writing you this information because I am inclined to believe that those who protest let themselves be heard from but we who are willing are not letting our Representatives know our feelings in the matter.

I also favor what material help we can give England in defending themselves, as it not only helps a Christian nation but helps defend America.

Yours very truly,

ELIZABETH H. MORROW.

W. P. A. Appropriations

OF
HON. THOMAS A. FLAHERTY
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 4, 1940

Mr. FLAHERTY. Mr. Speaker, any effort made under the pressure of partisan politics to reduce the appropriations of the Works Progress Administration, in my judgment, would work a serious detriment not only to the people who have been employed on the many projects sponsored by the W. P. A., but also to the program of national defense which is now under way.

The criticisms directed against the W. P. A. have been, for the most part, of a destructive nature, while a fair and impartial study or investigation of the work done by it since its inception indicates millions of dollars spent without a taint of scandal and other millions of dollars' worth of constructive projects which have added to the wealth of the country.

The W. P. A. from its beginning in October 1932 has constructed thousands of miles of new highways, roads, and streets; thousands of bridges of practically every type have been erected and other thousands of bridges reconditioned. Drainage devices, such as culverts to prevent erosion and subsequent failure of roadbeds, have been built in the thousands. Landing fields, runways, air beacons, aircraft hangars, and hangar aprons, in addition, have been built, thus aiding the national defense and making air travel safer and more efficient.

Almost 60,000 buildings have been either constructed or renovated, and of this great number about 15,000 were built entirely by W. P. A. workers.

They included schools, libraries, recreational buildings, firehouses, garages, aircraft hangars, armories, and various other buildings. And I know you will be interested to learn that of the institutional buildings erected over a hundred were new hospital buildings of sizes ranging from those of 10 or 20 beds for small towns and rural communities to hospital groups of a thousand or more beds for large cities, while improvements were made in 1934 to other hospital buildings.

It is estimated almost 2,000,000 acres of irrigated lands were affected by the reconditioning of miles of canals, and facilities for the prevention of forest fires have been increased by the construction of fire and forest trails.

Many projects were designed solely to employ women and other persons not readily adaptable to heavy construction work and have served the double purpose of producing goods and materials for distribution and rendering service to the needy. Let me be specific: By October 1, 1937, women workers on sewing projects had made nearly 108,000,000 articles, more than 85,000,000 of which were garments. Other articles produced on these projects included bed clothing, towels, mattresses, rugs, dressings, and hospital supplies.

Projects devoted to the distribution to needy persons of food have handled up to 60,000,000 quarts of milk and over a half billion pounds of other food stuffs. Workers on canning projects canned 45,000,000 pounds of meat, fruit, and vegetables, part of which the workers themselves used—the balance being distributed among needy persons.

Shoe and furniture repair projects collected worn articles, repaired 600,000 pairs of shoes and over 700,000 piece of furniture which were subsequently used by persons on relief.

In addition, more than 128,000,000 hot lunches were provided to school children since the beginning of W. P. A. activities. Over 700 nursing schools were established and blind persons received over a million pages of Braille and over 40,000 Braille maps, while over 18,000,000 books were cataloged for existing libraries and nearly 30,000,000 public-school library books and others were rebound or renovated.

This is not, as the opponents of the W. P. A. would have you believe, money thrown down the drain, but capital assets created by the money of all the people of the Nation which provided employment for thousands, aided private enterprise, and increased national wealth.

I have consistently opposed every attempt to reduce the W. P. A. appropriations. I represent a heavy industrialized district that requires and knows the benefits of W. P. A. work as much, if not more, than any other section of the country and that is why I have consistently fought every effort to reduce expenditures of this kind, which I regard not as spending but as the creation of public wealth and the employment of thousands of unemployed for the purpose of so doing.

In 1939 I supported the Casey amendment which would have eliminated the 30-day furlough provision, the amendment which provided for 30-day furloughs of W. P. A. workers after 18 months' consecutive employment. This amendment was lost but I still feel that it was lost because those who voted against it have never stopped to realize the tremendous good that the W. P. A. has done and is doing for the country. For how can it be reasonably or truthfully said that the dollars spent on great public works, the miles of new highways, the new public buildings and schools and the hospitals, were ill spent?

In addition to that, it kept men working who, through no fault of their own, found themselves unemployed because of the collapse of an economic system in which their overlords had placed a misguided confidence. I do not say that the W. P. A. has been the answer to unemployment, but I do say that the psychology, the attitude, and the mental outlook of the American people as a result of the W. P. A. is a whole lot better than it was before the W. P. A. came into being.

My record on this great achievement of the Roosevelt administration is clear and I shall continue to vote for funds to be appropriated for the W. P. A. as long as they are needed, as a vote for the continuation of an administrative method that has done away with the necessity of the dole, giving millions of Americans not only in my district but in every congressional district throughout this country useful work and, in addition, has created great new assets to the public wealth. As I have said before, I have consistently opposed all attempts to reduce appropriations made for the W. P. A. and I shall continue to do so for the reasons I have briefly stated here today.

Journalistic Gossip in the Congressional Record

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 5 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

LETTER FROM AMBASSADOR BULLITT

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a copy of a letter addressed to Mrs. Genevieve Clark Thomson by Ambassador Bullitt in reply to a letter from her to him regarding the matter involved in certain articles heretofore inserted in the RECORD by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] touching Ambassador Bullitt's speech in Philadelphia.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I join with that a request that I be permitted to insert in the RECORD a letter which Mrs. Thomson will write Mr. Bullitt, or a letter which I will write.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think the letter ought to be presented when it is written. It has not yet been written.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I assure the Senator from Kentucky that if Mrs. Thomson does not write Mr. Bullitt a letter, I will.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHWARTZ in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky? The Chair hears none.

The letter is as follows:

AUGUST 26, 1940.

MRS. GENEVIEVE CLARK THOMSON,
The Item-Tribune, New Orleans, La.

MY DEAR MRS. THOMSON: I thank you most heartily for your letter of August 22. I appreciate its spirit and your feelings when you write: "I have more sympathy than you might suppose with your irritation at what you consider unfairness on the part of the press. My father was long in public life, and my brother, as you know, is now in the Senate. And I am frank to say that I have at times been greatly irked by published criticism of them which I thought unfair."

Your father was certainly most bitterly and unfairly criticized, and I for one resented the unjust criticisms. I have no doubt that your brother also has been the subject of unfair criticism. That is what one has to expect in public life, and when such criticisms are directed at me I try to remember that an essential part of the free political life of this Nation is the complete freedom of the press. I would rather have American journalists free to write what they please, however unfairly they may criticize me, than the slightest restriction on their freedom.

Personally, I have been the subject of so many stories that in one way or another were inaccurate that I have given up trying to correct stories—especially those in the so-called gossip columns—unless they seem to affect directly the public interest. I believe, however, that when an article is inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD it becomes an official record of such importance that it must be corrected if it contains misstatements. That is why I wrote to your brother and requested him to have my corrections of your article in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD also published in the RECORD.

I am grateful to you for calling to my attention an allegation of which I was unaware, since I was absent from the United States when it was made. I shall attempt to inform you with regard to that allegation, as well as others which I have found in the RECORD.

1. As authority for your first statement to which I took exception, you give an article in the Merry-Go-Round, by Drew Pearson and Robert S. Allen. As I informed you, this article by Pearson and Allen was totally without foundation in fact. With regard to it, I wrote the following letter to Mr. Pearson:

"JULY 31, 1940.

"The President and I think you might be interested to know that the informant responsible for your article which appeared in the Monday morning papers (July 29) took you for a ride.

"Not only did I not rewrite the statement criticizing Soviet Russia's seizure of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia, but also I did not even discuss this matter with the President, and I did not know that such a statement was to be made. The salient points of the statement were read to the President by the Under Secretary of State over the telephone when I was out swimming.

"The statement that 'the State Department knows no more about it (Bullitt's last days in Paris and Vichy) than the interviews which its Ambassador gives to the press,' is equally remote from the truth.

"On my arrival in Washington on Sunday afternoon, I attempted to reach various ranking members of the Department of State and was able to find the political adviser to the Secretary, Mr. Hornbeck, and had a long talk with him before going to the White House. On my return to Washington, I was able to see immediately the counselor to the Department, the political adviser to the Secretary, Mr. Dunn, and the economic adviser, Mr. Feis. I found that all the Assistant Secretaries were out of town. I requested an interview with Mr. Welles but his engagement book was filled for Saturday.

"When your article appeared, therefore, the State Department had full information with regard to my views on the situation in France.

"I think you ought to have your fingers crossed in the future with regard to information coming from the source that gave you this tale."

Upon receipt of my letter, Mr. Pearson telephoned to me and said that he had already been informed by the Acting Secretary of State, Mr. Welles, that his story was totally without foundation in fact. He added that he regretted greatly that he had published it.

2. I am most grateful to you for calling to my attention the statements by Senator NYE in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of volume 86, No. 124, for Friday, June 21, 1940. As I was in France, I had never seen any report that indicated that such statements had been made.

The first statement which Senator NYE quoted is one written by a newspaperman stating that:

"It is already known that Bullitt promised the French that the United States would get into the war, if necessary, to defeat Hitler."

This is the exact contrary of the truth. Both before the present war began and after I consistently stated to the French that the United States would not enter this war.

The second statement by Senator NYE is the following:

"An individual whom I shall under no circumstances compromise came to my office and wrote a memorandum. I could not doubt this man for one minute. In his memorandum he said 'it was known that France might definitely give in within 10 days, and that when it did the Government of France would release a letter from Bullitt, written on orders of Roosevelt, to Daladier, dated last August or September, stating the full support of the United States if it went to war against Germany on the basis of the Polish incident.'"

The assertion in this anonymous memorandum quoted by Senator NYE is totally and completely untrue. No such letter was ever written by me to anyone.

The anonymous person who wrote the memorandum for Senator NYE may have done so in good faith, or not in good faith, but his assertion was without the slightest foundation in fact. No such letter exists, but many documents exist which prove that the assertion in the anonymous memorandum is the exact reverse of the truth.

3. You quote another article by Messrs. Alsop and Kintner as your authority for your statement that, "He actually sat in the French Cabinet meetings."

I repeat that on no occasion have I ever "sat in the French Cabinet meetings," nor have I ever "sat occasionally as an unofficial Cabinet minister."

It is, of course, a fact that like all other ambassadors, in carrying out my normal duties as American Ambassador in Paris, I conducted many negotiations with members of the French Government, and it is equally true that these negotiations were invariably conducted on both sides in the most friendly manner. But there is a vast difference between sitting officially or unofficially as a Cabinet minister and maintaining negotiations between independent governments on a most friendly plane. I think that you will agree with me that your statement that I "actually sat in the French Cabinet meetings" puts the fact that our relations with the French Republic were most friendly, in an entirely false light.

4. I concur most heartily in your profound respect for the patriotism, intelligence, and integrity of Secretary Hull. I can assure you that I have never disobeyed any order from him, and that our relations are most intimate and friendly. With regard to the matter to which you refer—I could not, of course, disobey an order which I never received. Any statement in any newspaper indicating that I did receive an order to leave Paris was untrue.

5. Pearson and Allen are also given as authorities for your statement: "Without reporting to his supposed chiefs in the State Department he went straight to the President. It is reported that the State Department is still as much in the dark as the general public, regarding the events leading to and surrounding the death of the French Republic."

The answer to this misstatement is given in my letter to Mr. Pearson quoted above, as well as in my previous letter to you.

6. Another article by Alsop and Kintner is given as authority for your statement with regard to my urging the release of funds deposited here by the French Republic. I can only repeat that I have never urged the release of the funds in question. I may add that the Secretary of the Treasury and I are in entire agreement on this matter.

Before receiving your suggstion that I should take up these matters with Messrs. Pearson and Allen, and Messrs. Alsop and Kintner, I had already done so, not only by my letter to Mr. Pearson but also by personal conversations with Mr. Pearson, Mr. Allen, and Mr. Alsop. I think there is no doubt now in the mind of any of them, with regard to the truth.

It is, of course, difficult for journalists attempting to give "inside information" from Washington, to avoid errors. They are frequently misled by persons who have some ax to grind and pretend to know things they do not know. I think, however, that it is only fair to say that the gentlemen in question do their best to be accurate.

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I find also a reference by your brother, Senator BENNETT CHAMP CLARK, to a speech of mine at Bordeaux. That speech was correctly reported in every French newspaper except one and by all the American press services except one. The French journalist of the one French newspaper which reported my speech incorrectly was not present when I spoke. He did not take the trouble either to listen to my speech or obtain a copy of it. Unfortunately, he happened to be the local correspondent of one of the great American agencies. He wrote a sensational and utterly untrue story which can be compared by anyone interested with the text of the speech I made, which was a written text and was reproduced by every other French newspaper and by the other American news agencies. The agency in question later withdrew the story, and I am in possession of an affidavit from the American head of the agency in question in Paris attesting to these facts.

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 19, 1940, there is another statement which merits correction. Senator WHEELER stated with regard to myself: "He predicted that his friend Molotoff would come in on the side of Britain and France. When talking with Daladier and others in France, he constantly talked about his 'friend Molotoff.'"

These statements are the exact contrary of the truth. Throughout last year I constantly expressed the opinion that the Soviet Union would make a deal with Germany and would not come in on the side of Britain and France. This may be proved from a large number of official documents. Never in my life have I referred to "my friend Molotov." Molotov had little or nothing to do with foreign affairs when I was Ambassador to the Soviet Union, and I knew him so slightly that during my entire stay in the Soviet Union I had but one important conversation with him.

In this day when there is a threat to our country, I feel that it is vitally important that all leaders of public opinion should attempt to stick as closely to fact as possible and, in their differences of opinion, should avoid the imputation of low motives. This is a time when it is again true that "if we don't all hang together, we shall all hang separately."

I believe, therefore, that it is unwise to publish articles in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that are based on nothing more than journalistic gossip. But so long as corrections also are published in the RECORD there is doubtless little harm done.

There are questions of the utmost gravity to our country to be discussed and no one can object to honest disagreement and honest discussion, but I am sure you will agree with me that this is a time for scrupulous fairness between Americans.

Again my thanks for your letter and for this opportunity to give you the facts.

Yours very sincerely,

WILLIAM C. BULLITT.

Takes Exception to Editorial About Criticism of Willkie Speech

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 5 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

LETTER BY SECRETARY ICKES TO NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter written by Hon. Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior, to the editor of the New York Times. In his letter Secretary Ickes takes exception to an editorial in reference to his criticism of Mr. Willkie's speech.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times]

SECRETARY ICKES REPLIES—HE TAKES EXCEPTION TO EDITORIAL ABOUT HIS CRITICISM OF WILLKIE'S SPEECH

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

In the fashion that is characteristic of the New York Times you reproved me in a recent editorial for "throwing mud" at Wendell Willkie in my comments, on August 19, upon his speech of acceptance. You contrasted certain expressions that I used with Mr. Willkie's generous language about Henry Wallace when Mr. Willkie was in Des Moines, Iowa. You overlooked the fact that in several instances I complimented Mr. Willkie on points which I considered well stated.

Far more important, you chose to ignore Mr. Willkie's aspersions upon President Roosevelt in his speech of acceptance. May I remind you that Mr. Willkie accused the President of "unscrupulously" encouraging Great Britain to hope for more help than this country could give? He also accused him of inventing war scares for selfish political purposes and of manufacturing war panics. These charges were not only serious, they were highly personal.

These accusations against the President whom, whether we approve of him or not, we will have to follow during this grave international crisis, at least until January 20 next, were sufficiently grave to call for some comment from a newspaper that is so ready to point out supposed chinks in the armor of a man who does not conveniently come to heel whenever he is whistled thereto. On a purely comparative basis, even if I offended to the extent that you would have people believe, the offense of Mr. Willkie against the President far exceeded mine.

MR. ICKES DISSENTS

Perhaps you have sternly taken Mr. Willkie to task for his inappropriate and unpatriotic language; but, if so, I have overlooked it. Perhaps others of the press have likewise chided Mr. Willkie, but, if so, they have been few and far between. However, as was to be expected, practically the whole pack has been yelping at my heels ever since I failed to join in the general acclaim that Mr. Willkie was conceived in the womb of time so as to be the combination of George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson, and Abraham Lincoln that would be needed in this year of travail for America. Yet, presumptuous though you may regard it, I have the temerity to question the right of any fair commentator to write about my speech of August 19 as you did in the editorial referred to.

The New York Times has a great reverence for precedent and old-established customs. I share this feeling if the customs in question are a strength to us in our hours of need. I even reverence customs of and for themselves simply because they are customs, if adherence to them is not a disadvantage or a danger to us.

Take the custom of the acceptance speech. Except in the case of that former Wall Street candidate, John W. Davis, I wonder if the Times can cite any instance where the acceptance speech of one running for President has been given in any other than his local vicinage or before the convention that had made the nomination? Mr. Willkie has lived for a number of years in New York City. The fact that he proposed to give his acceptance speech in Indiana, where he was born and lived a long time ago, was a matter of news. It was a matter of significant news, calling for comment, in addition to stories in the news columns. Yet the whole matter was passed over by the press as if it were a usual and customary thing.

THE QUESTION OF RESIDENCE

The reason for Mr. Willkie's going to Indiana for his acceptance speech was perfectly clear. He wanted to get away from his New York setting. He did not desire to be associated in the mind of the people either with Wall Street or with Fifth Avenue. Yet practically all of the newspapers, including the New York Times, were ready to aid him in what amounted to a deceit upon the people. You were willing that he should set up props as a background for this speech which would give the voters an altogether erroneous impression.

It was my purpose in my speech to penetrate through the fog of deceit and hypocrisy for which Mr. Willkie and the newspapers were responsible. In doing this I was well within the bounds of reasonable and legitimate political controversy. Mr. Willkie, with your aid, was trying to give the impression that he was a simple man of the people who still lived in his barefoot-boy environment.

I chose to point out that Mr. Willkie's actual residence was at 1010 Fifth Avenue, New York City. I chose to dispel in the minds of my hearers this barefoot-boy illusion; to remind them that Mr. Willkie is, in fact, a New Yorker, since it is in that city that he has for many years conducted his operations in high finance and public-utility management.

Mr. Roosevelt does have a house in a New York neighborhood, as you say. Significantly, however, you do not disclose that his voting residence and customary home has been at Hyde Park, N. Y., for many, many years. If Mr. Roosevelt had not accepted his nominations in a straightforward and simple manner before the conventions that nominated him, he would, naturally, have accepted them at Hyde Park. If you were trying to infer that Mr. Willkie was justified in not accepting his nomination at 1010 Fifth Avenue because Mr. Roosevelt had not accepted his in the same city, then, at the very least, you were being disingenuous.

THE CHALLENGE TO DEBATE

In an editorial published August 18, almost a column in length, although you uttered no word of criticism of Mr. Willkie's outrageous characterizations of the President the preceding Saturday afternoon, you did comment approvingly upon Mr. Willkie's proposal to meet the President on the platform "in the tradition of face-to-face debate that is justly honored among our political traditions."

Let us examine this glib statement. What about this "tradition of face-to-face debate"? For one I would like to know where and when it originated, especially with respect to the Presidential office, and who have contributed to its upbuilding? When this question is asked we are told about Lincoln and Douglas. Mr. Willkie subsequently added Webster to the list without specifications. Lincoln did debate with Douglas when both were running for Senator from the State of Illinois, but as a candidate for President, Lincoln did not debate with his opponent on either occasion, nor has any other candidate for President before or since, so far as I can remember. Do you remember any such instance? And, if not, where do you get your "tradition of face-to-face debate that is justly honored among our political traditions"?

In my own experience I have known of many challenges from one candidate to another to debate, but of very, very few acceptances. Frequently the man who does the challenging is sure in advance that his proposal will not be accepted. That is the reason that he issues the challenge. He hopes for some advantage from the declination. In this connection, may I remind you that the President said in his message of acceptance to the Chicago convention that he would do no campaigning? Can it be that this clear advance knowledge made Mr. Willkie so bold?

A MATTER OF TASTE

No candid mind can dismiss lightly the thought that, in challenging the President, Mr. Willkie was guilty of a trick which is well recognized among lawyers and which has a particular characterization that carries an unpleasant taste. No one can convince me that the New York Times when it printed this editorial believed or now believes that if President Roosevelt should accept Mr. Willkie's challenge to debate, it would be in "the tradition * * * that is justly honored among our American traditions."

I think that this offense against good taste on the part of Mr. Willkie showed his willingness to descend to pretty low levels. But not low enough to call for a rebuke from the New York Times. Personally, I do not recall any instance in which two candidates for President have met in joint debate, and certainly the record does not show any occasion on which the incumbent of our highest office joined in joint debate with a challenger. Do you happen to? I will be glad to be corrected if I am in error, because, frankly, I am relying entirely upon memory.

One thing is quite clear from the editorials so far printed in the New York Times, and that is that it is willing to lend the cloak of its somewhat frayed respectability to any ill-smelling or pettifogging political enterprise that will mean votes against President Roosevelt.

HAROLD L. ICKES,
Secretary of the Interior.

WASHINGTON, August 27, 1940.

National Association of Rural Letter Carriers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 5 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. SMITH W. PURDUM

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Hon. Smith W. Purdum, Second Assistant Postmaster General, at the annual convention of the National Association of Rural Letter Carriers, at St. Louis, Mo., on August 21, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Chairman Benson, Congressman ROMJUE, reverend clergy, distinguished guests, ladies, and gentlemen, it makes me very happy, indeed, to be able to be with you this evening. I consider it not only a pleasure but also an honor. I want to express my sincere gratitude for the very kind invitation extended me by your national president, Mr. Raymond H. Combs, and his colleagues and coworkers to attend this national convention of the National Association of Rural Letter Carriers and the Ladies' Auxiliary.

It is always with great pleasure that I anticipate a visit to St. Louis, a most splendid city, having a fine and efficient postal service, which is so ably conducted by that man whom we highly regard and dearly love, Hon. W. Rufus Jackson.

Down through the years it has been my good fortune to attend some of the conventions of your State associations, but this is the first opportunity afforded me to attend your national convention. I am very grateful that this opportunity was afforded me to be here.

We are gathered here in this great city of St. Louis at one of the most momentous and critical stages in world and, in fact, American history. It is for that reason that I believe that this 1940 convention of the National Association of Rural Letter Carriers may well be termed the most important and significant in the history of your association. Postal service has rightfully been termed the mightiest of all implements of human democracy, and you good men and women are gathered here today as devoted public servants in the service of the United States Post Office Department. I doubt if there can be found anywhere in this great Nation a more representative group of upstanding American citizens than is here in this convention hall tonight.

For nearly 40 years I have taken an interest in the rural delivery service of the Post Office Department. Since becoming Second Assistant Postmaster General I have a very particular interest—official and personal—in the rural delivery service, and the men and women who are doing the work. So tonight I keenly appreciate the fact that I can stand here and look into the faces of the men and women who work with me and with my associates in a sincere effort to serve faithfully and well.

When I was appointed to the office of Second Assistant Postmaster General it made me very happy to be directly connected with one of the most far-reaching and beneficial activities of our great postal establishment—the Rural Delivery Service. When sitting in the chair at my desk I constantly keep in my mind the fact that that chair has been occupied by such splendid and intelligent and humane officials in the persons of William W. Howes, and Harllee Branch, and Ambrose O'Connell. Many of you men and women here personally know those gentlemen; and I feel that you hold them in the same high regard as I do; those men were able administrators and had a humane understanding. They have been helpful to me, for which I am very grateful.

You have a very splendid organization, one in which you can rightfully take great pride.

The officials of the National Organization of Rural Letter Carriers and of the ladies' auxiliary are a splendid lot of men and women who are devoted to their duties, and who put forth intelligent effort not only in your behalf but also to improve the service to the people. These men and women are very helpful to us at the Department and our relations are very pleasant, and we appreciate the cooperation and assistance given us.

At this juncture I want to pay tribute especially to the head of your organization—a man devoted to the duties of his office, a man who fully realizes and appreciates his responsibilities, a man who is always courteous and considerate and wants the right to prevail; for him I have high regard and affection, and it gives me great pleasure to be here tonight and pay tribute to my good friend Raymond H. Combs.

There is also an added pleasure to be here with two good farmer friends of mine. These are plain persons, direct in their dealing—there is elegance in their simplicity, courteous and kind and spreaders of good cheer—the publishers of your splendid national organ, The National Rural Letter Carrier, our mutual friends, Martha and Cleland McDevitt—Martha and Mac.

One's coworkers in a bureau are very important factors in administration. I have stated that when I entered upon my present duties, it made me very happy to be directly connected with the Rural Delivery Service, and it was especially pleasing to me to find the supervising head of the Division of Rural Delivery Service a man who enjoyed the experience of having been a rural letter carrier, who knows the problems of the Rural Delivery Service, and who knows in a minute degree our responsibilities to the public; one who has reflected great credit on the Service, a fair man, a courteous gentleman, a loyal public servant, your friend my good friend and able coworker, J. Ed Cooper.

The Rural Delivery Service was inaugurated as an experiment in 1896 during the second administration of President Grover Cleveland, at which time the Honorable William L. Wilson, of West Virginia, was Postmaster General. I believe that the first appropriation authorizing the Service was secured through the untiring efforts of Hon. Thomas E. Watson, who was at that time a Member of Congress from the State of Georgia.

The first rural routes were established from Charles Town, Uvilla, and Halltown, W. Va., and they began operation on October 1, 1896. In the beginning there was considerable opposition to the establishment of this service from many sincere lawmakers, who regarded it as fantastic in the extreme and who felt that the cost would be out of all proportion to the benefits derived. It is said that one distinguished legislator observed that to provide free mail delivery to the rural districts would greatly embarrass the Government financially. Many country merchants were opposed to it because they feared the loss of business to mail-order houses, and postmasters at many small offices were apprehensive that their offices would be discontinued and their earnings adversely affected. These objections were no doubt factors accounting for the very frugal manner in which the service was administered in the early days, although they were soon overcome, for the people in the rural sections of our country insisted that this service be extended to them.

From a modest beginning, with three routes established in the State of West Virginia on October 1, 1896, the service has extended and grown until at the end of the last fiscal year there were in operation 32,646 routes, serving approximately 7,000,000 families. During the same period salaries of the carriers have been advanced from $200 per year to an average of $2,021 per annum.

Although the rural service is now costing in excess of $91,000,000 a year, no one would be so reckless as to declare that it should be abandoned or curtailed. As a matter of fact, the annual cost of operating the Rural Delivery Service is now more than $2,000,000 less than it was when Mr. Farley assumed the office of Postmaster General in 1933, while at the same time rural mail carriers are now serving 3,000,000 more persons than they did in 1933. In that year rural carriers provided service to 25,713,000 people while at the close of the last fiscal year there were 28,974,000 receiving this service.

The aggregate length of rural routes in the United States is now at an all-time high, amounting to 1,401,690 miles at the close of the fiscal year ended June 30, 1940.

To my mind it is one of the most appreciated and indispensable branches of the Postal Service.

Having been born and reared on a farm, it is but natural that I should be deeply sympathetic with every plan and every movement which tends to elevate and improve country life. Many of you men and women here tonight had not seen the light of day in the early period in the history of the Rural Delivery Service and perhaps are not familiar as to the work and manner in which rural routes were laid out in those days, especially in the mountainous sections of some of the States in our country. Many of these routes were laid out by agents of the Department who rode on horseback, carrying a board to which drawing paper was attached, in the crutch of their arms. The agent also carried a compass and as he rode along the road, he would sketch the line of travel and note the houses on the paper. In many sections there were no milestones or mile posts along the roads. The distances would be estimated by the agent after having traveled on his horse a known mile, and in timing the horse at a regular gait in covering that mile. Many years ago, I had considerable actual experience in laying rural delivery routes, on horseback.

At that time in many sections of the country, especially throughout the mountainous regions, in going over a route 20 to 25 miles in length one would find scarcely more than two or three families who received daily newspapers, but a very short time would elapse following the establishment of the service before the greater part of the families in the territory served would be receiving daily newspapers and other publications. And to suggest to them a withdrawal of such service would bring violent protest. In fact, I recall an instance down in the mountain country of Virginia where one of the farmers said, "If anyone should attempt to take this service away from us, we surely would oil up our shotguns." So, today, my friends, if one observes carefully, he will find that the people in the rural sections of our country, on the farms and in the hamlets, are just as well read and well versed in current affairs as those residing in the large cities, and I believe in many instances they are more so.

The duty of each and every rural carrier is a very important one. We should think from day to day of its great importance to our people and to our Government. In the performance of your official duties, you come in daily personal contact with many men, women, and children. It is therefore incumbent upon each carrier to render the very best possible service, to be courteous, and to be careful at all times in speech and action.

These men, women, and children on your respective routes place an evaluation upon you, so do your duty and conduct yourselves to the end that this evaluation may be a high one. By giving to them the best you have, it will redound to your credit and to the credit of our Government. In no wise do I attempt to make any criticism, for in this great army of men and women who are carrying the mail on our highways the transgressors in your body personnel are very few indeed. I regard you as a most splendid lot of men and women, who have pride in home and family and respect for the Divine Providence, and who are intensely loyal to our Government and its institutions. Let these attributes continue with you in every moment of your lives. The reward will be yours while you live, and, when you are no more, your children and children's children will revere their memory of you with the highest respect.

At this period more than any other time during my travel along the highway of life I believe it is more incumbent upon you and upon me to appreciate in the very highest degree the privileges we have in living in America, in the greatest country and under the most humane and just Government in the world.

The postal establishment is one of the strong arms of the executive branch of the National Government. It is more closely related with the daily lives of our citizens than any other governmental activity. Therefore, it must be a service of integrity and high character. Our founding fathers in article 1, section 8, of the Constitution, said that the Congress shall have the power to establish post offices and post roads. All down through the years, regardless of administration, the Congress has been jealous of that prerogative granted in the Constitution and has seen to it that the growth and development of the Postal Service keep pace with the growth and development of our country. Yes, in some instances, has even gone further. It has blazed the trail, it has pioneered through legislation and appropriation. The framers of the Constitution were men of great vision and saw in the distant future a mighty Nation and realized the vital importance that the postal establishment would have in connection with the daily lives of the people. We should all realize that we have no authority except that which comes to us from the Congress, who are the direct representatives of the people and that we are the people's servants. If we constantly bear those thoughts in mind and perform our work as we should, we will have the approval of our fellow man, of the Congress of the United States, of our Postmaster General, and of our President.

To you men and women here and those carriers who were unable to attend this convention, I express my sincere appreciation for the splendid assistance and valuable cooperation that have been given me. My friends, no man and no woman stands of himself or herself alone. Without the help of our fellow men, not a single person could progress very far. I want to take this opportunity to testify to the positive fact that any success which may have come to me in my work all down through the years, has not been due to my efforts alone, not by far, for it is a great pleasure for me to state that I have always had cooperation from the postmasters, the rural carriers, and all those employed in the various branches of the postal establishment, in the field, and at the Department. I have found that practically every man and every woman is honest and that if you will treat them fairly you will get like treatment in return. So I am grateful for your help and for the help of others.

At this juncture I wish to make reference to those very important committees—the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of the United States Senate. Both the majority and the minority members of those committees in the House and in the Senate are able and sincere. Their tasks are heavy; those men appreciate their great responsibility to the Postal Service and to the public. All the members of those committees have been considerate of and helpful to me in my work, for which I am very grateful.

The chairman of the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads labors diligently and intelligently in the handling of the work of his committee. He is a deep student of the Postal Service in all of its branches and activities; he is highly informed as to its operation, needs, and responsibilities; he is a great friend of the Service. I consider it an honor to enjoy his friendship and assistance; one of Tennessee's great men, who is personally known to thousands of men, women, and children throughout that splendid Commonwealth, its senior Senator, Hon. KENNETH MCKELLAR.

There is another man who, with the exception of our Postmaster General, is personally acquainted with as many postal employees I believe, as any man in the United States. This man is now in the United States Senate and is a member of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. For many years he served as chairman of that committee in the House of Representatives, performing his duties ably and intelligently and with a keen and thorough understanding of the Postal Service. I am very grateful for the assistance so freely given me in my work by that splendid man, the junior Senator from the great State of New York, Hon. JAMES M. MEAD.

My friends, there is another to whom I am very happy to make reference. It is almost like home to me to be here tonight in his State—the great State of Missouri. Hardly a week passes that we, in the Department, do not have personal contact and business transactions with this man. It is always a sincere pleasure for me when he comes into my office, or when I go into his office; he knows the Postal Service; he knows the postal employees—their duties, responsibilities, and problems; he knows our duty to the public, all of which is so clearly shown in his work as chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads in the House of Representatives. I am deeply grateful for the assistance and cooperation given me by that splendid son of Missouri, Hon. MILTON ANDREW ROMJUE.

My friends, the postal establishment of our country is in a high state of efficiency. The postal revenues for the past fiscal year were greater than ever before in its history, being $766,000,000. There is good feeling and splendid cooperation all down the line throughout the length and breadth of the Service; and, in this connection, I think it is proper to say that no great organization of any kind can be truly successful and highly efficient unless it has an able and understanding directing head. We have been extremely fortunate, and are fortunate at this particular moment, in having at the head of this great agency of Government, the Post Office Department, a man of splendid administrative ability, a man of humane understanding, and a man whose daily walk of official life is along the pathway of right and duty; he believes in the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God. I am grateful indeed to have been afforded an opportunity to share in an administrative capacity under the direction and leadership of a great Postmaster General, a great and true American, Hon. James A. Farley.

My friends, we Americans have a blessed and priceless heritage which has been handed down through generations to us by our forefathers. That heritage grows of greater value from day to day. We must not for one moment be unmindful of those brave men and women in this country who builded for us. They builded wisely and well and today we enjoy the benefits of their wisdom and the fruits of their labors. Let us not surrender one iota of that heritage. Let us not surrender one iota of our right to live the American way. Let us not grow passive for a moment. In realizing our responsibilities to protect our country and its institutions, there is no room in America for any ism except one ism, and that is Americanism. Every inch of our land is dear to us. There is not an inch of our land to hold the foot of the aggressor; and when we leave here and go to our respective homes and we may be sitting on the porch, under the shade tree, or wherever we may be, let us utter that solemn prayer, "God bless America, my home, sweet home."

Situation in the East

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 5 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE FROM NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article appearing in the New York Times of September 1, 1940, entitled "Situation in East," by Maj. Gen. William C. Rivers.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of September 1, 1940]

SITUATION IN EAST—WE ARE ACCUSED OF IGNORING SOME PRACTICABILITIES

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

Admiral Stirling, now retired, an authority on the Far East, writes in the New York Times: 'It seems evident that unless the United States and Japan can compose their ever-mounting differences, the war in the Pacific, long prophesied, is inevitable." And, "Japan's naval advantage over us lies principally in having her fleet concentrated where she has decided all her wars will be fought—in the Orient, where Japan has many outlying island bases to aid her defense." Admiral Stirling says also that a Japanese-American war would be a naval war, fought mostly in the Orient, and furthermore that the United States would have an initial disadvantage, but not necessarily a fatal one.

Given the distances across the Pacific, the shape of the curved coastline of northeastern Asia and the location of Japan—and of her encircling chains of defensive islands running from the Arctic to the Equator—I doubt that the United States could fight a successful war with Japan and defend the Philippines 7,250 miles from our west coast and 5,000 miles west of our nearest base at Hawaii. A war of attrition could be fought for a number of years, but a war which brought definite conclusions could hardly be fought over such distances.

MANY SHIPS NEEDED

To calculate the number of merchant ships that would be needed to accompany or follow the fleet would stagger the imagination. It would much exceed the number of merchant ships in all our foreign service. Building a fortified base at Guam would take several years and cost far more than our total stake in the Far East, including American investments in Netherlands East Indies, the Philippines, and China. A base at Guam, in the midst of so many Japanese islands, could not be made tenable.

Two illusions often creep into discussions about the Far East. One is that a base can be made at Guam to maintain communication with the Philippines. Congress can in reality make at Guam only a distant and lonely, untenable salient. Another illusion is concerning Singapore and the aid of the British Fleet. We are all aware that Britain has had no battleships east of the Mediterranean since the bomb explosion at Agadir in 1911—and the conferences about Morocco.

Then there is the grand new war scare—that we actually haul tin and rubber from the Dutch East Indies. We buy rubber from men who have stocks of it at Singapore and elsewhere. Tin we buy from people who have smelters mostly in western Europe. But we could send steamers actually to haul tin and rubber from Java—by way of the Atlantic, and without the need of leaping Japan.

ADMIRAL LEAHY'S OPINION

Admiral William D. Leahy gave to the committees of Congress 2 years ago his judgment in the most thorough discussion of the North Pacific Ocean we have had in 40 years. His opinion was definite and emphatic, as follows: "The Navy which America now has, and the Navy which it will have when it is increased by the authority in this bill will be seriously inadequate to the task of sending a naval force to the Philippines. I said it would require at least 3 times this amount of increase of our Navy, and I doubt if we could (send a naval force to the Philippines) with 3 times the increase."

The admiral said also: "The defensive line of the American Navy at the present time reaches from the Aleutian Islands to the Hawaiian Islands, to Samoa and to the Panama Canal."

The following brief quotations are from Professor Griswold's able article in Harper's for August, on Our Policy in the Far East: "We have failed, as a people and a Nation, to discover in the Far East a region of vital interest to our strategic security and domestic welfare," And, "Geography is perhaps the strongest deterministic agent in international relations."

Dr. Griswold believes there is reason for trying to improve our relations with Japan. Also, that there exists a reasonable basis for such action.

NEW TREATY ADVISED

My own conviction is—after 10 consecutive years' service with the Philippine Government—that we ought to make with Japan a new treaty of trade and friendship. That the treaty should contain clauses indicating Japan's interest in the continued independence of the Philippines after 1946. Japan will not try to annex the republic of the Philippines. She will not make a division of her fleet and armies with Soviet Russia so near at the north. Many Japanese have left the Philippines to return to Japan since the start of the war in China. In any event, Japan will have much of the trade with the Philippines. Japan has not the power or the desire to attack the United States. The distances are too great.

I hope the Filipinos will obtain the independence they have so long desired and which we have so long promised them. I have affection and admiration for the Filipino people. But their country is too far from my country for continued political relations. The inevitable logic of geography is that we should control from the mid-Atlantic westward to the mid-Pacific, a matter of great expense. If we endeavor to maintain a Navy large enough to try to defend the indefensible Philippines, and to aid the defense of South America, it will fetch financial ruin to my own country.

Statements to the effect that the Filipinos no longer desire independence are erroneous. They are, I believe, put out by people who desire our permanent control of and responsibility for the distant Philippines.

Major General, United States Army, Retired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. D. WORTH CLARK
OF IDAHO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 5 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM SATURDAY EVENING POST

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a brilliant, and to my mind conclusive, editorial appearing in the Saturday Evening Post of September 7, 1940, entitled "White Yet There Is Time To Think."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From The Saturday Evening Post of September 7, 1940]

WHILE YET THERE IS TIME TO THINK

In a kind of hypnosis, produced partly by propaganda designed for people who believed themselves to be cynical and immune, partly by a sincere crusading evangel carried on by those whose emotions, as we think, have overcome their reason, but mainly by a Government whose foreign policy, to call it such, has been compounded of a spirit of moral grandeur, international heroics, delusions of a military power not in being, false premises and panic, this country now goes where it does not look and looks where it does not go.

If it should come awake one morning to read in the newspaper headlines, or hear by the radio, that it had walked backward into war, it would take it no doubt as having been somehow inevitable from the first, and yet nobody would be able to say quite how or why it happened.

As the hagfish enters the body of its victim unawares and slowly displaces it by devouring it, so it is that ideas that were clear and virile in the beginning have been devoured by new meanings, with no change of the word shells, until now you may be called anti-American, a "fifth columnist," or an appeaser if you doubt that the only way to keep America out of the war is to get into it, that to save ourselves we have first to save the British Empire, or that our first line of defense is and always has been the English Channel.

The Post's position cannot be misunderstood. Before the "blitzkrieg" started, we said: "What we need for practical security is first of all a new word. The word is impregnability, or state of supreme defense. We need more than a bigger Navy. We need two, one for the Atlantic and one for the Pacific, each incomparable. We need an impervious antiaircraft wall. We need to be able to meet not any aggressor, but any combination of aggressors. Then we may be sure that the principle of free institutions as a basis of modern civilization shall have, beyond the solace of words, a time yet to live in this world."

And that is our position still.

Now the Congress has voted a two-ocean Navy; for this proper sea power, for an approach to adequate air power, and for an army of 2,000,000 men, it has voted in a few weeks extraordinary appropriations rising to ten billions of dollars. We are not interested in the sums. We shall have to spend a great deal more than ten billions to create a power of defense equal to the power of aggression that has made this all at once a pirate world without law, the lean and hungry nations, as Mussolini says, out to take what they can from the fat ones by force. That, too, we have said.

It is defense we are thinking about, not war. And what concerns us now is that this distinction is becoming blurred.

What are we preparing for—defense or war?

Either the Executive Government itself does not know or it is unwilling to clarify the situation with a few positive words. We suppose the reason why it cannot do this is that it is already too much involved in its own confusions. Pursuing the insidious formula of measures short of war, conceived to begin with, on a gross underestimate of the aggressor's power, it was carried headlong into acts of physical intervention for the consequences and implications of which the country was in every way unprepared, to say nothing of the fact that it acted without the consent of Congress and beyond the awareness of the people.

In his message to France on June 15, the President said: "The Government of the United States has made it possible for allied armies to obtain, during the weeks that have just passed, airplanes, artillery, and munitions of many kinds, and * * * this Government, so long as the Allied Governments continue to resist, will redouble its efforts in this direction."

That was the United States Government speaking, acting, pledging itself to assist in the war against Hitler to the utmost, short only of an actual declaration of hostilities. It was already too late to save France. Moreover, nothing we had been able to send her, even our total military power, including the Navy, could have saved her, which was a trifling reality the Government was unable to comprehend.

Only 6 weeks later the Secretary of War is saying to the House Committee on Military Affairs, in support of the conscription bill, that there is very grave danger of a direct attack upon the United States by Hitler. He is asked how long it will take to prepare a suitable defense. He says: "We will not have it in time to meet the first possibility of invasion."

The Secretary of War, of course, is speaking directly for the administration. He is saying what it thinks. The administration thinks there is very grave danger of an invasion of this country by Hitler before we can be ready to meet it. But this is the same administration that stripped the American defense of rifles, artillery, munitions, and airplanes and sent them to the Allies. It is the same administration that would have delivered to the British Admiralty the whole of our mosquito fleet in building if the Congress had not found a law to stop it. It is the same administration that has ever since been trying to find a way to deliver United States Navy destroyers to the British. If what it thinks is true—that there is grave danger of an invasion of this country by Hitler before we can get ready—then we have not a rifle, a gun, an airplane, or a rowboat to spare, nor any industrial capacity. On the day the Secretary of War was making his statement before the House committee the New York newspapers carried pictures of National Guard men training with imaginary machine guns devised by plumbers out of gas pipe.

We can imagine circumstances in which the highest strategy would call for taking the war to the enemy. We cannot conceive of circumstances in which it is permitted in sanity to slap danger in the face before you are ready to meet it—to name an enemy who has not named you, to attack an enemy who has not yet attacked you, before you are ready to fight him.

Our enemies, the administration keeps telling the people, are Germany, Italy, and Japan, naming them. Not one of them has made a gesture of war toward us. For all we think and feel about Hitler, he has not attacked us. He says he does not intend to. We do not believe him. Nobody in the world now believes him. Very well. But the American Government has attacked Hitler, first by words, then by measures short of war, then by giving pledges to his enemies to assist them by all physical means to the utmost.

In June, the American Government entered the war against Hitler by acts of physical intervention all the worse because they were futile.

In July that same Government is telling the people they are in grave danger of being attacked by Hitler before they can get ready to meet him. "Hitler does not wait," said the Secretary of War to the House Committee on Military Affairs—and the National Guard men in New York training with gas-pipe guns!

What a triumph for statecraft! What strategy! What a face for a great nation!

These are the conditions under which there has been created in the country a war psychosis, misled by cries of "Stop Hitler Now!" and "Defend America by Aiding the Allies." We had nothing to stop Hitler with in Europe. A Government that either did not know that, or made believe it was not so, now is saying that if he decided to invade the United States soon, as there is very grave danger that he may, we are not ready to stop him here. Nevertheless, it goes on to declare against him an economic war—a Pan-American economic bloc against his European bloc—for which also it is unprepared, not having thought it through, not having calculated the cost.

We do not believe that an invasion of the United States by Hitler is among the imminent possibilities. The word of the Government for it does not greatly impress us. A Government that had been so wrong about his power to overcome in Europe and about the power of France to resist could very well be wrong again. Nor do we believe that 50 or 60 destroyers from the United States Navy would save the British Empire. That would be but another futile act of futile intervention, much more likely to infuriate an enemy we are not prepared to meet than to save a friend.

We are bound to be emotionally torn by the spectacle of the British Empire fighting for its life. That is a feeling that lies deep in us and is shared even by those who still can think in a realistic manner. The fall of the British Empire would be a mighty human disaster. Yet we part with those who say, or who believe, it would mean the end of American civilization, and part with them again when they would in any degree weaken the American defense to repair the weakness of Great Britain's, for which Great Britain, not we, are responsible. We add here two reflections—first, that Great Britain would be stronger if she had stood alone; second, the enemy is governed by logic, not emotion.

We stand, therefore, in our first position. Let us jealously mind our own defense in the great manner of a great people, resolved to be let alone. Let us build at any cost a dreadnought defense power such as no aggressor, nor any combination of aggressors, will dare to challenge. Thus we forfend war.

And meanwhile, for this will take some time, let us look very hard at a state of facts. The German thing has conquered Europe. That will be still true whether the British Empire stands or falls.

Who is going to put the German thing back? The British? They are not able.

Shall we do it? Unless we are willing to go to Europe and destroy it there, we may as well make up our minds now that we shall have to live in the same world with it, maybe for a long time, whether we like it or not. Nonetheless, for that reason, only all the more, we should, we must, create on this continent the incomparable power of defense. After that we shall see. For after that we shall be again as we once were, safe and free and dangerous.

Issues of the Campaign

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY S. TRUMAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 5 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON TIMES-HERALD

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial published in the Washington Times-Herald of September 3, 1940, under the heading "Mr. Willkie."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of September 3, 1940]

IS THERE AN ISSUE?

Mr. Willkie now says that the Roosevelt administration is bearing down too hard on organized labor. It seems that Mr. Willkie detects a drift under the New Deal toward Government control of labor unions, and that if he is elected he hopes to stop this drift and make labor even stronger and more independent than it is now.

We would have thought that the bulk of Mr. Willkie's before-Philadelphia supporters felt just the other way about labor—that the Roosevelt administration and the Wagner Act had done too much for labor, not too little.

Well, the campaign seems to be settling down to the main question of who is the better fitted to carry out the Roosevelt policies, Mr. Roosevelt or Mr. Willkie.

Mr. Willkie is for the New Deal's farm program; he's for social security, relief, conscription, and the Roosevelt foreign policy of all possible aid to England short of war. Mr. McNary is for the public-power policy; and now Mr. Willkie comes out for making the Wagner Labor Relations Act favor labor even more than it does now.

Instead of a knock-down and drag-out political fight, this is getting to be a love feast. What important national or international issue do these two candidates differ on, anyway? Or is the only real issue simply that one of them believes he ought to be in the White House while the other one believes he ought to stay in it?

Wage-Hour Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 5 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY JAY FRANKLIN

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by Jay Franklin, under the heading "Vindication of Wage-Hour Law a Factor in Defense Called Big Victory for Labor," published in the Washington Evening Star of September 3, 1940.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Evening Star of September 3, 1940]

WE, THE PEOPLE—VINDICATION OF WAGE-HOUR LAW AS FACTOR IN DEFENSE CALLED BIG VICTORY FOR LABOR

(By Jay Franklin)

Labor Day, 1940, witnessed one of labor's greatest victories, won—as the most complete victories are won—in silence. This is the complete vindication of the wage and hour law as a vital factor in national defense.

When the war crisis began there was a wave of business sentiment in favor of setting aside the restrictions of this law in the sacred name of the national emergency. Yet it has proved impossible for at least one nationally known radio forum to find big business representatives who are willing publicly to debate on this issue. Not one of them is willing to stand up on his hind legs and argue for longer hours for industrial labor or for lower wages at a time when the Government is spending lavishly for defense.

The truth is that the evidence points to the unsuspected fact that there is a limit to the productivity of labor in terms of hours per day. The stretch-out and the speed-up are both apt to lead to botched workmanship.

In 1918 Mr. Henry Ford, acting as umpire for the National War Labor Board, ruled on this issue: "I cannot refrain from expressing my very deep conviction that the straight 8-hour day is much better practice than the so-called 8-hour basic day, where the latter is continually and almost uniformly being practically exceeded in the number of working hours.

"My experience, and also my reason, teaches me that very few emergencies ever exist in a manufacturing business justifying the practice of exceeding 8 working hours per day. The strain of 8 hours is enough, and the hours should never be increased except under the most extraordinary circumstances. I cannot dwell too much on this. For the good of the men, for the good of the employer, and for the general results I would admonish those interested to adhere to the straight 8-hour day."

SUPPORTED BY EXPERIENCE

Thus spoke an expert in industrial production who has never been accused of undue tenderness toward the rights of organized labor.

This principle is supported by the experience of nations at war. The Manchester Guardian of July 18, 1940, writing of the British war effort, observed: "* * * There comes a time when the spirit of patriotic resolve can drive the tired body no farther. That time is here. Mr. Bevin said that the long working hours were already causing production to decline rather than to increase, and that the suspended factory acts must come back into force on August 1. This does not mean that armament production must fall still lower; reduced hours, in the last war experience, should soon send it up again, besides preserving stores of energy and enthusiasm for future urgencies."

FLEMING REPORT CONFIRMED

All of this confirms the report made to the President by Col. Philip B. Fleming, Administrator of the Wage and Hour Act, on July 11, 1940. In this report Colonel Fleming cited the report of the British Munitions Commission of the 1914–18 war, General Order No. 13 of the Chief of Ordnance, U. U. A., on November 15, 1917, and the German experience with an attempted 60-hour week for labor beginning on January 1, 1938. The result of this effort to make labor lay more golden eggs was that "production began to fall off rapidly, accompanied by such an alarming increase of industrial accidents and stoppages as to attract the serious attention of the Government authorities."

In other words, experience in three countries and two wars proves that it is bad for production to try to work labor longer hours than industrial management has found effective. Neither higher wages in America, patriotic spirit in England, nor Nazi regimentation in Germany, has been able to evade this law of supply and demand in efficient effort by individual workers.

So American labor enters the crisis with this lesson learned by the employers of labor. It is unlikely that the wage scale of industrial labor will be attacked, so long as the corporations involved are operating on the copious flow of Government funds. This is the greatest vindication of the New Deal's social program since the inauguration of work relief in 1933.

Transfer of Destroyers to Great Britain

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 5 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE BOSTON POST

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial appearing yesterday in the Boston Post, entitled "An Imperious Act."

The Boston Post has been a stanch supporter of the administration. It is a Democratic newspaper supporting the administration's foreign policy, including its wishes in connection with the peacetime conscription program. The editorial to which I refer is thus made of larger meaning than might otherwise be the case. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Boston Post of September 4, 1940]

AN IMPERIOUS ACT

The giving of our destroyers to Great Britain in return for rights to fortify certain points was done in a manner far removed from our rightful democratic processes.

None of us know what immediate effect this act will have in putting us in the war.

But we do know now, finally, that the people of the United States have been committed by Franklin D. Roosevelt to preserve the British Empire, its rights and dominions, all over the earth.

Her war is our war.

The bases we shall establish on her islands and subject countries will protect her as well as ourselves.

For her we will keep free a place of refuge, so that her Government can still function if it is driven from the British Isles.

If we were a British colony we could not do more. Most of them are doing less.

Legally the deal was as raw a piece of chicanery as has been yet foisted upon a trusting people in the more than 150 years of our history.

The interventionist lawyers dug back into moldy legislation to find a forgotten statute to enable the deal to be put over.

The Congress was flouted; due process of deliberation was debauched.

Perhaps the President feels that he is doing the popular thing. Perhaps we Americans are willing to be led into another of Europe's wars.

But the swift, subtle, and adroit action was not according to the canons of Americanism that we learned at the knees of our mothers, from the lips of our preceptors, or have heard repeated from the mouth of the man who now sits in the President's chair.

We now know that it is all right for Congress to deliberate on the lives of men, as in the Conscription Act, but an international swindle like this is too deep, too incomprehensible for their combined intellects.

Else why was the deal put over in the undercover way that it was?

Many a mother will rise this morning with an ache at her heart for the sons whole lives are the pawns in this gigantic game.

Many a man will wonder where his right as an American citizen has gone to voice his protest at such imperious action.

No ballot box in November, it is apparent, will save the peace of the land now. By that time we should be wholly in the war.

For by hauling down Old Glory from those destroyers we have cut adrift from the splendor of our vaunted independence.

No raising of the Union Jack over their decks will or can replace it.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. SMATHERS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 5 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

LETTER AND ARTICLE BY JUDGE FRANK SMATHERS TO EDITOR OF ASHEVILLE (N. C.) CITIZEN

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the Appendix of the RECORD two articles clipped from the Asheville Citizen, Asheville, N. C., written by my brother, Judge Frank Smathers, of Miami, Fla., who is spending the summer at his summer home in Waynesville, N. C.

There being no objection, the letter and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Asheville (N. C.) Citizen]

WHAT WOULD ANSWER BE?

WAYNESVILLE, N. C., August 26, 1940.

EDITOR OF THE CITIZEN:

I note that Mr. Willkie continues to fling his challenge at the President for a joint debate.

Evidently Mr. Willkie thinks he has found something the President is afraid of and that the public is proud of that discovery.

If Mr. Willkie continues to banter the President with that challenge he will soon make two other discoveries.

One will be in November when he begins to dig himself from beneath a Roosevelt landslide. The other will follow Mr. Willkie's next challenge when Mr. Roosevelt will be forced to write Mr. Willkie somewhat in this fashion:

"DEAR MR. WILLKIE: I hear you want me to tour the country with you for the purpose of putting on a big show—a joint debate. If I had the time, and if I were not President of a great Nation, I'd accept, as that would afford me much personal fun. But, the affairs of state and the pressing official duties of my office compel me to regretfully decline your thoughtful invitation. I feel though, that it is your right and my duty to inform you of the reasons that impel this important decision."

"To me, Mr. Willkie, these are perilous times, the like of which the world has never witnessed before. In fact, I feel that a world revolution is upon us right here in America; forced upon us, it is true, and from which we cannot flee, however desirable that may be. We must stand and face it with a stout heart and an unflinching spirit, or we, too, will fall before its crushing force. Already the fine culture and centuries of freedom enjoyed by the many, mighty nations of Europe have been completely destroyed by this evil force within the short space of a few weeks. England alone stands between us and that deadly, dreaded evil. She alone is valiantly fighting to save freedom and civilization from the savage oppressors of Europe. England is battling today, not only for her own life and liberty, but also for the preservation of those priceless privileges and liberties so dear to the hearts of all the Americans.

"Already that Battle of Britain has alarmed and startled the people of this hemisphere as they have never been stirred before. Already our European trade and overseas possessions and rights have been lost or wantonly destroyed or brusquely denied.

"Moreover, and far more serious, our national life and our domestic business economy have been totally disrupted by Europe's dictators, and while we in America are today endeavoring to readjust our business economy to the new world conditions, our American way of life and free democratic institutions are being assailed from without and undermined from within, and by that same insidious and baneful force that crushed and subjugated Belgium and France.

"Confronted with these perilous, imperative, and paramount problems of national life and national defense and national safety, I cannot, therefore, see, Mr. Willkie, either the need or the propriety for wasting precious time debating the wisdom of New Deal policies, the core of which you already accept and promise publicly to support.

"Respectfully yours,

"FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT."

If such a letter as the above should be sent by the President to Mr. Willkie, would Mr. Willkie desist in his challenges or would he go back to Elwood for further study and inspiration before formulating his reply?

FRANK SMATHERS.

TOPICS OF THE DAY—WENDELL WILLKIE—THE ELECTION AND THE WAR

(By Judge Frank Smathers)

When Mr. Wendell Willkie was first nominated, I feared for the Democrats—I feared for Mr. Roosevelt, but not for the Nation. I thought the Republicans had at last selected a winner, a wise statesman. I was sure they had chosen a successful businessman with sufficient personality and pep to attract and persuade the masses as well as the classes. I was convinced that a real national champion had been born to the Nation overnight, equipped for any emergency, fit to fight on all fronts, to master all issues, and eminently equipped to lead and defend a great Nation, a great people in a world raked with unrest and wild with revolution.

I continued to think and feel this way about Mr. Willkie until he went back home and began to unbosom himself before his homefolks in Elwood, Ind. There he became quite talkative and revealed his inner thoughts. Lots of people were there to see and hear him, more than will ever go there again.

The speech itself—well, that was not so hot as the weather. Some Republicans thought it great, others were disappointed, but all the Democrats, save those taking a walk with Mr. Al Smith, were perfectly delighted. They felt relieved.

Personally, I was disillusioned, disappointed, and in this depressed mental mood I felt like writing Mr. Willkie as follows: "Dear Mr. Willkie: Why didn't you specify and stress 'national defense' as the most pressing and vital need of the Nation? You know that it is. Why, therefore, didn't you say so, frankly, fearlessly, and specifically, and urge all your followers to demand an immediate passage of the conscription bill without further debate and delay? Also, Mr. Willkie, why didn't you shout: 'Down with the dictators; Long live democracy, and to this end and to this ideal I hereby pledge and dedicate my all, even my life.'"

Such a patriotic declaration and demonstration on your part, Mr. Willkie, would have been a great inspiration and encouragement to the American youth now asked to lay his life on the altar of freedom, and the American mother about to sacrifice her only son and life savings in order to save democracy and the cherished liberties of America.

Instead, Mr. Willkie, you chilled and discouraged your many admirers by your repeated cries: "Down with the New Deal. Death to the New Deal, and I am brave enough to here and now challenge the champion new dealer to a joint debate."

Moreover, Mr. Willkie, you know there is, at least, one thing the President has done wisely and well, and that is the handling of our foreign policy. That policy, all intelligent and fair-minded men freely admit has been masterfully and magnificently done by our President in the true American fashion, and with the same devotion, courage, and wisdom that actuated and inspired our great Presidents of the past when America's safety was in jeopardy. So right here and there, Mr. Willkie, you had the excuse and the occasion to be more patriotic than political by publicly acknowledging your thanks for the manner in which our foreign affairs have been conducted by our President and your rival. But, instead, you saw fit to brutally and brusquely rebuke him. Yes, belittle and depreciate his best and most unselfish efforts. You even ascribed "unscrupulous" motives to all his fine official acts on foreign affairs.

Therefore, is it any wonder, Mr. Willkie, that some of us feel disillusioned about your sportsmanship and statesmanship? I hope, however, I have misjudged you through your acceptance speech. For the sake of the Nation we all love, I would like to think and I shall still hope that my first estimate of your ability and character was the correct one.

New Deal Policies Incompatible With Democratic Philosophy of Former Years

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK B. KEEFE

OF WISCONSIN

Thursday, September 5, 1940

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, as an indication of the tremendous change in policy of the New Deal from the Democratic philosophy of former years, I quote from the Democratic platform of 1900, adopted at Kansas City, Mo., with William J. Bryan as the Democratic candidate for the Presidency:

The origin and powers of government: We declare again that all governments instituted among men derive their just powers from the consent of the governed; that any government not based upon the consent of the governed is a tyranny, and that to impose upon any people a government of force is to substitute the methods of imperialism for those of a republic. We hold that the Constitution follows the flag and denounce the doctrine that an Executive or Congress, deriving their existence and their power from the Constitution, can exercise lawful authority beyond it or in violation of it.

We assert that no nation can long endure half republic and half empire, and we warn the American people that imperialism abroad will lead quickly and inevitably to despotism at home.

The Democrats who assembled in that convention at Kansas City on July 4, 1900, surely reflected in their platform ideas wholly incompatible with the present trends of the New Deal. I again quote from that platform:

Militarism opposed. We oppose militarism. It means conquest abroad and intimidation and oppression at home. It means the strong arm which has ever been fatal to free institutions. It is what millions of our citizens have fled from in Europe. It will impose upon our peace-loving people a large standing army and unnecessary burden of taxation, and will be a constant menace to their liberties. A small standing army and a well-disciplined State militia are amply sufficient in time of peace. This Republic has no place for a vast military service and conscription.

The National Guard. In time of danger the volunteer soldier is his country's best defender. The National Guard of the United States should ever be cherished in the patriotic hearts of a free people. Such organizations are ever an element of strength and safety. For the first time in our history and coeval with the Philippine conquest has there been a wholesale departure from our time-honored and approved system of volunteer organization. We denounce it as un-American, undemocratic, and unrepublican, and as a subversion of the ancient and fixed principles of a free people.

The Democrats of the Nation again assembled in convention at St. Louis on July 6, 1904, nominated Alton B. Parker, of New York, for its candidate for the Presidency and adopted a platform which it might be interesting for the New Deal Democrats to read. I quote from that platform and ask reasonable men to apply that indictment to the New Deal:

The Republican administration. The existing Republican administration has been spasmodic, erratic, sensational, spectacular, and arbitrary. It has made itself a satire upon the Congress, the courts, and upon the settled practices and usages of national and international law.

It summoned the Congress into hasty and futile extra session, and virtually adjourned it, leaving behind in its flight from Washington uncalled calendars and unaccomplished tasks.

It made war, which is the sole power of Congress, without its authority, thereby usurping one of its fundamental prerogatives. It violated a plain statute of the United States as well as plain treaty obligations, international usages, and constitutional law; and has done so under pretense of executing a great public policy, which could have been more easily effected lawfully, constitutionally, and with honor.

I quote further from the platform:

Fundamental principles. The application of these fundamental principles to the living issues of the day is the first step toward the assured peace, safety, and progress of our Nation. Freedom of the press, of conscience, and of speech; equality before the law of all citizens; right of trial by jury; freedom of the persons defended by the writ of habeas corpus; liberty of personal contract untrammeled by sumptuary laws; supremacy of the civil over military authority; a well-disciplined militia; the separation of church and State; economy in expenditures; low taxes, that labor may be lightly burdened; prompt and sacred fulfillment of public and private obligations; fidelity to treaties; peace and friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none; absolute acquiescence in the will of the majority; the vital principle of republics—these are doctrines which Democracy has established as proverbs of the Nation, and they should be constantly invoked and enforced.

The Democratic Convention of 1908, held at Denver, Colo., nominated William Jennings Bryan as its candidate for the Presidency. It adopted a platform on which that candidate sought the highest office in the land. Let us refer to it for inspiration. I quote:

Increase of officeholders: Coincident with the enormous increase in expenditures is a like addition to the number of officeholders. During the past year 23,784 were added, costing $16,156,000, and in the past 6 years of Republican administration the total number of new offices created, aside from many commissions, has been 99,139, entailing an additional expenditure of nearly $70,000,000, as against only 10,279 new offices created under the Cleveland and McKinley administrations, which involved an expenditure of only $6,000,000. We denounce this great and growing increase in the number of officeholders as not only unnecessary and wasteful but also as clearly indicating a deliberate purpose on the part of the administration to keep the Republican Party in power at public expense by thus increasing the number of its retainers and dependents. Such procedure we declare to be no less dangerous and corrupt than the open purchase of votes at the polls.

Economy in administration: The Republican Congress in the session just ended made appropriations amounting to $1,008,000,000, exceeding the total expenditures of the past fiscal year by $90,000,000, and leaving a deficit of more than $60,000,000 for the fiscal year just ended. We denounce the needless waste of the people's money, which has resulted in the appalling increase, as a shameful violation of all prudent considerations of government and as no less than a crime against the millions of working men and women, from whose earnings the great proportion of these colossal sums must be extorted through excessive tariff exactions and other indirect methods. It is not surprising that in the face of this shocking record the Republican platform contains no reference to economical administration or promise thereof in the future. We demand that a stop be put to this frightful extravagance and insist upon the strictest economy in every department compatible with frugal and efficient administration.

I quote further:

Misuse of patronage: We condemn as a violation of the spirit of our institutions the action of the present Chief Executive in using the patronage of his high office to secure the nomination for the Presidency of one of his Cabinet officers. A forced succession in the Presidency is scarcely less repugnant to public sentiment than is life tenure in that office. No good intention on the part of the Executive and no virtue in the one selected can justify the establishment of a dynasty. The right of the people to freely select their officials is inalienable and cannot be delegated.

The Democratic convention of 1912 held at Baltimore, Md., nominated Woodrow Wilson, of New Jersey, for the Presidency. It adopted a platform upon which the nominee was elected President of the United States. In view of the present record of the New Deal, I think it proper to refer to that platform. I quote:

Rights of the States: We believe in the preservation and maintenance in their full strength and integrity of the three coordinate branches of the Federal Government—the executive, the legislative, and the judicial, each keeping within its own bounds and not encroaching upon the just powers of either of the others.

Believing that the most efficient results under our system of government are to be attained by the full exercise by the States of their reserved sovereign powers, we denounce as usurpation the efforts of our opponents to deprive the States of any of the rights reserved to them and to enlarge and magnify by indirection the powers of the Federal Government.

We insist upon the full exercise of all the powers of the Government, both State and national, to protect the people from injustice at the hands of those who seek to make the Government a private asset in business. There is no twilight zone between the Nation and the State in which exploiting interests can take refuge from both. It is necessary that the Federal Government shall exercise the powers reserved to them, but we insist that Federal remedies for the regulation of interstate commerce and for the prevention of private monopoly shall be added to, and not substituted for, State remedies.

The Democratic convention of 1924 held at New York City nominated John W. Davis, of West Virginia, for its candidate for the Presidency. It adopted a platform signed by Homer S. Cummings, chairman, and KEY PITTMAN, secretary. In view of the tendencies of the New Deal, I quote from that platform:

The rights of the States: We demand that the States of the Union shall be preserved in all their vigor and power. They constitute a bulwark against the centralizing and destructive tendencies of the Republican Party.

We condemn the efforts of the Republican administration to nationalize the functions and duties of the States.

We oppose the extension of bureaucracy, the creation of unnecessary bureaus and Federal agencies, and the multiplication of offices and officeholders.

We demand a revival of the spirit of local self-government essential to the preservation of the free institutions of our Republic.

The foregoing citations of solemn covenants contained in various Democratic platforms of the past clearly demonstrate how far the present administration has drifted from the fundamental principles of government set forth in those platforms.

The Gentleman From Oregon

OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 5, 1940

ARTICLE BY S. EUGENE ALLEN

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, the Oregon Labor Press is the voice of the American Federation of Labor in my State of Oregon. In its recent fortieth Labor Day edition it carried an article over the signature of its editor, Mr. S. Eugene Allen, discussing my distinguished colleague, Senator CHARLES L. MCNARY. I ask to include this article in the extension of my remarks. It is as follows:

[From the Oregon Labor Press of August 30, 1940]

THE GENTLEMAN FROM OREGON

(By S. Eugene Allen)

A historic occasion was observed last Tuesday at the State fairgrounds in Salem. The distinguished senior Senator from Oregon, CHARLES L. MCNARY, was officially notified that he is the Republican nominee for the Vice Presidency of the United States. This is the only time that such an honor has come to Oregon. It is—really—the only time that such an honor has fallen to any State west of the Mississippi River. For Hoover, though claiming California residence, is not truly a westerner.

But "Charlie Mac" is a westerner and an Oregonian in the truest sense of the word. He was born on the farm he now owns near Salem. He loves this western country with its tall fir trees, its lovely lawns, and its cool breezes. He is happiest when he may cast aside the cares of state and come home to Oregon—and to Fir Cone, his home.

Fir Cone. How appropriately named is this natal place and home of our distinguished MCNARY. The modest farm cottage in which he lives nestles under the towering firs that are patriarchs of the forest. The filbert and prune orchards are neatly kept and well cultivated. Fir Cone is a typical western Oregon farm home.

Agriculture has always been the first love of Senator MCNARY. For years he has been identified with every piece of legislation having as its purpose the relief of oppressed agriculture. In his speech of acceptance Mr. MCNARY pointed out a fundamental truth. He said that without a prosperous agriculture there could be no prosperity for the workers of the Nation and that pay rolls would drop and unemployment would overtake us. He said that the interests of the Nation's workers and its farmers were inextricably bound up together and that they must both be prosperous together or that both would fall into economic chaos. This is the sheerest common sense.

But MCNARY has not confined his interests to agriculture. He has been a stanch champion of labor. Organized labor has appreciated his support of the interests of the working people of America. He has been endorsed by labor in his election campaigns in this State. Labor is confident that it can depend upon Senator MCNARY to continue to insist that its interests be protected and its rights strengthened.

Typically Oregonian, Mr. MCNARY has never been a hidebound partisan. He has supported liberal and progressive legislation for many, many years. He supported the initiative and the referendum when the party politicians were attacking them. He has stood up and fought the seizure of the vast waterpower resources of this Nation by private and predatory interests. He has consistently fought for low-cost distribution of public power and for public ownership of power whenever that seemed desirable and feasible.

MCNARY has been distinguished by his good judgment and by his political acumen and statesmanship—not by long speeches. In the 23 years that he has served the State of Oregon in the Senate of the United States he has made very few speeches and those that he has made have been brief and precise. He has come to be highly respected by both political parties for his sage advice and his kindly tolerance of differing viewpoints.

Mr. MCNARY's speech in Salem was a good speech. It was a progressive speech. He did not condemn the New Deal except in its obvious shortcomings. He candidly stated that important social gains had been made under the New Deal administration. He urged a strong program of conservation. As to forests he made it clear that we must balance our cut and harvest of timber with new planting and reforestation. On the question of power he said:

"Unfalteringly, the Congress has granted to the public preferential rights to power from navigable streams. Maximum benefits for domestic consumers, farmers, and small users of power should be the yardstick by which we measure the usefulness and serviceability of every Federal development. Moreover, rates should be maintained at the lowest level consistent with sound amortization. Where irreconcilable conflicts arise between public and private interests in the development and distribution of power, private holdings should not be confiscated and we now have a working precedent for such fair treatment in the recent acquisition by purchase of private companies by the Tennessee Valley Authority."

GEORGE NORRIS could do no better nor more clearly define a fair and sensible policy.

Mr. MCNARY said that he "opposes involvement in foreign military adventures. America, as always, prefers peace. But America does not prefer the peace of appeasement; nor the surrender of our national dignity, our independence of action, our political freedom or the civilized values that we cherish." And who could better define American opinion with respect to foreign affairs?

There are many who believe that such views on the part of "CHARLIE MAC" are incompatible with those of Wendell Willkie. That is a matter of conjecture. But it is certain that the people of Oregon and of the West are proud of Senator MCNARY. They know he is one of them, that he understands and is sympathetic with their problems. The western folks have confidence in MCNARY because for a quarter of a century he has rendered yeoman service to them and has represented them well in the National Capital.

The people of Oregon know that should their native son be elevated to the Vice Presidency they will suffer an almost irreparable loss in the Senate but will have a friend near the White House. Oregon labor respects and honors MCNARY. Oregon agriculture looks to him as its leader. Oregon industry has unbounded confidence in him.

The citizens of Oregon wish him well in this new cause into which he has been drafted.

Where the Compact Failed

OF

HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 4, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEW YORK SUN

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Sun:

[From the New York Sun of September 4, 1940]

WHERE THE COMPACT FAILED

Notwithstanding his disappointment because so many of the signatories of the Briand-Kellogg compact have violated their covenant outlawing war as an instrument of national policy, Secretary Hull asserts that the soundness of its underlying principles in no wise has been impaired. Undoubtedly that is correct. The trouble is not with the principles of the Kellogg Pact but in failure to live up to them. What has happened did not mark the first time—as we fear it may not prove the last time—that sinners have thronged the mourner's bench to avow repentance and amendment, only to become backsliders when the next robust temptation came along.

The Secretary's comment does not mean that he is an incurable optimist; it means only that he is still a little romantic. As so many others do, he wishes to dwell in such a realm as that portrayed by the seer of Patmos, where everybody loves everybody else and nobody means his neighbor harm. But the seer of Patmos foresaw certain conditions precedent. He foresaw the necessity of laying hold on the dragon, that old serpent which is the devil and Satan, and chaining him up for a thousand years in a bottomless pit before loosening him for final rebellion and catastrophe. St. John understood what so many other wishful ones seem to forget—that before human nature acquires perfection it will have to be made over in blood and tears and sweat and penitence.

There are a good many notions about this ancient enemy. Some personify it as Satan; others think of it as meaning the innate obstreperousness and cantankerousness of human nature itself. In either case, its subjection seems essential to any workable millennium. Evidence is still wanting to show that it has been immured in any pit for the 12 years since the Briand-Kellogg compact was signed, to say nothing of a thousand years. But even after 12 years the compact has taken on a quaint flavor of antiquity. It survives mainly as a reminder of an age of sweet credulity when so many believed that human nature could be made over by passing laws, that force could be abolished from the relations of nations by the simple process of getting a few statesmen to agree that force is a dreadful and deplorable thing. Secretary Hull's nostalgic affection for it may be attributed rather to the goodness of his heart than to an exercise of his really respectable power of ratiocination.

Compare Our Problems With England's Problems—Part I

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 4, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following excerpts from the Alien Menace.

Mr. Speaker, the author of this book is Lt. Col. A. H. Lane, of the British Army, a gentleman who I am sure, knows what he is talking about. The reader will find that England's problem is practically our problem, and I have inserted these excerpts so that the Members may read and inform themselves as to the conditions which exist in England.

From informative sources, which I have been able to contact, I have come to the conclusion that the English people were opposed to the present war. These patriotic English citizens, realizing what is happening in the British Empire, have become closely united, and in this strength have formed a formidable front against the British Government which, like ours, is international. It was in order to stop this movement, as much as anything, that Great Britain, out of a clear sky, declared war, and this declaration forced France to do the same. It was a mistake, as we now know, yet it was a case where the Government did not listen to the people.

The people of the United States, knowing this, are now demanding that Congress listen to the people of this Nation, so that our institutions and Government may be preserved, as it was originally given to us. Our people, like the English people, have this right and it is in defense of these rights that people from every State are now in Washington for the purpose of expressing their wishes to Congress, and their wishes are that this country remain at peace and stop provocative acts that are bound to lead us into war.

ALIENS AND REVOLUTION

That strange alien influences exist in England is obvious; and I propose, as far as possible within the limits of this book, to examine one or two aspects of this particular menace to the nation.

First, we have to remember that, despite their pious protestations, the so-called British Labor Party is pledged, through affiliation with the Second International of 1923, to remove even our present ineffective restrictions in relation to alien immigration. They commenced to redeem that pledge in 1924, as is proved by no less an authority than Mr. Ronald McNeill, now Lord Cushendun, who, speaking in the Canterbury division on October 24, 1924, said that the Socialist government had withdrawn control of aliens and any number were now coming into the country. He did not suppose that these even required to go to Germany for forged passports. So easy was it for them to come to this country under our present system that probably at this moment, in the country, hidden away in London, Manchester, Glasgow, and in places of that sort, were men—they could not tell how many—of exactly the same class as the men who had produced the horrors in Russia.

And during 1929–31 these regulations were further relaxed.

Why this tender regard for the foreigner? What is the driving force behind it? Why is the foreigner always conspicuous in all movements of a subversive nature? Is he a welcome guest, or has he behind him a power that forbids any attempt to oust him from the deliberations of any of these associations? On Sunday, December 4, 1927, I attended a meeting at the Albert Hall, London, organized by the International Class War Prisoners' Aid, when those well-known Communists, the late A. J. Cooke and J. T. Murphy, were the chief speakers. After carefully examining the audience from points of vantage in the hall, and again at an exit, when it dispersed, it was obvious that about 50 percent were aliens of a low, dark type. And there immediately arose in my mind the question, "Why should we, and why do we, harbor these foreign parasites whose chief object, judging by the speeches at this meeting, is revolution?" It was not without purpose that the doctrine of "Liberty, equality, and fraternity" was proclaimed by the alien instigators of the French Revolution. When accepted and acted upon it admitted an alien influence and alien agents into every French institution, which until then were in the main the preserve of Frenchmen. The French subversives in 1789 were but the vanguard movement of an alien invasion that ultimately spread to every European country, including England.

The Hyde Park meetings, especially on May Day and on Sundays, show the type of alien revolutionary in this country. Few of these aliens do any honest work. Some beg doles, others live by crime, and most of them get Moscow money.

When we talk of the doctrines of Moscow, we do not always realize that we have actually imported the teachers of these doctrines, with apparent willingness, if not pleasure. Many of them have come here definitely to extend the Moscow and other equally subversive and pernicious movements, and, as for the remaining aliens who may not actually be active, it must not be expected that they have a love for Britain implanted in their hearts on landing. They are aliens, and aliens they will remain, no matter whether they change their nationality or not.

How was it that noted alien revolutionaries were allowed into this country under the socialist and Baldwin governments? Here are the names of some of them.

Bukharin, the great brain of Moscow, came here in July 1931 "as a scientist," as the socialist government have been at great pains to explain. How long did he remain? He is well known as one of the chief Soviet organizers. He is joint author of the A B C of communism, which has been so much used by our Socialist politicians, and he was Lenin's "pen."[1]

Gustav Sobottka is secretary of the International Miners' Committee of the Red International of Labor Unions of Moscow. He was in this country for some months at the end of 1930.

Ossipoff and Stoutsky, of the central committee of the Miners' Union of the U. S. S. R., landed in Great Britain on September 28, 1929, and remained several weeks, during which they addressed miners in various parts of England and Scotland. So anti-British and Communist were their speeches that the Miners' Federation of Great Britain raised complaints.

Helmuk Oppermann, who admitted he had been 18 months in the British Isles when examined (December 28, 1928), was found to have a forged German passport and to be carrying arms.

Eduard Soermus, a Russian revolutionary, after preaching his dangerous doctrines in South Wales and other places for several months after the war, was deported; but the Socialist Government of 1924 allowed him to come back.

Isidore Dreazon, a naturalized American of Polish birth, arrived in England, January 29, 1930. He was found at the end of April, hiding in the headquarters of the Communist Party in Ancoats, Manchester. The police described him as the most dangerous man in England today, and as an important member of the Executive of the Third International of Moscow. He had visited every Communist center in England where there was industrial unrest and was said to be behind recent strikes. This man had been in England at an earlier date and on May 1, 1930, he was sentenced to a month's imprisonment and recommended for deportation. On June 6, 1930, he was sentenced to 3 months' imprisonment; but he did not leave this country until October 22, 1930.

Xaver Franz Kugelmann, a German, landed here in March 1929, for a limited period. Then he was granted three extensions by the Home Office up to December 3, 1929. He was stated to be a member of the Communist Party. But he was still here on August 22, 1931, and a quantity of Communist literature was found at his lodgings. (See Cases in the Courts, Appendix II.)

And how many other dangerous alien revolutionaries in this country have not been arrested but are secretly at work in these islands? The author knows of some of these and has tried in vain to get the authorities to take action about them.

On November 27, 1930, Mr. Henderson stated in the House of Commons that members of the Ogpu (the terrorist Moscow Soviet police) would be permitted to enter this country.

Moses Roisenman arrived in England in June 1930, under a false name. He is chief of the foreign section of the Ogpu. He is known to have been in touch with a number of military spies, English and foreign, in order to obtain information re latest type of tanks, armored cars, and big guns. (Daily Mail, July 5, 1930.)

Moscow transferred the Communist International Western Bureau from Berlin to London in 1930.

"It is of importance that the amazing network built up by the Bolshevists for world propaganda for communism should be fully realized. They have set up organizations, similar to the Western European Bureau, all over the world.

"The Western Bureau covers this country, Ireland, France, Portugal, Spain, and Belgium.

"In addition to other European branches, there are also the Indian Bureau, the Latin-American Bureau, the South African Bureau (with headquarters at Cape Town), the Far Eastern Bureau, which includes Australia and New Zealand, and the North American Bureau, which includes the United States, Canada, and Mexico." (Morning Post, May 12, 1930.)

It is evident that Moscow knew that this Bureau could plot with greater freedom under our socialist government than in Berlin.

"In the House of Lords on November 17, 1931, Lord Bertie of Thame drew attention to the activities of the expert Soviet agent, Klyshko, which have been described by the Morning Post. This useful revolutionary was deported with Litvinoff (Finkelstein) in 1918 and returned with diplomatic immunity in 1920; but was withdrawn by his masters in 1923, at the instance of Lord Curzon, after it had been discovered that a number of £100 bank notes, passed to him through Lloyds Bank and the Russian Commercial Bank in London had been cashed by a Punjabi revolutionary in India. He was evicted from China in 1925, having conspired with the Jew Borodin. Lord Lucan gave an account of his recent visits to this defenseless country—once in 1930 and twice this year. He said that the Home Office 'have the situation well in hand'; but, in reply to Lord Newton, he added that Klyshko 'has to get a visa to come to the country,' and 'is backed by individuals or firms' wanting to do business with the Soviet. 'I understand that there is no objection raised.' Could there be any better proof of the necessity for promptly clearing out the 'nests of conspirators,' enjoying the hospitality of this country and entrenched behind diplomatic immunity?" (The Patriot, November 26, 1931.)

In May 1930 a significant visit to England was paid by Herr Everlein, one of Moscow's big men. He is a member of that mysterious and all-powerful body, the I. C. C. (International Control Commission of the Communist International). He is Controller of Finance. Thus is revealed the link between the money of Moscow and the British Communist Party.

These alien anarchists waited until the socialist government was in office before coming, or returning, to this country. The facts set forth above show the long red arm of Moscow in our midst.

"Pussyfoot" Johnson, of the United States of America, who more than once has been in England endeavoring to put prohibition over on us, is another example of alien interference in our national interests. We do not want the state of affairs here which prohibition has brought about in the United States of America. Had not the visits of this mysterious man, not only in England, but also in India twice, and in Egypt, some ulterior object beyond that of prohibition? The inhabitants of Egypt are Mohammedans, and most of the inhabitants of India have no interest in prohibition as they do not drink alcoholic liquor. Whence did the money come to pay Mr. Johnson's heavy expenses when traveling in so many countries?

After reading this chapter, doubtless the reader will wonder why a British Government should go out of its way to admit these dangerous alien revolutionaries.

And these are some of the gang to which trade credits have been given, to which this country has been supplying munitions of war on credit, including tanks, guns, etc. No one who has studied matters of late years expects these credits, which now run to several millions, to be honored by this Moscow Soviet.

In his book, An Expert in the Service of the Soviet (Benn, 1929), Mr. M. J. Larsons, a mining engineer and a well-known businessman, relates how he was sent by the Soviet to Berlin in 1918 to assist Menshinsky, then consul general of the Soviet Republic in Berlin, in negotiating large credits. Mr. Larsons tried to impress on Menshinsky and his colleagues that they should be careful as to declarations and promises to the Reichsbank. Menshinsky smilingly observed: "I do not understand you. As long as there are still idiots to take our signature seriously and to put their trust in it, we must promise everything that is being asked and as much as one likes, if we can only get something tangible in exchange."

But the point of this story is that Menshinsky was the most powerful member of the Moscow Soviet in 1929 when Dovgalevski

[1] Nicolai Ivanovich Bukharin is one of the most inveterate foes that the British Empire has known. Beside him the notorious Zinoviev, of red-letter fame, pales. Until recently Bukharin was the official propagandist in chief of the Soviet Government, and his last post was that of president of the Third International, from which he ousted Zinoviev. In that capacity he directed all anti-British propaganda. The claim that Bukharin is a scientist is devoid of all foundation. True, he graduated at the Moscow University, but he has never engaged in any branch of scientific work or study. He has always been and is a red revolutionary politician, whose pamphlets, theses, and speeches emphasize world revolution in general and the overthrow of the British Empire in particular. For years he has abandoned himself to a fury of bitter hatred toward Britain and the British Empire, and he is the coauthor of a plan of colonial wars, the idea of which is to reduce Britain, the "bulwark of capitalism," to dust. He has always sought to undermine British prestige, and he has devoted most of his time to writing anti-British diatribes, to preparing catechisms and instructions, and to lecturing at propaganda schools for agents destined to be sent to India, China, and other parts of the "zone of British influence." In fact, one of the leading schools is named after him. During the last 6 months he has been lecturing to agitators and teachers of agitators from every part of the British Empire. And he is inordinately proud of being the compiler of the so-called Policy of the Indian Communist Party pamphlet, which demands the expulsion of every British man and woman from India. I cannot quote any scientific theories propounded by Bukharin, but I can give one or two examples of what the gentle scientist has said in the past. 1926: The British miners' strike and the Chinese revolution are two gains due to Communist activities. British capitalism, more than other capitalism, is on the eve of its final downfall. * * * This strike is one of our battles, which will in time multiply. (Daily Mail, June 30, 1931.)

was in England negotiating trade credits with Mr. Henderson, our foreign secretary.

All this substantiates what the author and his colleagues have been pointing out for several years, viz, that the MacDonald Cabinet were not their own masters in dealing with Moscow.

It is well known that many British men, especially Welshmen, are in the pay of the Moscow Soviet. Here is one case out of several; it is these Communist agents who have done so much to destroy the Welsh coal trade:

"Twenty-nine persons, who had been found guilty of unlawful assembly at Mardy, a mining township known as Little Moscow, were brought up for sentence at Cardiff Assizes yesterday.

"The case arose from an attempt to prevent a distress for rates from being levied on a miner's house.

"Police Inspector William Rees said that the ringleader was Arthur Horner, who had assumed the role of a 'dictator.' During the coal strike of 1921 his conduct was most revolutionary, and he terrorized the officials. On one occasion he compelled the stove workers at a local colliery to withdraw the fires, thereby flooding the pits.

"'Horner,' continued the inspector, 'has paid frequent visits to Russia, and it is assumed that he is being well paid by Russia for his efforts to destroy the peace of this country. Before his advent Mardy was a prosperous industrial mining district. The collieries employed 2,500 men, of whom the majority earned £9 a week. Now the place is almost derelect.

"'Respectable miners have been compelled to dispose of their houses, which cost £250 to £300, for £5. This is all attributed to Horner and a few of his disciples.'

"Horner was sentenced to 15 months' imprisonment; the others to lesser terms.

"Referring to some of the other defendants, Inspector Rees stated that Jesse Sweet, who was described as a dangerous agitator, after a visit to Moscow, attempted to join H. M. Forces with a view to spreading disaffection among the troops. He had never been down a pit in his life." (Times, 25 February, 1932.)

In the House of Commons (12 February, 1932) Sir Herbert Samuel, Home Secretary, stated that 36 persons connected with the Soviet Embassy in London, including 2 members of the Trade Delegation, enjoy diplomatic immunity. Foreigners who possess this privilege can enter this country with an unlimited amount of baggage which the customs officials cannot examine.

The Morning Post (February 20, 1930) published the following:

"Nothing could better illustrate the utter worthlessness of the Soviet promise to Mr. Henderson, the Foreign Secretary, to cease Communist propaganda in Britain than an institution in London's Dockland.

"Posing as an innocent club, this institution is actually the clearing house in Great Britain for inflammatory literature of all kinds.

"It consists of a couple of small rooms in a house, and the officials in charge have been entrusted, among other things, with the work of fomenting revolution among ships' crews.

"The 'club' is also one of the principal agencies by which 'Red' gold is smuggled into Britain. Advantage is taken of the fact that the crews of Russian ships visiting London are allowed ashore, while British crews in Russian ports also obtain shore leave.

"The money is handed to trusted emissaries of the Communists and brought to England in sailors' pocket cases and belts. Afterward it reached, in devious ways, the headquarters of the Communists in Britain.

"The club officials are in correspondence with extremist movements in every part of the world, and recently a large batch of letters was received from India announcing the advent of what was described as a 'blood bath.'

"Seamen visiting this club are supplied with every sort of revolutionary literature, and are given introductions to clubs in various ports. By this means young British seamen fall into the clutches of the worst kind of international political scum to be found in towns such as Buenos Aires, Barcelona, Marseilles, and Hamburg.

"Strenuous efforts are being made to establish these clubs in other British ports. The London center is the clearing house for the despatch of the worst type of Communist literature. This is received from Russia, translated into English, printed at a press in the home counties, and distributed everywhere."

About 30 to 40 years ago thousands of miners were imported into Scotland from eastern Europe and since then more have come over on various excuses as relatives, and so forth.

The following, from the Evening News of October 2, 1931, is interesting:

"Why there are so many Communists on Clydeside is explained by Mr. Bain Irvine in the Scots Yearbook for 1932. He says: 'Large and ever-increasing numbers of Poles have settled in the mining districts of the west of Scotland.'

"They are largely responsible for the great sympathy with the Communist movement for which such a town as Motherwell, for example, is noteworthy. And the woldsmen of the Clyde owe their following largely to the Bolshevik doctrines which have been so assiduously preached by those strangers in our midst.

"'Now these Poles are, one by one, dropping their original names and assuming those of their Scottish wives, or they are altering their own so that it has more of a Scottish flavor. Thus Simski becomes Simpson and Watski alters readily to Watson.'"

The large proportion of aliens or children of aliens in the Glasgow area is mainly the result of this large immigration.

"P. S. S.," in a letter in The Patriot of October 8, 1931, said:

"Sir: The disturbances in Glasgow draw attention again to the number of aliens to be found in some of the Scottish coal fields and in other industries.

"It was my duty as a railway employee at a remote village in a beautiful part of Ayrshire regularly to handle large sacks of black bread which were sent in for the use of the Polish community, whose presence seemed incongruous to the Scots, who resented the policy of a large colliery company in employing such labor at the pits.

"These aliens naturally make pliant material (as do types of Irish revolutionaries, advocates of 'home rule' for Scotland under Irish dictatorship) for the advocates of sedition and mass disturbance, knowing and caring nothing about the solid traits of Scottish and British life.

"One cannot, of course, blame these aliens for everything, but the effect of them is as a boomerang to the proprietors who encourage them as some protection against the ruinous policy of trade-union bosses to prevent profit-earning in the coal industry."

The Daily Mail (September 19, 1929) says:

"Pravda of September 12 states that two Soviet delegates are leaving Moscow for Scotland to take part in the Scottish miners' conference which is to take place on September 28.

"The paper says that the delegates are going at the invitation of the Scottish Miners' Union, which is affiliated to the Red Trade Union International.

"The two delegates are members of the international miners' committee of action and propaganda."

In Ireland the new organization, Saor Eire, is believed to have directed affiliation with the Bolsheviks.

The Dublin correspondent of the Daily Mail reported (October 17, 1931), regarding the situation in Ireland, that the Irish Cabinet was seeking from the Irish Parliament stronger powers. This had been made necessary by the discovery of a scheme by those who are at the dictation of Moscow to kidnap or intimidate the Deputies and so bring to naught the plans of the Government. Since then Mr. De Valera has ousted Mr. Cosgrove from office.

The Morning Post (October 27, 1931), said "Many people are lulled into a false sense of security by the apparent quiet on the revolutionary front, the minority movement (formerly the Red International) is very busy in the trade-unions.

Our last Socialist government seem to have been associated and cooperating with anti-British elements all over the world.

In October 1931 M. Chiappe, prefect of the Paris police, visited London. One of his objects was the development of a scheme he had formulated for international action to combat Communist agitation and political crimes. It is clear that police cooperation is desirable on a more comprehensive scale than at present.

It is significant that M. Chiappe did not come on this mission until the Socialist ministry had fallen. No doubt the French Government knew fully about the revolutionary activities of our Socialist gang and that it would be useless to send such a mission whilst they were in office.

In the winter of 1930–31 the United States of America held a Government commission on the alien question. On the recommendation of this commission the United States of America decided to deport about 120,000 undesirable aliens. Most of these people were anarchists or criminals in their native countries. It was therefore impossible for them to return home. Whither did they go? As other countries, except the British Isles, have a thorough system re immigration or registration of aliens, many of these undesirables naturally made for this country. No doubt many knew that under the Socialist regime regulations re aliens had been further relaxed. Did Bukharin come here in July 1931 to help to organize these anarchists?

This Commission reported that 70 percent of the advocates of revolution, in the United States of America, were aliens. The Commission highly praised the American Federation of Labor for repulsing all Communists' attempts to bore from within and for frustrating completely all subversive efforts. (Daily Mail, New York correspondent, January 19, 1931.)

This is a fine example to our labor leaders and Socialist politicians who have been acting for several years past under the dictatorship of Moscow.

When all the above facts have been considered by readers who take an interest in the affairs of our unfortunate country, they will not be surprised that there has been so much unrest in the British Isles of late; not only labor strikes and a great increase of crime with violence, but such serious matters as mutinies in our Navy. It would be interesting to know how many of the rebellious convicts in Dartmoor were aliens.

And it is not fair to other countries, who deal with anarchism within their own territories in a drastic manner, to allow this large and well-organized center of anarchism to be here, not only unmolested, but even encouraged and financed while it plans in a thorough and masterly but sinister manner the destruction of civilization.

It is greatly to be regretted that so many clergy of the Church of England show their sympathy with the Moscow gang. To give one instance out of many: On June 27, 1931, a garden party was given in the grounds of King's College, London, W. 8, to Mme. Sokolnikov, wife of the Soviet Ambassador. This was organized by the Society for Cultural Relations With Soviet Russia, whose parent society is in Moscow. This body was established by the Soviet Government for promoting communism among the "intellectuals." The garden party was attended by several well-known foreign anarchists and the Dean of Canterbury. Dr. Hewlett Johnson presided at the function.

Did this leader of our church realize that he was supporting an organization responsible for one of the greatest campaigns against Christianity that the world has known?

In December 1939 Lord Glasgow and that great patriot, the late Prebendary Gough, with the aid of the Morning Post, inaugurated the National Christian Protest Movement against the Soviet destruction of the Christian religion in Russia and the Bolsheviks' war against God in other countries. It is difficult to understand why our church did not wholeheartedly support this fine effort.

The Soviet of Moscow are destroying all religions in Russia and Turkey, and their agents, who have now seized the government in Spain, are doing the same thing in that unfortunate country.

Regarding Australia, in the second edition of this book, published January 1929 I wrote:

"The serious communism and unrest in Australia has been fomented in much the same manner by aliens and renegade British, mostly Irish, supplied with alien money. Theodore, of Polish extraction, late premier of Queensland (now in New South Wales), Johannsen, a Dane, and others of alien origin, have, by their Communist schemes and intrigues, brought about a very serious state of affairs in that country. Should Australia experience any sort of set-back, such as drought, there will probably be a financial crash, which would be the opportunity for the financiers of Berlin and New York to come forward with some of their surplus money, and so get Australia well in their grip."

How true this has proved can be gathered from private letters received by the author from leading men in Australia. The Melbourne Argus (November 8, 1929) states that Australia is determined to protect herself from Bolshevist propaganda. This is not an imaginary danger. There is abundant evidence to prove that Moscow has well-defined channels of communication with agitators in the Commonwealth who are in touch with Russia and have taken an active part in the promotion of disastrous industrial strife.

The special correspondent of the Daily Mail (July 7, 1928) stated that Mr. Brodsky Marlen (or Marx-Lenin) had founded in Sydney the International Seamen's Club.

The Morning Post Australian correspondent said (October 24, 1931) that the government's appeal to the men to man the ships and a statement that the government would support the police forces of the states to protect volunteers, brought bitter attacks from Garden, Johannsen, and other extremist leaders.

The Daily Mail (October 30, 1931) stated that Communists, many of whom were foreigners, took charge of a meeting of the Seamen's Union at Sydney and, despite opposition by officials, decided on a strike at all ports.

The Daily Mail correspondent at Sydney reported (December 12, 1931) that with reference to Communist meetings "Mr. Scullin declared last night that the Communist theory was all right and refused to consider the organization unlawful."

But Canada is handling the Communists in a practical manner. By law in that country they are an unlawful association.

"At Toronto yesterday the Supreme Court of Ontario dismissed an appeal by eight members of the Communist Party of Canada from conviction and sentences on charges of acting as an unlawful association. The court, however, ruled that a charge of seditious conspiracy could not be upheld, but declined to interfere with the sentences, which range from 1 to 5 years' imprisonment. All the prisoners save one, who is a native-born Canadian, will be deported at the end of their sentences." (Times, February 20, 1932.)

In India the gigantic network of Communist centers and propaganda has been shown up in the press. These Soviet agents are mostly natives of India who have been educated at the School of Oriental Propaganda in Moscow.

As to the Far East, one of the avowed aims of the Moscow Soviet is to destroy British trade in China. Karl Radek, in his England and the East, said: "English imperialism is forcing us to look for a place where it is most vulnerable. This place is Asia. Soviet Russia will be able to inflict more harm upon British imperialism in the East than British imperialism could inflict on us in the West."

Bukharin said (1926): "* * * our immediate task in China is to defeat the imperialist enemy."

More than one Chinese general has during recent years been subsidized by Moscow. One of the leading Communists is Feng Yu Hsiang, the so-called Christian general, who was educated at Moscow, and is at present back there.

Finally, it must not be forgotten that the revolution in the Rand mines in South Africa, 1922, was organized by aliens. Most of these revolutionaries were described as Russians. But the Government there, knowing the kind of people with which they had to deal, took strong and effectual measures. Thousands of troops were used and the Communist centers were shelled with field guns. Several of these alien leaders were killed and the remainder hanged. Many of the less prominent aliens were deported.

STATEMENT BY MRS. G. WALTER WILLIAMS, PAST PRESIDENT OF THE AMERICAN GOLD STAR MOTHERS

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, recently I had the honor of discussing the conscription bill with Mrs. G. Walter Williams, immediate past president of the American Gold Star Mothers. Mrs. Williams' discussion of this measure was most enlightening. She left a statement with me at the time which I am delighted to insert in the RECORD for the benefit of the Members and for the public in general.

The statement follows:

Gentlemen, I come to you, not as a representative of a committee or group which seeks a spotlight in the public eye or self-glorification for personal or political reasons, but simply as an American mother who lost her son in the World War.

I think it fair and right that those of us who went through the Gethsemane of 1917 and 1918 should pass on to the mothers of 1940 anything of the faith and anything of the experience we gained through suffering which might prove useful and helpful in alleviating the suffering of tomorrow.

It is a fine thing for you gentlemen to give me some of your time. You are busy, I know, and harassed by the pressure of various schools of thought on the momentous question you are about to decide upon. Conscription is a harsh word. Conscription is a word we Americans have usually associated with the tyrants of Europe and with the endless wars of that unhappy continent.

Because the word conscription has had these associations in our minds, perhaps it would have been better to have termed the bill which you gentlemen are considering by some other name.

But before I tell you of my feelings on conscription I would like to identify myself.

I am Mrs. G. Walter Williams, wife of a retired high-school principal of New Bedford, Mass. In June I retired as national president of the American Gold Star Mothers, a national organization of mothers who lost sons in the World War. Officially I still represent the Gold Star Mothers at important meetings.

In times of crises Americans have always found strength in the solidarity with which they approach the tumult.

We need more of that solidarity today.

The citizenry of America recognizes the crisis at hand.

The mothers of America are afraid, not only for our own loved ones but for the very way of life we hold so dear.

Motherhood, after all, is but a part of womanhood. Motherhood is a very wonderful part of a woman's life, to be sure, but it is not all of life.

As women, we mothers cannot but realize the wonderful position of women in America as compared with women in many other nations. And as women we mothers cherish the privileges and the happiness which have been permitted and freely given us under the American way of life.

So dearly do we regard these privileges and the Nation which makes them possible that to preserve them we'd freely, if sadly, give our loved ones and ourselves as well in any way the leaders of this Nation decide to call upon us.

Conscription, gentlemen, is not the end of everything. It seems to me as a mother well past the halfway mark of life that American mothers and American sons will welcome conscription now as the sane and logical means of building an army to fight the armies of those who would tear down the things we hold so dear.

We should have learned many lessons from the mistakes of 1917, gentlemen. And perhaps we did learn some military lessons and some lessons in international diplomacy.

But most mothers are not much interested in those things. We learned some more simple but nonetheless important lessons. It might be that in the pressure of considering this problem of conscription you gentlemen have overlooked some of the things no mother who lost a son in the World War can forget.

My son did not die a hero's death on Flanders fields.

He was not the victim of a cowardly submarine's torpedo on the way to France.

He did not get to France to fight.

I have often wished he had been able to give his life on the battlefield with the boys rather than die the way he did.

But he was nontheless one of America's boys who gave his all "to save the world for democracy."

January 30, 1918, he died in the Chelsea, Mass., hospital of influenza.

Shame of it all, he was one of the victims of unpreparedness, rather than of the disease, which took the lives of so many thousands of our sons who had enlisted to fight bullets, not germs. We were not prepared or equipped to care for the boys who were stricken.

Preparedness does not alone mean training boys to carry guns, to use bayonets, to man tanks, or fly planes.

Preparedness first means getting our boys and men ready to change their way of life. The American way of life is a soft life, physically.

Preparedness through conscription, then, means the hardening of our men in a physical way—getting them ready for things to which they have never been accustomed.

This takes time.

I am informed that the haste with which our men were rushed through training in 1917 was responsible for at least as many, if not more, deaths than were the German bullets, shells, and gas.

A boy or man trained to practice law or to be a bookkeeper cannot become a hardened soldier in 3 months or 6 months.

I look upon conscription as the means of preparing our men for what is to come, in order that they may have a chance to live, not in order that they know how to die. That they know already—there has never been a question about the courage of American manhood.

But a trained soldier—a man skilled in the ways of war—has an infinitely better chance of living to fight on, than the raw recruit with the heart of steel who fights, but dies.

The mothers of America in 1940 do not believe you gentlemen of the Congress have any thought of sending our boys to fight on a European battlefield. They know that England does not want our men—England wants and needs our matériel.

Many mothers feel that the hue and cry about conscription being the first and longest step toward sending our boys across to Europe is a straw man built up by those who either can't or will not see the menace Hitler has become to America itself.

Gentlemen, as a Gold Star mother I favor conscription immediately because it would be a major step in preparedness—not only of our men and boys to be soldiers, but of the women of America and of American industry to learn the lessons so necessary if our soldiers are to live to fight.

I do hope the Congress will forget the side issues which have been thrown in our way on this question. I want the mothers of 1940 to know that the mothers of 1917 hope that today's soldiers are made ready in every way that, if necessary to fight, they fight and live—not fight and die.

Gentlemen, this Gold Star Mother feels sure that conscription is an American procedure, because it is the only way America can be prepared to defend the American way of life. And there should be no delay in putting into effect this vital measure for our defense.

"The success of tomorrow depends upon the preparation we are making today."

Thank you.

The Country Needs John J. O'Connor Back in Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN L. SWEENEY

OF OHIO

Thursday, September 5, 1940

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I am confident that the entire membership of this House of Representatives will be pleased to hear that there is every expectation that our former distinguished colleague, John O'Connor, of the Sixteenth New York District, will be a Member of the Seventy-seventh Congress, which will convene on next January 3. As you all know, he is a candidate for reelection.

The great majority of the Members here who served with John O'Connor during his 16 years of membership in this House know of his great capacity for leadership. His absence during the Seventy-sixth Congress has caused universal comment as to how much he has been missed from these halls.

Those Members serving their first term in the Seventy-sixth Congress know of John O'Connor because of his Nation-wide reputation as a courageous statesman. All will recall that in the election of 1938 he was purged because of his independence of thought and courageous stand on great national issues, which position he took in accordance with what he thought was for the best interests of the entire country. The Communists and all the un-American and subversive groups joined in that purge to cause his defeat by a very narrow margin, but he went down a bigger man than he had ever been before, because of the enemies he had made.

One of the first men in public life to broadcast nationally against the menace of communism, he was branded as enemy No. 1 at the national convention of Communists in 1938.

All will recall him as a leader in this body—acting as majority leader for a long time. His 16 years' service on the Rules Committee equipped him as one of the outstanding parliamentarians in the Congress and in the country. As chairman of that powerful committee for 4 years, he was a respected leader of this House.

Every Member who ever served with him, irrespective of their party affiliations, was his personal friend. They all respected him for his fairness in debate and the courage of his honest convictions. Few sought to cross swords with him in debate—in which he never lost his smile.

For years he devoted his entire time to the duties of his office. He was even here during all vacations of the House, performing his duties as a member of the House Building Commission.

John O'Connor came to Congress in 1923 exceptionally equipped for his distinguished career in this body. Born of poor parents, he had gone through the mill—newsboy, school teacher, working his way through Brown University and Harvard Law School to become one of New York's outstanding trial lawyers.

For 3 years before coming to Washington, he served in the New York State Legislature, where he distinguished himself as a leader and orator.

His four boys, now in college, glory in the wide esteem in which their father is held.

Mr. Speaker, in these critical days, when our United States appears to be traveling the road to dictatorship, courageous men are needed in Congress more than at any hour in our history. That is why we look forward to the return of our distinguished former colleague, John O'Connor.

EXCERPTS FROM SPEECH OF GOVERNOR HOEY, OF NORTH CAROLINA

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following excerpts from the speech of Governor Hoey, of North Carolina, on the occasion of the dedication of the Great Smokies National Park:

North Carolina wishes me to pledge her 3,500,000 people in unbroken solidarity to the cause of real Americanism. The people of North Carolina believe in full and complete national defense on land and sea and in the air. They believe in requisitioning the necessary men and means to accomplish the desired end of maintaining our own freedom and independence and saving our land from the blight of war and the destruction of the American way of life. In order to achieve this result they are willing to travel the pathway of sacrifice.

North Carolina also believes that we have temporized with disloyal elements too long already. My personal view is that the time has come when the Congress of the United States ought to outlaw the Communist Party, the Nazi bund, and every other organization which seeks the overthrow of our Government. I believe in free speech, but that freedom should not extend to organizations which admittedly owe first allegiance to a foreign power and seek the destruction of the Government under which they claim protection.

We hate war. We believe in peace and love it. We love peace so well that we are willing to fight to preserve it, if need be. We believe the best security for peace is full and complete preparation for national defense.

"I covet for America the moral and spiritual leadership under God for the distracted peoples of the earth and a major share in the task of rebuilding the wrecked civilization of the world."—Clyde Hoey, Governor of North Carolina, preceding the President at the exercises Monday to dedicate the Great Smoky Mountains National Park.

EDITORIAL FROM THE ST. PETERSBURG (FLA.) EVENING INDEPENDENT

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Speaker, one of my good friends of some years standing is the editorial writer for the St. Petersburg Evening Independent, one of the outstanding Florida papers. He has always been a strong advocate of the New Deal policies, and we have frequently disagreed on questions of public policy in domestic affairs. He has usually favored everything advocated by Mr. Roosevelt, while I have, of course, felt that many New Deal policies were either wrong, or badly administered, or both. At the same time I have always had a very high opinion of his analyses and his arguments in support of his positions. Consequently, I was very surprised and pleased to read his views as expressed in the following editorial comment on the recent speech of Candidate Wallace. In my opinion this editorial comment on the subject of Candidate Wallace's address offers more stimulating food for thought than any which has as yet appeared anywhere. I also feel that the next time I have the pleasure of seeing my friend, Lee Morris, that we will not argue quite as vehemently as we have in the past. Perhaps Mr. Morris, like Saul, has seen the Light of Damascus.

[From the St. Petersburg (Fla.) Evening Independent of August 31, 1940]

ROOSEVELT IS RUNNING AGAINST HITLER

Before this war broke out in Europe, even before the appeasement at Munich, we outlined for our readers the policy which would have to be adopted—if indeed it were not already too late—to keep Germany from becoming a menace to the peace of the world. We believed them and we believe now that this policy, if it had been adopted in the twenties, would have kept the peace of the world. We believe now that this policy, whether Germany wins or loses against England, must be adopted after the armistice, if there is to be no third World War. It was by no means original with us, but merely a restatement of the only policy which has kept great competing powers at peace for any length of time. It has been and is the policy of the United States toward most of the nations of the world, whether they be dictatorships or democracies. And before commenting on the acceptance speech of Secretary Wallace we should like to review this policy.

It is simple enough: No concessions to force; fair dealings with nations which offer to deal fairly.

This is the policy which today is often labeled "appeasement." It was never that. If Chamberlain and Daladier had adopted it at Munich, the four-power pact would never have been signed there. If England and France had adopted it in the twenties, Hitler would never have become the leader of Germany.

The policy we mean takes a middle course.

At one extreme is a policy of no compromise—Germany is rotten through and through, and punishment for the Kaiser's guilt must be inflicted on men and women who in 1914 had not yet been born. No matter how willing Germany may be, under her new leadership, to do the right thing her people must be kept underfoot.

At the other extreme is the policy adopted in the thirties, an abject policy of surrender to the least sign of force—appeasement, in short. Germany under the Nazis committed one illegal act after another. She rearmed; she fortified the Rhineland; she annexed Austria; she helped overthrow the legitimate government of Spain; finally she took Czechoslovakia—and all with the tacit consent of Britain and France. That was real appeasement.

The ideal policy would have been one which permitted Germany to become economically strong and contented on the one hand, but which forbade her to rearm and menace the peace of the world on the other. That would have been the wise middle course before this war; it will be the wise middle course after it.

Translated into concrete terms, this policy would mean that if Germany should lose this war, she would have to give up her domination of non-German peoples, get rid of her Nazi rulers, disband her military forces, and hand over her arms; but it would mean also that when she had done those things she would be treated fairly and honorably.

If Germany should win this war, this policy would mean that no slightest concession should be made by the United States to the threat of force; but it would also mean that if by any chance Germany were willing to deal fairly with us, we should offer her the same fair treatment in return that we now offer to such offensive powers as Japan and Russia.

This middle course, in our opinion, is the only one which would not lead us into certain war if Germany won. We have seen the results of appeasement. And history is full of examples of the disastrous result of a no-compromise policy which says, in effect: "The world isn't big enough for the two of us."

How do the two political parties line up on these three possible choices? Despite Wallace's indictment of the Republicans, it is clear that neither party favors a policy of appeasement. And Wallace's speech made it clear that the Democratic Party favors, not the middle course, but the other disastrous extreme of no compromise. Where the Republican Party stands is, on this issue as on most others, not yet clear.

We have written this lengthy introduction to our comment on the speech of Secretary Wallace because we do not believe the speech can be discussed intelligently unless the underlying assumptions and principles are clearly defined.

The Wallace speech started quietly enough, with an expression of appreciation for the nomination. Well, we were glad to see him get it, though we didn't like the way it happened. Henry Wallace is a good man, able, intelligent, earnest, and hard-working—the last man in the world from whom we would have expected such a speech as followed.

Suddenly he launched into a diatribe against Hitler, and he made it strong. Apparently under the mistaken impression that Hitler was running for the Presidency on the Republican ticket, Wallace contrasted him with Roosevelt. Hitler, he said in measured periods, stands for dictatorship, wage slavery, force, barter, war, and oppression; Roosevelt for democracy, the rights of labor, the good-neighbor policy, peace, free trade, and freedom.

But doesn't Willkie stand for those good things too? Wallace didn't admit it. The Republican Party, he said, is the party of appeasement. Not only the national-defense program but nearly everything in the New Deal had been "planned that way" as a bulwark against Nazi designs which Roosevelt foresaw long ago—and the Republicans had provided most of the opposition to it all. Moreover, the myrmidons of big business would force a Republican President to appease Hitler whether he wanted to or not; isn't Willkie their candidate? Finally, Hitler wants Willkie elected.

The Republican Party, of course, is not the party of appeasement. There is no such party in the United States, outside the "fifth column." The charge was unworthy of a man of Wallace's caliber.

We hope that whoever is elected in November will avoid war with Hitler, unless war cannot be avoided without appeasement. After hearing Wallace's speech, however, we are convinced that Roosevelt has deliberately turned his back on that middle course. (It is only fair to add that Willkie has shown no sign either of realizing that a middle course exists.)

Wallace enlarged on another of the favorite themes of Democratic orators today. The President, he said, saw all this coming at a time when not one in a million had his vision of the truth. He repeatedly warned the public what to expect. He and Secretary Hull sat in cabinet meetings and year after year told their colleagues what was going to happen.

Frankly, we think Mr. Wallace exaggerates. The rise of Hitler made the President uneasy, as it made millions of Americans, and he said so. But there is the trite saying that actions speak louder than words, and the President did not act as if he saw what was coming.

Why, if the veil of the future was unrolled before his eyes, did he permit help to be withheld from Spain when she was fighting Germany and Italy?

Why is it that today, almost a year after war was declared, the United States Army has not—so far as we can learn—a single complete, fully equipped and mechanized division it can put in the field?

Let's give Mr. Roosevelt credit for his sound guess that war would break out last September. (We said at the time that Senator Borah was taking a big risk in flatly denying the possibility.) But let's not give him credit for an omniscience which has not expressed itself in deeds.

Another oft-repeated fallacy to which Wallace gave further currency was the implied statement that we should determine our foreign and domestic policies by finding out what Hitler wants and then doing the opposite. Hitler, said Wallace, wants Willkie elected; he wants us to have a Presidential election; he wants to see opposition to Roosevelt; he wants us to ask questions. Therefore, we should call off the election; establish concentration camps for the opposition; and ask no questions.

Fiddlesticks! The best policies for the United States cannot be determined so simply. Hitler wants us to stay out of war, therefore we should go to war. Hitler wants us to send the American Legion by a safe route, therefore we should send her by a dangerous route. Hitler doesn't want Roosevelt to be a dictator, therefore we should make Roosevelt a dictator.

No; Hitler wants what is best for Germany, regardless of whether it helps or harms the United States. We should want what is best for the United States, and the heck with whether Hitler likes it or not.

Is President Roosevelt aiming at a dictatorship? We have been hearing this charge for nearly 8 years, and we have always, until now, felt that it was nonsensical. Dictatorship can only exist in a war economy, and the President, until now, has shown no disposition to establish a war economy in the United States. Therefore, we concluded, he had no intention of setting up a dictatorship. Even the defense program did not change our opinion, since despite its faults, it was a sound response to changing world conditions.

But there were parts of Secretary Wallace's speech (which, by the way, we are sure he didn't write) that set us to wondering. He implied that we should not be having a national election now, because Hitler wanted us to have one. He implied that there should be no opposition to any of the President's policies (just vote "ja") because it led to rejoicing in Berlin. He spoke scornfully of those who asked why—which seems to imply that no questions should be asked and the people had no business asking the Government to explain anything.

Thomas Jefferson would have turned over in his grave if he could have heard such statements made in the name of democracy.

President Roosevelt's Labor Day Message Discloses 9,000,000 More Have Jobs Than in March 1933

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 5, 1940

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S LABOR DAY STATEMENT

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the President's Labor Day statement contained valuable information. It was as follows:

Labor Day, which we observe as a national holiday, has for more than half a century been the day set aside in recognition of the millions of wage earners whose labors have contributed so largely in making this Nation what it is today.

This year, embarked as we are on a necessary program of national defense, the day calls for a more than ordinary observance. It demands the dedication of labor, management, farmers, and government to a common purpose, so that this great democracy which is our heritage shall be protected and its continuation be insured for our children and their children.

As loyal Americans, always placing the welfare of the Nation first, we shall, through this dedication and this cooperation, carry on successfully the task we have set in the common interest. In its accomplishment wage earners, well aware of the great economic and social gains they have made in the last 7 years, may be assured that their contribution will not be at the cost of lowered labor standards or impaired social advances.

On this Labor Day of 1940 not only the Nation's wage earners but farmers and business also can look with satisfaction on the improvement in their lot and that of our Nation in the last 7 years, largely as a result of a far-reaching economic and social program conceived in democratic principles and dedicated to the common good.

RISE IN EMPLOYMENT STRESSED

More than 9,000,000 men and women have jobs in nonagricultural employment now than had them in March 1933, and this great increase does not include more than 2,000,000 additional persons having work on W. P. A., C. C. C., and N. Y. A. tasks. In this same period pay rolls in manufacturing industries alone increased by the enormous weekly total of $110,000,000.

Cash income of American farmers was more than $3,000,000,000 greater last year than it was in 1932, exclusive of $307,000,000 in benefit payments, and this year it promises to show a further increase.

Business, like farmers, also benefited through the rise in employment and wages, as shown by reports which revealed that combined net profit for 400 leading industrial concerns for the first 6 months of this year amounted to $648,928,000—a very large gain over last year. In 1932 most corporations were showing little or no profit.

These are material gains of which we may well be proud and they have been accompanied since 1933 by such social advances as are embodied in the social security program, for which this and future generations will always be thankful.

They have been accomplished in a democracy, for a democracy and by a democracy, and they can only be retained and expanded through a continuation of the principles and practices to which we as a Nation have always been committed and which we are determined shall be unchanged.

Conscription and the Economic Condition of Our Country

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 5, 1940

LETTER FROM J. B. LAUBY, OF NEZPERCE, IDAHO

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I submit a letter from J. B. Lauby, prominent businessman and farmer of Nezperce, Idaho, which deals comprehensively with conscription of the Nation's youth, and bespeaks greater attention to conditions aggravating the economic situation in this country.

NEZPERCE, IDAHO, August 16, 1940.

Hon. COMPTON I. WHITE,
United States Representative, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WHITE: I noticed by recent press reports that you are opposed to conscription of our young men for military training. I find that most of the people here feel that you are right.

I hold that conscription without a more reasonable compensation for our boys results in a feeling of resentment against the Government not only from the boys themselves, but also from their parents and relations and friends, and which will be highly detrimental to our democracy.

The behavior of the recent Youth Congress in Washington, D. C., should be a lesson to our officials. Conscription without a better compensation will aggravate the matter.

We must remember that it is very difficult to get a start in life under our present system, and now the Government is going to impose upon these boys by taking away 2 to 3 years of their prime of life in which they would otherwise at least have a chance of making a start, and they are wasting this time to become able to fight the battles for the rest of our citizens.

Wouldn't it be better to offer them some inducement to take this training by connecting with it a higher education to give them an easier start in life, or for those who care not to study and prefer farm life the Government should buy them a farm, all equipped, to be paid for in easy payments extending over a period of years at a rate of interest not to exceed 2 percent.

Or the Government should promise them a position after the term of training so they would have the opportunity to start family life and become good citizens.

I hold that if these boys are to defend our country we should give them a start in life after their training. They are absolutely entitled to it. You cannot make loyal citizens and good soldiers out of our boys when you coerce them into military training and not give them a living chance for a future.

Such a democracy cannot endure. It is doomed. This sequence is inevitable.

I am willing to admit that the present administration has done a lot for the common people. But it has to do a lot more to reduce the number of the poor people. In fact here their number is increasing. A few large farmers are grabbing all the land with their large allotment checks and the poor sharecropper is rapidly losing out. There is absolutely no more land obtainable on a rental basis.

Even a number of businessmen in the cities are buying land as an investment, for the allotment checks pay for the tillage of the soil and the proceeds from the crops is practically a net profit. But the poor sharecropper loses his home.

The richer are getting richer, and the poorer are getting poorer, and that leads us into the same trouble that Europe is experiencing today. No government can endure under such conditions. Unless we remedy the condition, America will soon become a fertile field for a dictator. We are supposed to be neutral in the European conflict, and as such we have no right to openly criticize one or the other unless we are ready to back it by declaring war. We wasted billions of dollars at one time to set them aright. But it was an utter failure and even aggravated conditions. Henceforth let us spend the billions on our own people, providing the poorer families with small farms and homes on the easy-payment plan with a low rate of interest. The Government does not lose in such a proposition.

Very truly yours,

J. B. LAUBY,
Secretary, Nezperce Grain Growers, Inc.

Americanism in Peril

OF
HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 4, 1940

ARTICLE BY J. EDGAR HOOVER

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, for nearly two decades we have permitted a form of hypnosis to creep upon our Americanism and a semblance of hibernation to be attached to our patriotism. Now, with European nations found crushed as grain between the millstones, we rouse from our lethargy to face the cold facts.

There has never been a time when there was greater need for a revival of the fires that burned in the hearts of the founders of the Nation than today, if we are to preserve our democratic institutions, religious freedom, and respect for our form of government.

Hon. J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, brings the issues squarely in front of this Nation in an article entitled "Americanism in Peril" in the current issue of Signs of the Times, a widely read religious publication. His article, presented here with the unanimous consent of the House of Representatives, follows:

[From Signs of the Times magazine]

(By J. Edgar Hoover)

This Nation's present position of prominence did not result from accident. As a Nation we became great through thoughtful planning for the future and through an invincible determination to translate those plans into action. The time has now come when we must plan anew, otherwise hordes of schemers with fantastic ideas that sprang from unworkable and alien philosophies from abroad will eat away the otherwise firm foundations upon which our Nation is built. Vile and vicious forces are today seeking to tear our America asunder—killing freedom, ravishing justice, and destroying liberty. The one achievement above all others which America must preserve is that of good citizenship. By this I mean a preservation of our democratic institutions, freedom, liberty, respect for country, and better government through the efforts and will of all our people.

Without a superior stalwart national citizenship everything is insecure. The ideas which international propagandists would foist upon us are the very antithesis of American citizenship. Churches have been closed by the mere whim of a dictator; the members of the clergy have been humiliated. As has been the case in other lands, homes can be wrecked, businesses ruined, jobs lost forever, and personal security relegated to fearful outrages of secret police more criminal than even the worst murderers they can accuse.

Some of our dangerous gangsters have come from foreign shores. The worst of these, however, are not the murderers or racketeers. Far more dangerous are those who advocate revolution under disguise. Such masqueraders have not as much respect for constituted authority as has the average robber, highwayman, or murderer; at least the latter admit their crimes and, in many cases, accept their punishment as just and due. Those who would subvert liberty meanwhile shout most loudly for the protection of the Constitution while seeking to destroy its sacred guaranties. There is no such thing as liberty unless it is liberty under law.

A great many false notions of liberty are now quite common, due to plausibly worded propaganda designed by the seducers of our liberties to mislead Americans.

The notion is prevalent in too many communities that liberty means, "Do as you wish, as long as you don't get caught." That is why 4,067 serious crimes are committed every 24 hours. That is why a human life is sacrificed on crime's altar every 44 minutes, and that is why a robbery occurs every 9½ minutes, a larceny every 36 seconds, and a burglary every minute and a half.

Because of misdirected energy and perverted teachings, we have in the F. B. I. today the fingerprints of some 5,000,000 persons who have been arrested for an offense more serious than a traffic violation. Before this year comes to a close, approximately 1,000,000 persons will have heard the clanging doors close behind them as they enter jails, prisons, and reformatories, and all because they had not been properly schooled in the true meaning of liberty.

Because of misinterpretation of liberty, often deliberately brought about by inciters of violence, the Nation is paying a crime bill which in 3 years would equal our national debt. Hence every decent citizen should rededicate himself to a furtherance of liberty in its truest sense, defined by our democratic traditions. There is only one way to insure liberty to all peoples. That is by a firm adherence to justice, such as has been provided and established in our American heritage, and in our Constitution which we must preserve for the future at all costs.

America's duty to the future demands that the cherished principles of liberty be preserved for all time. We can do this best by striking at the forces which assail liberty—the lawless, the thoughtless, and the exponents of totalitarian serfdom and slavery.

We must and shall cope with this effort to enslave us through perversions of the truth. The first line of defense is the home, with its all-important atmosphere of expectations and fond hopes for the future and the training so necessary to develop future generations of Americans.

Modern law enforcement has demonstrated its ability to cope with the hardened criminal, but at best that is only first-aid treatment. The only permanent cure lies in killing the infectious and deep-seated germs of lawlessness with a thorough prophylactic, which is best administered by proper home training and environment.

Sinister forces of the underworld constantly seek new places to work their evil. Youth, more youth, are sought for this purpose. We must inoculate our young against such treacherous germs. This means proper home training, proper precept, and proper example. We can prevent more crime in the high chair than in the electric chair, whether that crime be against property or against our Nation.

Youth must be told about the slime and dirt that infest the underworld. Dishonesty is one common denominator found in all criminals. It must be met with the daily teachings of the virtues of honesty. In teaching honesty, you are also teaching Americanism. You are piercing smoke screens of falsehood and subterfuge thrown up by enemies of America.

The corruption of our youth by subversive activities is a violation of our American liberties and is an attempt to lure us into the fear, the injustice, and the slavery of totalitarian barbarism. And this is so regardless of the high-sounding names of hypocritical "front" organizations. Our greatest asset is intellectual freedom. Our worst menace is intellectual debauchery, which is as rotten and untenable as the filth from which it springs. Certainly we have a right to inquire into the character of our children's education. We have the inalienable right to see that they are taught the true principles of Americanism and nothing else. If young Americans are to be educated for the future, parents must accept the responsibility of seeing that this education is properly given for a better and safer Nation.

What are you doing to make your child recognize his good fortune in living in this favored land? Are you teaching him a respect for his country and its institutions? Does he respect the American flag as a symbol of liberty? Does he respect honorable forces of law and order? Have you compared his plight with that of boys and girls in other lands? Does he go to church, and is he taught that he is responsible to God rather than to some dictator who denies even the power of the Deity and charges that religion is the opiate of the people?

A flood of vilification has recently been loosed upon all things American by scandal sheets which espouse the cause of foreign isms. We must counter with a constant program of education, designed to penetrate this thinly veiled propaganda.

We must learn to judge people by what they think. These totalitarian tricksters are the very first ones who would introduce un-American, violent, murderous types of spy systems into our country. They desire to break down true law enforcement in every part of America under the guise of the protection of alleged civil liberties, so that they may, in turn, destroy the very things that they pretend to revere. Then they seek by a type of confidence game to steal away your liberty, your home, and your constitutional rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

These perverted people scream about the denial of civil liberties in this country, although nowhere on earth is there less liberty, civil or of any other nature, than under the foreign governments they so vociferously champion. It has been proved time and again that here they have every civil liberty which possibly can exist; that they possess in America more honest safety in life, liberty, and the pursuit of hapiness than in any other nation in the world. And when their rights allegedly are violated, the courts of a free land are open to them. Their rights are as closely guarded here in America as the rights of subjects are defiled in the countries whose views they espouse. Therefore what these people want is not civil liberty. They already have that. They are demanding, under a pretense of misapprehension and deliberate falsehood, nothing more nor less than licentiousness—the right to take what they will of our possessions and our traditions and desecrate them.

It is America's duty to perpetuate a heritage that will continue to be a beacon light of freedom and equality to oppressed peoples the world over.

We must ever be on the alert to protect our democracy from the bacteria of barbarism. We need to stand firmly and fearlessly on democratic principles, and upon no other foundation.

Our task requires patience and forbearance. It requires the faith of our fathers and the courage of present-day pioneering.

The motivating spirit of America must ever be justice. We need have no fears so long as justice reigns. May we consecrate ourselves to this sacred cause in order that our Nation may retain its supremacy as the exemplification of true democracy.

Three Classes of People

OF
HON. T. V. SMITH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 5, 1940

LETTER FROM A CONSTITUENT

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have the honor to insert in the RECORD a letter from a constituent that seems to me to be filled with good sense well expressed, Mr. H. J. Rickert, of Chicago:

THREE CLASSES OF PEOPLE

Hon. T. V. SMITH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: It has often been said, and I believe it to be true, that to find a solution to any problem, we must first thoroughly understand the problem itself. But no matter how pithy a saying may appeal to us, it serves no worth-while purpose unless we can apply it as a factor in the development of a better understanding of life and its multicolored expression in those by whom we are surrounded.

Today events and situations change with rapidity as humanity takes action or refrains from action, while striving to learn what action to be undertaken, and action to be not engaged in, and distinguish these two from inaction.

However, the judgment day is now upon us. Humanity is coming of age—the child stage is over for weal or woe, for good or ill. Men must decide for themselves the way that the world, their governments, and their social order must go. This decision will have to be made by those of us whose normal inclination and natural tendencies are on the side of law and order, and whose will to do good is directed toward right human relations and true human welfare.

It is therefore essential that such enlightened people back their judgment with a focused will to bring in the era wherein such values will dominate and take such necessary measures to make these values possible.

I am sure we all recognize at this time of world crisis the three groups of people who embody the three major points of view of the whole of humanity, plus the unthinking masses swayed by propaganda, controlled by their governments and the prey of the loudest voices. These three world attitudes are to be found in every nation as well as in the consciousness of every single individual.

GROUP NO. 1

The ancient entrenched forces of aggression, of material acquisition and pure selfishness, working out through a pronounced cruelty which reaches out and grasps what it wants irrespective of any other rights, historical, legal, or the will of anyone.

Every nation has these selfish, aggressive people, who believe that might is right, and that man must be governed by the law of the jungle, taking what he wants, no matter at what cost to others. Civilization, however, is a universal human right and not the prerogative of one nation or one group.

The forces of spiritual purpose, embodied in the will to protect the rights of others along with individual rights; to end aggression and its consequent fear and to throw the weight of their combined influence on the side of the more spiritual values, of human freedom and the right to think, and of kindness; the will-to-good and peace.

Every nation also has those within its borders who see the vision of right human relations—who seek to live by the law of brotherhood; who desire peace, kindness, and good will to rule world affairs and control the policies of the governments. Liberty, however, is a thing of the human soul and is found throughout the entire human race.

The forces of mass negativity, as expressed today by the dominated people in the strongholds of aggression and by the neutrally minded people everywhere. These are all colored by racial fear, by the instinct to self-preservation and by short-sighted, selfish interest.

Every nation has also within itself these neutrally minded people who fail to think clearly, who seek to place the blame upon the shoulders of all except themselves, who theorize and speculate, advise, and assign responsibility, but who refrain from any active participation in the process of adjustment from reasons of pride or unwillingness to pay the price.

No nation or group is exempt from this triplicity. It is human and that is why this conflict is a strictly human conflict and not a European war.

I bring you these contrasts in all simplicity and in an effort to enable you to choose right action, since the "effort to synchronize effort" does not relate so much to the time element as it does to the unity of interest and purpose.

In closing let me deal openly and frankly with the purpose of this letter by requesting you to recognize your responsibility to stand behind those who fight for liberty and to end the activity of those who are the enemies of all human freedom. As a voting citizen, I also feel justified in requesting you to tell me where you stand. You can be sure I shall not accept an evasive reply. The enclosed self-addressed envelope is for this purpose.

That strength and enlightenment may be yours and the power to stand and the ability to fight for the release of humanity is my prayer and appeal.

EDITORIAL FROM THE SPRINGFIELD (MASS.) DAILY REPUBLICAN

Mr. FLAHERTY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Springfield (Mass.) Daily Republican of August 19:

[From the Springfield (Mass.) Daily Republican of August 19, 1940]

WHAT MR. WILLKIE ACCEPTS

Mr. Willkie accepted much besides the Republican Presidential nomination at the Elwood notification exercises. He accepted the main structure of the New Deal, as it survives today. He also accepted the essentials of the President's foreign policy.

The issue of a third term seems almost to be a fadeaway, in view of the utter neglect of it by Mr. Willkie until the closing paragraphs, when he incidentally and briefly referred to it merely as one of the questions he would like to discuss with the President in a series of joint debates to be conducted in person by the candidates from coast to coast.

The joint debate challenge seems to have attracted more attention in the headlines of the Sunday papers than any other feature of the address, except Mr. Willkie's ambiguous stand on conscription. The point of the challenge is rather obscure, but Mr. Willkie said he was in dead earnest. Frankly speaking, a man so heavily burdened by official duties and difficult problems arising day by day as the President is, in this period, would undertake such an activity as a joint transcontinental debating tourney only at the risk of his health, if not his life.

Mr. Willkie's stand on conscription is ambiguous and the proof of this may be found in directly contrary interpretations by Republicans. Mr. Willkie said that he favored "some form of selective service," omitting all reference to compulsion. The country has a form of selective service already, for every recruiting office applies tests to candidates for voluntary enlistment and only those meeting the tests are selected.

Senator TAFT, of Ohio, an opponent of the compulsory service bill now pending in the Senate, has promptly announced that he was satisfied with Mr. Willkie's statement because he had not used the word "compulsory" in his discussion of the subject. Yet the Boston Herald declared yesterday that Mr. Willkie "did advocate compulsory conscription clearly and unmistakably," thus revealing himself as "unmindful of the little political expediencies of the hour."

Mr. Willkie's only criticism of the President's handling of foreign affairs, whether in relation to the Far East or Latin America or the European war, concerns the way he has talked. The Republican agrees with Mr. Willkie in this particular. The President has at times been guilty of utterances indiscreet and even mischievous and provocative. But nothing the President has done, or has proposed to do, arouses Mr. Willkie's opposition. He quotes the President as having laid down certain fundamental policies regarding aggressor nations, and then he declares, "I am glad to pledge my wholehearted support to the President in whatever action he may take in accord with those principles." Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Willkie are on the same limb; for, if Mr. Roosevelt "courts war," as charged, so does Mr. Willkie by favoring all measures helpful to Britain "short of war."

Recently, when Mr. Willkie announced at Des Moines his acceptance of the New Deal farm program, the Republican mentioned specifically nine other features of the New Deal, comprising in the main the heart of it, which he "need not hesitate to approve" also.

At Elwood Saturday, Mr. Willkie pleased this newspaper by accepting them all, in substance. He is even for collective bargaining with no "ifs" or "buts" in what he said—which will hardly set well in certain circles. For at least 10 paragraphs, beginning with his attack on concentrated, unregulated, and uncontrolled private wealth and enterprise, as it functioned prior to 1930, Mr. Willkie, at Elwood, made a first-rate New Deal speech. Later on, he revived the New Deal theme by endorsing, unqualifiedly, Federal unemployment relief for "those whom private industry cannot support," and Federal assumption of unemployment relief, from States and municipalities, is largely the explanation of the increase in the national debt.

In accepting, as a Republican candidate for President, what most new dealers think is the heart of the New Deal, Mr. Willkie builds up a mystery. He now ascribes to the New Deal a spurious "distorted liberalism." Yet he approves its works, at least in large measure. If these achievements constitute a meritorious record, why couldn't a liberal Democrat be proud enough of them to stay in the party responsible for the program's accomplishment, notwithstanding crudities and faults inseparable from pioneering and the bitter feeling that usually is engendered in all reforms by embittered obstruction?

Mr. Willkie says he hopes to rebuild American democracy. The New Deal has been rebuilding it in a dozen specific ways, and upon them he now places the imprimatur of his approval, as he accepts the Presidential nomination of the opposition party. Mr. Willkie is late.

Mr. Willkie may be elected President. Perhaps the best interests of the United States demand his election. Yet how late he is. He fought the T. V. A., trying to destroy it also on constitutional grounds. For years he gave the best he had—and he had great abilities as a lawyer-executive to give—to the Commonwealth & Southern Corporation, which symbolized the high integration of capital and financial power. Yet, at Elwood Saturday, he said the concentration of private financial power had gone too far, and "we all know that such concentration of power must be checked." When, however, the New Deal tried to check it, Mr. Willkie burned with indignation over the New Deal's creation of class feeling and abuse of all businessmen.

Mr. Willkie is late in his crusade for private enterprise. He had a glimmer of this fact himself in saying, in connection with the war: "If we had to trade with a Europe dominated by the present German trade policies, we might have to change our methods to some totalitarian form." Mr. Willkie, surely, cannot expect to see the old economic or political order restored in Europe during his incumbency in the Presidency. How far totalitarian would he go?

Even in Britain, a revolution has taken place. The Wall Street Journal's London correspondent, last week, said in a dispatch:

"It must be realized that Britain is going through a social revolution as well as the temporary upheaval caused by the war. This revolution was already in progress before the war and as always war speeds up existing trends. The wartime urge of the community to give its services to the state is bringing to the surface an already existing tendency to replace the profit motive in industry by the service motive. * * * But, whatever the outcome of the war, there is little doubt that many social changes are certain and that the community as a whole is ready to accept many modifications of the capitalist regime."

If that be true—and the witness belongs to the conservative school—Mr. Willkie's crusade for nineteenth century individualism, private enterprise, and less Government interference with it, is so belated that it is difficult to rationalize it in harmony with his own acceptance of so much of the New Deal's accomplishment. For the United States has embarked on an economic venture in national defense, or military preparedness, so vast that it changes the whole scene of American life and makes futile any attempt to restore the simpler individualistic economy of yesteryear.

An acceptance speech of this character from such a source necessarily invites polemical discussion. All can agree, however, that Mr. Willkie's description of his family background is moving and convincing. There should be no covert efforts, no "whispering campaign" designed to discredit him because of his German ancestry. The elder Willkies belonged to the generations and the times that gave to America that stream of German liberals of the later nineteenth century whom Carl Schurz inspired and led with distinguished patriotism in many a crusade for reform and the reinforcement of democratic ideals.

Compare Our Problems With England's Problems—Part II

EXCERPTS FROM THE ALIEN MENACE

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include excerpts from the Alien Menace.

Mr. Speaker, the author of this book is Lt. Col. A. H. Lane, of the British Army, a gentleman who, I am sure, knows what he is talking about. The reader will find that England's problem is practically our problem, and I have inserted these excerpts so that the Members may read and inform themselves as to the conditions which existed in England.

ALIEN INFLUENCE IN INDUSTRY AND FINANCE

Patriotic Englishmen often ask themselves, How is it that all political parties seem incapable of defending vital British interests? In preceding chapters it has been shown that since the end of the Great War there has been an almost continuous series of surrenders to the demands of foreign persons and organizations, and these surrenders have weakened the Empire and diminished Britain's influence and prestige abroad. The latest and most disquieting example of this policy of retreat is the Statute of Westminster—a statute based upon a compromising formula devised by the late Lord Balfour and endorsed by the conservative leaders. Under this statute, the dissolution of the Empire is possible whenever some determined faction in Ireland, South Africa, or elsewhere decides to end the connection with the British Crown. It is the sort of thing required by the anti-British elements to give their demands the appearance of legal and constitutional sanction.

As I have already stated in another chapter, we are not surprised at Socialists and Communists acting subversively, because, as we know, they are affiliated to all kinds of anti-British organizations, both at home and abroad. The information I have given in chapter XI, "The Hidden Hand," confirms what Captain Howard wrote in the North China Daily News, January 17, 1927: "Bolshevism is in reality the agent of a power working for world revolution and the destruction of our Christian civilization." But events since the war have linked not only the Socialist Party but all other parties with organizations outside this country. As I wrote in the second edition of this book:

"The headquarters of all these bodies are outside the British Isles. In fact, the British Isles (and the British Empire) are now to a great extent governed by parliaments and councils which meet in foreign countries. We have become subject to a supergovernment (the League of Nations), manned mainly by aliens sitting at a spot far removed from England."

I believe it is this foreign supervision of British policy that is responsible to a very large extent for the peculiar anti-British deviations of all political parties. But there is evidence of a still closer and more effective connection between the politicians and alien financiers than those already mentioned. Under the modern conditions of industry and finance, parliaments have become occupied more and more with economic questions and industrial legislation. And if there is a world-wide financial power directing revolutionary and subversive movements like bolshevism, we may be sure that this power will also influence the industrial and legislative policies of governments, and will make the politicians of all parties serve the aims and purposes of international finance. A financial disturbance, or the control of essential national industries, may be as valuable and as necessary to the unseen alien directors of subversive movements as strikes and riots or Socialist victories at the polls. If the alien financiers can devise plans to control and direct all parties, then their interests will be served, no matter how the people vote or what changes in party government may take place.

It is generally admitted by students of politics that whoever controls industry and finance controls governments. The magnitude of modern industrial undertakings has made large financial resources a necessity. The industrialist is now almost completely dependent upon those who can grant or withhold the money and credits he needs for the maintenance and development of his business. The creation of large associations of employers and workpeople and the national issues raised by their activities and conflicts have also compelled the State to interfere to an ever-increasing extent with private enterprise and to regulate productive methods and business procedure. Moreover, the growth of combines and mergers with interlocking directorships, and their agreements and important industries, into close contact with governments and politicians. In Parliament today the members of all parties represent big industrial and commercial and financial interests. In the present Parliament (1932) there are 646 companies represented by 601 directors, while in the last Parliament 546 companies were represented by 581 directors. And if we look at the 1924–29 Parliament we find that 694 companies were represented by 766 directors. Parliament is rapidly being transformed into a system of representation for business and vocational interests, but this transformation is disguised by the retention of the illusory democratic and geographical system of election.

From these facts it will be readily seen that all legislation must be viewed from the standpoint of the interests represented in Parliament. Under these conditions the relations between leading politicians and the leaders of commerce and finance are bound to be close and intimate. In fact, the director of some big industrial or financial concern today may be a Cabinet Minister tomorrow, or vice versa. It is, therefore, not surprising to find that men who have held high office in the State, either as Cabinet Ministers or as civil servants, are eagerly sought after on retiring from office and offered positions as directors of great industrial and financial concerns. This, in recent years, has become quite common. Ex-Cabinet Ministers and ex-civil servants have obtained very lucrative appointments in the city, especially in firms dominated by aliens. The business relations of these alien-controlled concerns with governments are now so constant and important that it is obviously a distinct advantage for these concerns to have leading politicians and ex-civil servants on their boards of directors or as advisers.

In this way much valuable information may be gained and many useful concessions obtained. This is, no doubt, the explanation of how aliens who control large companies and combines have, especially during the last decade, exercised a sinister power on the governments of this country. These aliens move in all circles—social, political, and diplomatic. They find out which of our leading men or rising politicians are pressed for money and, gradually approaching them, offer them jobs or directorships.

No doubt these Englishmen accept the offers in good faith. They at first think that they can do this financial or commercial work without it interfering with their political duties. But later they discover their mistake. They cannot give up their lucrative job or jobs. Incomes have decreased and taxes are very heavy; they have wives and families and positions to keep up. So the political work becomes subservient. They must sink their patriotism, their traditions, and their code of ethics which have been handed down to them by their fathers and grandfathers. They must sell their birthright as Englishmen.

It is no secret that some of our leading men who have been in Parliament for years have been subsidized directly or indirectly by aliens, from the time they entered the House of Commons, and in some cases before that time, for no ostensible reason. This, to a great extent, explains the extraordinary happenings so markedly evident, especially during the past decade, which have so puzzled those who take an intelligent interest in the affairs of our unfortunate country. It also explains, in a great measure, why England, which has always been looked up to as the Mother of Parliaments, finds parliamentary government more and more difficult.

How many of our members of Parliament have gone there for purely patriotic motives? How many have gone there to make a living, for their own aggrandizement, to get jobs, directorships, etc.?

The various happenings, especially since 1918, which have brought our country and most of our Empire in such a short space of time to the verge of ruin have not been merely coincidences without apparent connection as most of the public think. These happenings were so cunningly planned that in many cases they seem to have deceived some of our ministers; but in most cases, sooner or later, directly or indirectly, they tended to wreck our country and break up our Empire. Looking back it can be seen that there has been distinct coordination.

Those who have knocked about the world and studied affairs know that the extraordinary sequence of blunders and conspiracies in our Government are the outcome of a world-wide organization run by a collection of extremely clever, ruthless, and in many cases fanatical people, few of whom are of British blood.

Our leaders (so-called), men who have scarcely ever been outside the British Isles, have been bluffed, fooled, or bribed at almost every turn by "the hidden hand." Some of our so-called leaders have been led away by an insane ambition and desire for power. The combination of Lloyd George and Mr. W. Randolph Hearst, that very dangerous anti-British United States of America citizen and newspaper magnate, has played a great part in bringing about our perilous position.

When our greatest modern historian, Mrs. Nesta Webster, named her devastatingly instructive book, recently published, The Surrender of an Empire,[1] the title chosen gave a true interpretation of what has really happened.

The increasing control of national industries by international financiers is a most serious and difficult problem for many countries, especially in Europe. Britain, before the war, was the financial center of the world and this gave her not only world-wide influence and prestige, but it also gave the nation and its industries security and independence. The war, by impoverishing all European countries and leaving them burdened with debts, opened the way for the international financiers to control world finance and to influence the policies of governments by the exertion of financial and economic pressure. As Sir Arthur Michael Samuel, M. P., has said, the finance houses of the United States of America have "pushed loans on nations, cities, and commercial enterprises far beyond the limits of economic justification," and have "unloaded at a profit the paper certificates of those loans on the investing and speculating public." By these methods the United States of America finance houses, says Sir Arthur, have wrecked "a large part of 'impecunious' Europe."[2] Associated with this plan to place whole nations under the control of international money lenders are various schemes to form gigantic industrial mergers, financed and controlled by New York bankers and finance houses. Already this plan has been successful in Britain and other European countries, and some of our most important industries, especially electrical, films, aircraft, and so forth, are now wholly or partly controlled by German-American Jewish interests, though the names of the companies and the nominal directors may be British. It is these alien-controlled concerns that seem to offer the most attractive and lucrative jobs to ex-Cabinet Ministers and ex-civil servants. The appointment to the boards of directors of a few men who have held high rank in British Governments or in the civil service does undoubtedly provide excellent cover for the aliens who really own and direct these British industries and does enable them to camouflage their exploitation of the British people.

To expose this alien control of British industries in detail is impossible within the space at my disposal. The reader who wishes to obtain fuller information should read America Conquers Britain: A Record of Economic War, by Ludwell Denny. This book contains a mass of information and is well documented. Mr. A. N. Field, whose book, The Truth About the Slump, should also be read, says of this American work:

"In this book, which is little more than a thinly disguised paean of triumph over the creation of huge American-controlled (or in reality German-Jew controlled) international combines to the detriment of Britain, Mr. Ludwell Denny tells the whole story. His book is worth the closest study of all who desire to see civilization freed from its present domination."

Mr. Denny does not refer to the Jewish part in the financial operations he describes, but most of the industrial and financial concerns he mentions are included in the Report of the Pujo Commission (1913) on the Money Trust in the United States of America, and they are quoted in full in Mr. Field's book.[3] The American concerns that control many British industries today were then and are still in the Money Trust of the United States of America. In 1913 the dominant influence in this trust was J. P. Morgan, Sr., but, as our Ambassador, Sir Spring-Rice wrote, "Since Morgan's death the Jewish bankers are supreme." This means Messrs. Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and the Warburgs and their allied concerns, including the Federal Reserve Bank. At this point I interpolate a very important article which appeared in the Patriot of March 31, 1932:

"Mr. Eugene Meyer, whose appointment as Governor of the Federal Reserve Board necessitated two resignations, having become Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the particulars of his career published by the financial editor of the New York Journal on 19 January are of more than American interest. Mr. Leslie Gould wrote that:

" 'For the first time since the days of Alexander Hamilton the United States will have a financial czar. The czar will be Eugene Meyer. His power will be wielded through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation when it is finally approved and set up by Congress, and the land-bank system and the Federal Reserve. All three will be identically controlled, and Meyer will be the power on or behind the throne. Meyer is already Governor of the Federal Reserve. He is the father of the Reconstruction Corporation, which is being patterned after the War Finance Corporation. Meyer was head of the War Corporation. The land banks came in through the Treasury. Meyer for a time headed the land-bank system. Meyer, who is 56, inherited a fortune from his father, Eugene Meyer, Sr., who was a successful Jewish exchange broker in California.'

"He graduated at Yale in 1895 after his father had become a partner in the international banking house of Lazard Freres, where he served a 4-year apprenticeship.

"In 1901 the stock exchange firm of Eugene Meyer, Jr., & Co. was born, when he had just turned 25. Although known as the smart Frisco banker, Meyer in reality was never more than a large-scale stockbroker and market operator and statistician.

"Between 1901 and 1917 he had made a fortune of his own, and

" 'His first Government appointment was adviser on nonferrous metals to the National Council of Defense. Later he filled a similar role to the War Industries Board, headed by his Democratic friend, Bernard M. Baruch.'

"He then became managing director of the War Finance Corporation, which, against his wishes, was suspended in May 1920, by President Wilson's Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. D. B. Houston. He returned to the corporation when it was revived in 1921 at the time of the slump which he had foretold. After the final disappearance of this corporation he was appointed in 1927 Farm Loan Commissioner and a member of the Farm Loan Board of this period, and he reorganized the land banks, which were in difficulties. Resigning when Mr. Hoover took office, he has again been recalled to Washington in most important capacities. Among outstanding financiers, few have had such remarkable a career as Mr. Eugene Meyer."

Going back to the report of the Pujo Commission on the Money Trust, that report is worth quoting because its statements are more true today than when written in 1913, and the dangers described are now greater, especially for Great Britain. The Commission said:

"The powerful grip of these gentlemen is on the throttle that controls the wheels of credit and on their signal those wheels turn or stop."

The report goes to show how, through "the vast ramifications of this group" of financiers in the United States of America and in foreign countries, the financing of enterprises not approved by the group can be prevented.

"Therein, said the Commission, lies the peril of this money power to our progress, far greater than the combined danger of all existing combinations."

This group of international financiers through their control of the Federal Reserve Board and their world-wide ramifications in industry, can and do exert a tremendous influence upon world affairs. Sir Josiah Stamp has stated in an interview with the New York Evening Post:

"Never in the history of the world has so much power been vested in a small body of men as in the Federal Reserve Board. These men have the welfare of the world in their hands and they could upset the rest of us either deliberately or by some unscrupulous action."[4]

Mr. Ludwell Denny says:

"Many nations may laugh at our State Department but all must tremble before our Federal Reserve Board.

"High money rates in the United States early in 1929, for instance, forced an increase in official discount rates almost at once in England, in 10 European countries, in 2 Latin-American countries, and 2 in the Far East. And in almost every case that action restricted business and brought suffering to millions of foreign workers."[5]

Mr. Denny adds that this blow to trade "hit Britain hardest of all," and checked our trade revival. This is true. But Britain had been badly hit by these financiers before 1929. The preparations, begun in 1921, for Britain's premature return to the gold standard in 1925, necessitated the adoption of a deflation policy. In 1920 the Lloyd George government, in which, as Mr. Field says, "Jewish financial influence was very strong indeed," announced through the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. (now Sir) Austen Chamberlain, that the Government "had set its heart on deflating the currency." This was the beginning of the prolonged trade depression and unemployment in Great Britain. This policy of deflation was undoubtedly due to New York influence in the city of London. In 1925 Mr. Winston Churchill, Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the conservative government, restored the gold standard, and was complimented for doing so by a number of financiers and economists in London, whose names do not suggest British origin. Mr. Reginald McKenna, chairman of the Midland Bank, condemned this policy of monetary deflation and warned the nation of the consequences. Subsequent events have justified Mr. McKenna's warnings and have disproved the predictions, accepted by the conservative government, of the Schusters, Schroeders, Niemeyers, and Gugenheim Gregorys, who urged deflation and congratulated Mr. Churchill on his acceptance of their advice.

It was also in 1920 that the shareholders of the Bank of England appointed Mr. Montagu Norman as governor of the bank. Since his appointment as governor, Mr. Norman has paid frequent visits to New York, but his efforts to improve British trade do not appear to have been successful. His evidence before the Macmillan committee on industry and finance shows that he possesses the international mind and wishes to shape British financial policy in accordance with the needs of international finance. We do not, of course, question the good intentions and sincerity of Mr. Norman, but we think his point of view and his close relations with New York financiers have not produced the most happy results for Great Britain.

One of the officers of the bank is Sir Otto Ernst Niemeyer, ex-Controller of Finance in the Treasury, and here I would observe that among the high officials of our Treasury today is Sir E. J. Strohmenger.[6] Sir Otto in 1922 accompanied Mr. Bonar Law to the Paris Conference on Reparations. At this conference Mr. Bonar Law proposed a 4-year moratorium for Germany. The French refused to agree. After the failure of this conference the German mark depreciation began, and Germany defaulted on her payments. Sir Otto also accompanied the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Stanley Baldwin, to the United States to arrange for the funding of the American debt. It is not necessary to comment on the consequences to Britain of that unfortunate "settlement." (See chapter XVIII of this book.) In 1923 Sir Otto Niemeyer was one of the experts on the Exchange Committee set up at the Imperial Economic Conference. This committee, says M. Field:

"Declared that the Australian and New Zealand exchange, then standing at 30s. percent, would automatically right itself to the pre-war figure of about 17s. 6d. percent as soon as the gold standard was resumed. We know how incorrect that has proved."[7]

[6] Another high financier of curs and apparently a persona grata with the powers that be is Sir H. Strakosch.
[7] The Truth About the Slump, pp. 107–108.

This financial expert was also a member of the Treasury Committee, 1924, which reported in 1925 in favor of the immediate return to the gold standard. The benefits predicted by this committee have been falsified by subsequent events. Mr. Field remarks:

"So far as the writer can discover, pretty well every financial step of importance taken by Britain in recent years which has tended to make money dearer, to increase the dead weight of the national debt, and generally to depress trade, increase unemployment, and break the backs of the British producers and manufacturers has been distinguished by the support of Sir Otto Ernst Niemeyer." [8]

During 1930 Sir Otto and another distinguished authority on finance, Professor Theodor Emanuel Gugenheim Gregory, of the London School of Economics, visited Australia and New Zealand to advise on the finances of those two Dominions. While in New Zealand, Sir Otto Ernst Niemeyer stated in a press interview at Christ Church that:

"If the United States would lend money more readily to foreign countries it would help the situation greatly."

And when he returned to Australia he repeated this advice.

This statement seems to mean that the United States of America should lend to the Dominions. Why? Many countries, including the British Dominions, are already suffering from the readiness of New York financiers to make them the debtors of the United States of America.

The visits of these experts and advisers did not please many Australians and New Zealanders. Mr. Hughes, ex-Premier of Australia, protested strongly against the acceptance of their financial recommendations, and Mr. Field, in his book, expresses the views of many New Zealanders when he says:

"What it cost to bring Sir Otto Ernst Niemeyer and Prof. Theodor Emanuel Gugenheim Gregory to New Zealand has not been disclosed. Perhaps the good people in Christ Church who pressed for the invitation will tell us what we have gained by the visit of these two distinguished Englishmen—if that description is considered correct." [9]

Mr. Field's remarks remind us that Englishmen with foreign names are to be found at the Bank of England, both as its directors and official advisers. During the financial crisis in 1931, when this country was negotiating for loans from France and the United States, the British representatives at a conference in Paris were Sir Frederick Leith-Ross, deputy controller of finance to the treasury, and Mr. H. A. Siepmann, of the Bank of England.[10] I do not know who Mr. Siepmann is, and he may be a great financial expert; but I do wonder how it is that the Bank of England seems to prefer gentlemen with foreign names to represent it at important conferences to consider vital British questions. In January 1930, it was announced in the press that Dr. O. M. W. Sprague, professor of banking and finance at Harvard University, had been appointed as economic and statistical adviser to the governors of the Bank of England.[11] Dr. Sprague's predecessor at the bank was a Mr. Walter Stewart—appointed in 1927—who before coming to London, was formerly head of the Statistical Division of the Federal Reserve Bank in Washington, and had been special adviser to the New York banking firm of Case, Pomeroy & Co.

These American experts may be most efficient and admirable persons. I am not questioning their abilities or qualifications. I am only expressing surprise that an institution like the Bank of England should apparently be unable to discover persons of British origin and citizenship to fill such important positions in the bank. Nor can one avoid wondering whether this noticeable preference for American advisers and for persons whose names suggest at least alien extraction, has any connection with American—that is, New York—financial dominance in British industry and finance.

This American control of British industries has become very conspicuous in recent years. Attention to this fact was called by the Sunday Sun (Newcastle) on November 17, 1929. Below are extracts from its article:

"One great menace to British industry in general and to vital, basic industries of the north in particular, is the growing amount of control which foreign finance is securing over British industry. It is a movement which has been going on for years, but so stealthily that only those in close touch with the inner councils of business have been aware of it.

"If this insidious canker is not arrested, we shall before long find that the greater part of our most important productive industries and our public-utility services are under the direction of the foreigner.

"But the ultimate control must remain in British hands, no matter how great the amount of foreign funds which come here. That is the point of paramount importance. Yet, as things are today, there are abundant signs that British industries are ceasing to be British in everything but name."

The above protest is exactly my case against this alien control of our industries. The Sunday Sun goes on to show how even the processes for the liquefaction of coal are covered by world master-patents, and, almost without exception, those "rights are held by foreign corporations. * * * The result is that every ton of coal treated by one or other of those methods pays a royalty which goes to swell the profits of other countries, and which puts a further tax upon an already overburdened industry."

The article on this foreign control of our vital industries ends with this statement, which is absolutely true:

"The maze of 'agreements,' 'understandings,' 'associations,' and so on today in international finance is so intricate that it is sometimes difficult even for those in the stock markets to decide who or what is the ultimate controller. It is no wonder, therefore, that so few realize how much we are now dependent upon the foreigner."

The Newcastle paper refers to the American control of our electrical industries. We have not space for a full account of this control by the Money Trust of New York, but complete details will be found in Mr. Ludwell Denny's book, America Conquers Britain, especially in chapter 6, Dollar Versus Pound. I can quote only one or two extracts. Describing the world-wide ramifications of the American General Electric, Mr. Denny says:

"Meanwhile the American General Electric stockholders, besides large holdings in British General Electric, have become the largest stockholders in a giant merger of other British electrical companies which drafts British General Electric. American General Electric (through the International General Electric Co.) for many years had controlled British Thomson-Houston. Then it bought large holdings in Metropolitan-Vickers Electrical, Edison Swan Electric, and Ferguson Pailin. Early in 1929 those four were fused in a holding company, Associated Electrical Industries, representing 'the largest combination of undertakings engaged in electrical manufacture in Great Britain.' At the time of fusion American General Electric was the largest individual shareholder, though lacking a majority of the shares in value or in voting power.

"Negotiations are under way to merge Associated Electrical Industries and British General Electric into one complete British manufacturing monopoly, in which American General Electric interests would be the chief and perhaps the majority shareholders." [12]

Mr. Denny states that the American General Electric is one of the largest and most powerful "international trusts and combinations of international trusts in the world," and it now has partial control of the famous German General Electric—"A. E. G." (Allgemeine Elektrizitaets Gesellschaft).[13]

Continuing his account of the penetration of Britain by American finance, Mr. Denny writes:

"Utilities Power & Light Corporation (an American concern with assets now approaching $475,000,000) in 1929 acquired the entire common stock of Greater London Counties Trust, one of the largest British utility corporations. This London corporation controls the 7 chief British power companies, which operate on a monopoly basis in 95 cities in England and Scotland, and also controls the Edmundson Electrical Corporation, which owns 12 electrical supply companies. The deal whereby American capital acquired the entire common stock of this supertrust, dominating such a large portion of the British utilities industry and so many British cities, was investigated by the British Government. The Minister of Transport, Colonel Ashley, on February 18, 1929, told the House of Commons the Government had decided that efficient operation was of more consequence than 'whether the capital happens to be British or American.'" [14]

The chairman of this huge American combine was the late Earl of Birkenhead, who resigned his position as secretary of state for India in order to take up this appointment. Other Conservative ex-ministers also joined the board of directors of this American combine. Lord Birkenhead, in an explanation of his position, said that although the organization was associated "with the Clark interests in the United States," it was British, and would employ British labor and use British material, "and its entire staff will remain British." He added:

"So far as finance is concerned this has been found up to the present almost entirely through Clarke interests in America, but the broad policy of the trust is to obtain money in the cheapest market, and it is within its province to obtain funds in Britain if it is possible to do so at a cheaper rate than elsewhere." [15]

Mr. Denny makes the following rather caustic comment on this explanation:

"The language of a great legalist cannot obscure the fact that the Americans own this huge semi-monopoly, but it apparently indicates that the owners have agreed to use British materials and labor and retain, nominally at least, a British board of directors. Obviously such an arrangement is a happy one for the Americans, who own and control the trust—especially if such an arrangement will quiet British opposition to American financial and industrial penetration." [15]

I cannot give more space to further examples of this foreign penetration in other industries, including our air services and radio. But sufficient has been quoted to show how deeply alien financiers now control vital and essential industries. If these alien influences in British industries are traced to their financial sources in New York, we are brought around once more to the German-American Jewish financiers whose many and peculiar interests have already been described in another chapter. We also see in the above extracts the importance, even the necessity, of these alien financial operations being disguised by the appointment of British directors to the boards of these American-owned trusts. If these directors are ex-cabinet ministers and ex-civil servants so much the better. Under these circumstances the government—even a conservative government—can reply to questions that the foreign finance—and therefore control—in British industry does not matter. Such an answer is not consistent with the claims of an ultra patriotic party—the party that tells the people to Buy British, yet admits its indifference regarding whether the capital in vital British industries is British or foreign, and shows no resentment when its leaders forsake imperial politics to become city directors of alien financed and controlled concerns. In this foreign control of our industries and financial institutions we have the alien menace in its most acute and dangerous form, and unless we end this alien control we shall pay a big price for our folly and indifference.

Labor Day Address of John P. Frey

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 5, 1940

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, on Labor Day, John P. Frey, president of the Metal Trades Department of the American Federation of Labor, delivered a Labor Day address at Toronto, Canada.

There are many other Members of Congress besides myself who believe John P. Frey is one of the outstanding labor statesmen today. His speech delivered at Toronto had so much sound philosophy and good sense in it that I think it is well worth a place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD as a part of my remarks this speech delivered at Toronto, Canada, by John P. Frey:

It is always a privilege and a pleasure for a citizen of the United States to address an audience in the Dominion of Canada. There is so much which we hold in common in our fundamental conceptions that the citizen of one of these great nations always feels at home when visiting the other.

The form of government which each nation has established, the free institutions which have been fostered and developed, the conception that governments should only exist through the consent of the governed, have created an understanding and a friendship which has left the long boundary line between the two countries without a single fortification.

As a trade-unionist, interested in the celebration of Labor Day, I feel at home on Canadian soil, for the development of international trade-unionism, so far as the Dominion of Canada and the United States are concerned, antedates the organization of the American Federation of Labor itself.

In 1859 several local unions of iron molders in Ontario, affiliated with the Iron Molders' Union of North America. It was the birth of international trade-unionism, in the sense that those working at the same trade or industry in two countries, believed that their interests made it advisable that they should be members of one organization without a national boundary line to divide them.

The principles and policies of the American Federation of Labor are identical as applied in both countries. Canadians and Americans alike are delegates to their organizations' conventions, participating in making their constitution, in determining what the organization's policies shall be, electing officers to carry out the organization's purposes. There is but one vital point where the international relationship is not parallel.

There exists in Canada the Dominion Trades and Labor Congress, chartered by the American Federation of Labor, so that trade-unionists in Canada will have at their service a Nation-wide trade-union organization of their own, through which to secure the legislation which they desire.

In the United States the American Federation of Labor is the representative legislative body for Americans.

Neither of these legislative bodies interferes with the legislative program and legislative activities of the other.

Under this broad and sound understanding, international trade-unionism between the two countries has developed without in any manner interfering with the loyal devotion of trade-unionists to their flag, their country, and its free institutions.

It is well that these facts should be thoroughly understood, and particularly in this critical hour when the very existence of free institutions in the world is being jeopardized by the savage attack of the totalitarian countries.

Trade-unions and free institutions are interdependent: the one could not exist without the other. Unless there is freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and the right to voluntary association for lawful purposes, the parliamentary form of representative government could not exist, for this form of government ceases to function when the fundamental rights of a free people are denied.

Modern trade-unionism had its common origin in the mother country where, in 1824 and 1825, the British Parliament repealed all of the accumulated conspiracy laws aimed at labor which had grown from the time of Edward II. In Great Britain the trade-union movement developed until it became a definite part of the parliamentary system. At present some of its outstanding leaders are playing a leading and heroic part in their nation's defense as members of the British Cabinet, and in other important national offices.

Trade-unionism in Canada and in the United States has been influenced by the membership of those who learned their trade-union lessons in Great Britain and other European countries; yet, as a whole, it has been quite definitely a Canadian and American development. As one valuable result we have seen the development of the American Federation of Labor as the first and only international trade-union movement of its kind.

In their understanding of fundamental principles, there has been far-reaching accord between the trade-unions of Great Britain and the American Continent, but in its policies and its programs the American Federation of Labor has been wholly self-contained and self-governed.

In the form and the method of self-government within the American Federation of Labor, a structure of organization was developed which seemed best adapted to deal with the particular and peculiar industrial problems which developed on this continent.

Industrial and political conditions on the other side of the Atlantic, and particularly those on the European continent, in many respects have differed widely from those we are forced to consider in Canada and the United States.

Forms of government on the European continent, in many instances, have differed basically from those institutions of freedom which were erected by the founders of the Dominion of Canada and of the United States of America. The continental conception and belief that the people existed for the State to control or dominate, has never been accepted on our part, for we have been convinced that governments should exist only for the people; that they are the people's servants instead of the people's masters.

Years before the first World War certain European intellectuals had advocated drastic changes in the social and governmental structure which were in direct opposition to those which we hold to so firmly as free men. It was recognized by the British and the North American trade-union movement that changes were necessary, but not through the method, the policies, and the purpose which these intellectual revolutionists advocated.

Far-reaching efforts were made to propagandize within the unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor in both countries to so shape the policy and the purpose of our trade-union movement that it would conform to the implications of the so-called materialistic conception of history. All of these efforts—and they were many and persistent—failed to alter the fixed purpose of the American Federation of Labor to build up a trade-union movement which would be based upon the principles, the structure, and the form of government established by the citizens of Canada and the United States.

After the first World War the dictator-controlled Government of Russia launched a widespread propaganda campaign with the object of creating world-wide revolution and the overthrow of all other forms of government, including those which we had established. In turn, Italy, Germany, and some of the other countries of Europe set up this new form of the state's arbitrary control over all citizens and the destruction of free institutions, of the right to voluntary association, of a free press, of free political and religious institutions, and the regimentation of the lives of everyone under the dictator's control.

Every totalitarian government in Europe launched a systematic attack against all democratic forms of government. They pictured the domination of the dictator as the only way by which nations could work out their internal and external problems. They endeavored to lead free peoples to believe that their very freedom and the free institutions they supported worked to their injury instead of their benefit.

They enthroned might as the only influence and force to respect. They scorned government by law as it was maintained by free peoples. They ridiculed the standards of truth, morality, and justice which the free peoples had adopted as their guide and standard.

These totalitarian countries maintained their propaganda agencies in every parliamentary-governed nation and made use of their embassies and their consular representatives to direct this subversive and poisonous propaganda. They endeavored to convince the people of the parliamentary-governed nations that they were incompetent to govern themselves, that free institutions were incompetent, and that self-government by the people was a delusion.

The world is now in the throes of the most horrible conflict in the history of modern civilization. The outcome of the present savage, brutal struggle will determine whether free institutions and self-government are to continue or whether they are to be destroyed for the present generation. In this life and death contest for the perpetuation of liberty, justice, and government by law under free institutions, the American Federation of Labor finds itself definitely and basically involved.

Under the foundation principles which guide the trade-union movement, there had developed a clearer understanding of unity through federation of purpose. It led to the organization of national federations of labor in the principal countries of Europe. As time passed these were organized into an international federation of labor. This great representative body met in convention once a year, and through the methods of open debate and majority vote, decided what policies would be most helpful in assisting the wage earners in every country to protect their welfare and advance their interests. The International Federation of Labor survived the shock of the first World War.

Through the genius and statesmanship of that great labor leader, Samuel Gompers, the International Labor Office was created, the principal nations of the world becoming members. The International Labor Office proved itself to be one of the most valuable federated efforts which the nations of the world had made for a better understanding and adjustment of industrial problems arising within the realm of labor legislation.

Neither of these great international bodies are of much avail today. They have greatly suffered as a result of the ruthless military attacks which, in rapid succession, led to the German rape of Czechoslovakia, Poland, Denmark, Norway, Holland, Belgium, and the annihilation of French resistance. The Nazi policy that might, and might alone, makes right, that military powers alone should determine the government of the people, destroyed the national trade-union movements of the invaded countries.

Labor Day this year brings to the forefront an international situation more ominous than any which has ever arisen in the past.

When the Bolsheviks succeeded in their revolution, one of their first steps was to assassinate the officers of the Russian trade-union movement and enforce their edict against the right of voluntary association to exist in the field of labor, religion, or politics.

The trade-union movement of Italy was uprooted and destroyed as soon as Mussolini had gathered the power of a dictator into his hands.

The German trade-union movement, which was one of the most effective and best led, was annihilated in a single day by Hitler and his henchmen, and in turn a number of the outstanding trade-union leaders of Germany were assassinated.

Within recent months we have witnessed the German military machine rolling its brutal, crushing force over Czechoslovakia, Poland, Norway, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, and France. We are witnessing Hitler's present attempt to conquer England, from whom we inherited so many of our conceptions of human freedom, human justice, and a parliamentary form of government.

In the countries which have been ground under the ruthless savagery of Hitler's legions trade-unionism has ceased to function. Hundreds of thousands of those who but a few months ago were protecting their rights as wage earners through their trade-unions are now prisoners of war, compelled to work for Germany under such conditions as a brutal, arrogant dictator imposes—compelled to work in the production of war material to be used for the purpose of dealing a deathblow, if Hitler can have his way, to the free institutions of the parliamentary-governed countries.

Aside from Sweden, Switzerland, and Great Britain, trade-unionism has practically ceased to function in Europe.

From the reports received from Europe it has been made evident that a "fifth column" played a prominent part in Hitler's tactics, through the infiltration of emissaries into each country which was to be made the victim of Hitler's legions.

The beginning of Hitler's attack was not the movement of armed troops; the first attack came through the subversive activities of the "fifth column." The invading war hordes did not move in until the "fifth column" miners and sappers had prepared the way.

In a definite measure both Canada and the United States have already been attacked. "Fifth columns" have been busily at work within our borders. Representatives of the Italian and the German dictators have been active in their subversive activities, but so far as labor is concerned, they have made no effective progress.

The most dangerous of all "fifth columns" in North America is the one controlled and directed by Moscow. Since Lenin conceived his scheme for a world-wide revolution, American Communists, following the detailed instructions received from Moscow, have labored actively and ceaselessly to infiltrate into our trade-union movement. The immediate menace to Canada and the United States and their institutions comes principally from this Communist "fifth column," a "fifth column" which was unable to infiltrate into the ranks of organized labor until it succeeded in capturing a controlling position within the C. I. O.

As citizens we must be constantly on guard against "fifth column" activities within our country. As trade unionists we must be actively on guard against the Communist "fifth columns" working to secure a controlling position in our trade unions. Those who direct them from Moscow and those who carry out Moscow's instructions on the North American Continent, are cruel, cunning, treacherous, and without conscience.

The Communist who secures membership in our local unions is not interested in trade-union problems and policy. His sole purpose is to shape the activities of the local union and its international organization, so that policies will be adopted and programs carried on which will be in line with the purpose of the Russian-controlled Communist movement in North America.

Because of the grave national emergency which has been created as a result of the onslaught of Germany upon the free peoples of Europe, we must be on vigilant guard day and night so that no representative of a foreign country will be permitted to in any manner influence trade-union policy.

In Canada and the United States, trade-union principles and policies as compared with those of communism, are as far apart as honesty and dishonesty, justice and injustice, patriotism and treachery. There is and can be no place in our free institutions for the Communist, his polices, his so-called ideologies, or his tactics and his treachery.

As citizens of our respective countries, and as trade-unionists, there should be no question as to where we stand, in this grave hour of the world's history, this contest between the principle of control by dictatorship or government by law under free institutions.

Our trade-union movement has invariably indicated its stand whenever the Nation's welfare has been imperiled by war or otherwise. In the present conflict it will be our trade-union purpose to so conduct ourselves as to win the thorough-going confidence of our fellow citizens and of our respective countries.

As trade-unionists we have witnessed the destruction of the national trade-union movement in every country overrun by Hitler's ruthless followers.

We will not, and we cannot, sit idly by while Hitler, Stalin, and Mussolini plan to convert the members of our unions into prisoners of war, compelled to forge the chains which would shackle them to existence under a totalitarian form of government.

We are now facing the greatest menace which has thrown its sinister shadow over the self-governing civilizations developed in Western Europe and the North American continent.

Our duty as trade-unionists is clear. There is no confusion in our minds as to our responsibility.

I cannot conceive of a member of one of our organizations as a good trade-unionist, unless he is equally a loyal and patriotic citizen of his country, prepared to assume his full share, and more, in defending the Nation from the brutal, destructive, godless forces which brought on the present World War.

Dedication of Wilbur and Orville Wright Memorial at Dayton, Ohio

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY N. ROUTZOHN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 5, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES M. COX, OF OHIO

Mr. ROUTZOHN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein an address by the Honorable James M. Cox, one time a distinguished Member of this House of Representatives, former Governor of Ohio, and Democratic Presidential nominee in 1920, at the exercises dedicating the Wilbur and Orville Wright Memorial at "Wright Hill," Dayton, Ohio, Ougust 19, 1940.

The address follows:

The first impression one gets of this memorial site is of its poetic beauty. One would go far to find views like this one here, with the spires of the city of Daytor on the west, and the Mad River Valley before us to the east. Nature has been abundant in her provisions. On watch are giant oaks that sheltered aboriginal tribes and which now for the coming century must measure their endurance with the works of man.

The red man was not without his poetic sense. When possible he erected memorial mounds on majestic heights. Here he builded for his dead a testimonial of primitive reverence, presumably for his own who had played conspicuous parts in their day. Now we superimpose upon the sacred place of his plodding life an enduring tribute to two courageous men who dared defy accepted scientific dogmas and even death itself to bring to humanity the wings of the bird.

One cannot but link together here the symbols of these two periods of man's existence: the Indian traveling slowly by canoe and wearily by foot; his successor soaring as majestically as the eagle through the air. It took the better part of a day for the Indian to drift down the Mad River from his villages in what are now Champaign and Clarke Counties to this Indian memorial hill. Now by the lift of the clouds the distance is covered in a breath.

Today we merely add to the historic wealth of this pinnacle of moraine and rock and tree and shrub. It was long since marked as a memorial place. Tecumseh, the greatest of all Indian chieftains of whom we have any report, stepped out of his dug-out canoe and stopped here on his trips from Old Piqua, a little to our east, to the Indian village, now Dayton, at the confluence of four streams: the Mad River, Wolf Creek, Stillwater River, and the Great Miami. With good visibility one can here see the heights about Old Piqua. His eye catches, too, the Indian mound near Miamisburg, whence signal lights were flashed to the mound near Jacksonburg in Butler County. To the eastward were vast prairies, one of the few tracts of its kind in this State. Here the battle for supremacy between the white man and the red was waged, culminating in the victory by George Rogers Clark at a site, now historic, jetted in the horizon from this view.

The second thing that arrests attention is the chaste and artistic beauty of this memorial. It expresses the quiet dignity of the Wright brothers, whose words have never gone beyond the implied importance of their achievements. Next to their genius for invention, this fact will be handed to history as the finest quality of their characters.

It is appropriate that this proceeding be presided over by Col. Edward Andrew Deeds. His devotion to Wilbur and Orville Wright, when dishonest persons attempted to deny them fame, has been as solid as the granite in this shaft. Here we see the great air fields, instruments of a nation's defense, sweeping over distances as level as the sea, as if cast by nature for the uses of aviation and the final setting of this scene. But it remained for Colonel Deeds to see it all, and then to help in constructively rounding out this most important center for development in the science of flying. In these times when local communities expect everything from Government, it is an inspiring tribute to the Miami Valley that these great flying fields, as they now are, were presented without cost to become a part of a nation's resource. The records of this day would be incomplete without a reference to the happy culmination of events as conceived, shaped, and directed by Colonel Deeds.

We stand in awe as we reflect upon the first flight in yonder fields, and its tremendous results. It was short but epochal. The secret, stored in the mysteries of centuries, was out at last. Wings driven by the power of an engine soared through the air, and the door opened upon a vastly changed world. The miles flown in this country alone last year were more than 87,000,000 by transport alone. That is equivalent to flying 10 times around the world at the Equator every day of the year. The task with the Wright brothers was not only sustained flight of the machine, but with the weight of man also. The first ship built weighed but a few hundred pounds. Now we find, as the progeny of this ancestor, ships weighing 50 tons. Height flown then was not great. Now as gracefully as a whale in the sea, great transports swim in the heavens, above the moods and storms of nature. It was the vital beginning. The idea born and demonstrated is still the base. Blueprints of gigantic liners are grounded in the simple machine the Wrights flew here.

For a comparatively long time the flights of the Wrights were encompassed within the narrow perspective in front of us. Now there are almost 40,000 miles of established air lines in this country alone. This mileage, added to that in foreign countries and territories operated by American capital, amounts to almost 50,000 miles, or twice the length of the Equator. The streaks across the skies have grown into vast arteries, veins, and capillaries—a new organism in a world transformed.

The world is smaller, distance means little any more. Contacts that were remote and impossible are now made easy. The poles are within the areas of our scientific surveys. Into the darkness of the Antarctic night come the rays of the sun, gathered and transported by the hand of man, by the genius of Edison and the Wrights.

If there had been ample commercial and social intercourse between our sections in the middle of the nineteenth century there would have been no war between our American States. The soil of earth has been soaked by the blood of man for centuries because of the divisive effect of the frontiers of mountains, lakes, rivers, and the seas. Masses of men were drawn into war and death because they did not know the world beyond their narrow walls. A lack of understanding led to enmity. Provincial customs and languages kept peoples and nations apart.

The gifts of the sun and the clouds bring life abundant. That is the way of Nature and of the divine source of Nature and of the soul of man. In the universal scheme of things it must be intended that there be interchange of the produces of soil, of mind, and mill, and, above all, of mind; that understanding contact of soul and spirit with spirit which makes for peace and a tranquil world.

If all of this be logical, then the airplane enters in a major role. The cynic may say that navigation of the air has brought a menace to man and the world would be better off without it. Let us here and now nail this fallacy down, lest it take root and travel far.

We deal here with the broader, more permanent aspect of the thing. We view the part which aviation will play in that better world which must lie somewhere ahead. There are the gains already felt—the faster transportation, the magically speeded mail service, the vast relief to isolated places when food, serums, and any manner of help can be had through the air.

But what of these destructive sights we see? With every gain through his genius of a new power for good for man there has been, inescapably, an equal power for harm. Franklin was warned against playing with lightning. Let it be left in the skies, where nature intended it to be. There were public meetings in protest against railroads. The automobile spurred the heedless spirit of man and its abuses trouble us still. Who would be without it, for all that?

The airplane has added to the destructiveness of war. Yet even as the invention of modern firearms, with their pitiless deadliness, brought an end to private duelling, so the airplane may well be the means of ending war. In this world matters must often grow much worse before men can be stirred to better them. Man does not go cold because the fire which he discovered may burn his houses and ravish his fields. No; the almost divine new power which the Wright brothers bestowed upon their race will not be rejected or condemned because of its abuse by man not yet worthy of their strength.

We, in the Miami Valley, take great pride in this day—proud of those we honor, proud of their achievements, and proud of their careers as men separate and apart from their genius. There come into our minds the day of long ago when two serious-minded youths in their plodding efforts excited more tolerance than confidence. We read with understanding a book of 10 years ago in which this passage stands out: "The Wrights kept a relative silence and tolerated a partial eclipse, because they were shy by nature and upbringing; they became reticent to protect an invention that half the world laughed at, and the other half tried to steal. They had no gift for publicity, and shrank from clamor."

When the tremendous hour in their life came, and the eye of the whole world was upon them, they demeaned themselves as they had before. Naturally, there was great curiosity—two brothers working secretly and alone had made one of the greatest discoveries of all time.

Europe seemed to be more air minded then than our own country. Demonstrations of the machine there were sought with a persistence that could not be denied. They were proclaimed everywhere as the men of the hour. Kings and queens unbent to the common impulse. The monarchs of England, France, Spain, Italy, and Germany, eager to know of the ship itself and its possibilities in use, sought and had interviews with the Wright brothers. Statesmen talked with them in chancelleries where great men of history had been. They were honor guests at royal state dinners with the social elite of the times. The crown jewels of the ages glistened under the lights in the palaces. Truly these were gorgeous scenes. And yet in the midst of them the most striking thing was the quiet, simple dignity and self-possession of Wilbur Wright, Orville Wright, and their sister, Miss Katherine Wright. With that inherent refinement born of spiritual ancestry and matured in the religious home of their parents, they brought to crowned heads an appreciation of the glories of a free country that could produce men like these.

We see the Wrights when they came home to receive in the White House at the hands of the President the Medal of Honor that had been awarded by the Congress of the United States. We see them at the great homecoming in Dayton, one of the most magnificient spectacles of our time. We see them turning back to their shop and their labors, to the fields of their early pursuits, training men to fly. We see them called upon to defend their rights when others were seeking to take them away. This was a trying experience. They met it with their characteristic calm. They never sought to try their case in the press. They brought it to the bar of justice, and the highest courts in the land decided there was no question about priority of patent. They were the pioneers. We walked with Orville Wright to the bier of his brother, and I have always felt he would have survived the final illness if his strength had not been taken in the grueling ordeal of defending their interests in the courts.

That ended a most strikingly happy and mutual relationship. Each supplied at need what was necessary in the solution of many problems. Comparisons as between them have often been attempted, since men of rare accomplishments have always been an interesting study. The result of this always confirmed what the sister many times said to me, that there could be no preference given to either brother without unfairness to the other. Their talents and labors were supplementary and indistinguishably intertwined. We are still thrilled as we recall the day in the autumn of 1918 when Lord Northcliffe came to Dayton as the representative of the Royal Society of Arts of London, England. He brought as an award of the historically distinguished organization the Albert Medal. The final verdict of the world was thus formally rendered. The gentlemen of the Royal Society of Arts, famous for their conservatism and impeccable honesty, made their findings after a most thorough and painstaking investigation. Every fair-minded scientist in the world accepted as conclusive the engraved words on the English medal: "In recognition of the value of the contributions of Wilbur and Orville Wright to the solution of the problem of mechanical flight."

It is a sad commentary that the only taint on honor so meritoriously won has been cast in the name of an American institution by a small group of bureaucrats, the type that has so often done discredit to our Government. The pettiness of a few officers in the Smithsonian Institution is to be regarded more in pity than bitterness. It is an important fact that the Smithsonian, founded by private benefaction, derives funds from our Government for part of its support. It is a private institution when its agents seek to serve their private ends; a member of Government when Government aid is asked.

It is high time that the Congress of the United States inquired into the scandalous conduct of this quasi-official department. Driven by the irresistible force of fact it recedes little by little toward the truth. But it still stands guilty of distortion of the facts. The day, we trust, is near when Orville Wright in self-respect can restore to the Nation as a priceless heritage the old Wright machine, the instrument of man's first flight, and now under shellfire in England.

The Roosevelt Party Is the War Party

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM

ARTICLE BY DAVID LAWRENCE

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington Evening Star:

[From the Washington Evening Star of August 31, 1940]

WAR ISSUE RAISED BY WALLACE—SPEECH IS SEEN PUTTING FOREIGN AFFAIRS INTO POLITICS

(By David Lawrence)

Is President Roosevelt planning to plunge the United States into the European war if he is reelected in November? This question may have been academic heretofore but now that the President has publicly approved the amazing speech of Secretary Wallace accepting the vice presidential nomination, the point becomes very concrete and alive.

Mr. Wallace says, "Most Republicans may not yet realize it, but their party is the party of appeasement in the United States today."

From this it could be inferred that the administration is not interested in peace in this world but must needs bring American participation in the war to bear on the whole European problem before it can be settled satisfactorily. Such an interpretation would mean that the Democratic Party intended to become the war party. On such an issue the Republicans should welcome the debate.

Mr. Wallace did not draw a distinction between the use of the word "appeasement" in the sense of trafficking with aggressor States and appeasement in the sense of trying to keep peace in the world once a military decision has been reached. He insisted, in effect, that the United States could not conceive of any way of beating Hitler except by war.

ROOSEVELT THOUGHTS SEEN

The amount of space devoted by the Secretary of Agriculture to foreign affairs, with which he has had relatively little contact since he has been preoccupied with the tasks of the Agriculture Department, would seem to indicate that the Wallace address was really an expression of Mr. Roosevelt's future policy.

It is important that issues be made clear early in the campaign. Under the Wallace doctrine, American businessmen—assuming an armistice or a peace treaty—must continue to be hostile to the government which may happen to control the whole Continent of Europe. Even the prospect that the people may overthrow a totalitarian government abroad and thus bring a change which might make it possible for the United States to support democracies abroad is not envisaged by the Wallace speech. The Secretary rattles the saber and presupposes a world of continuous warfare in which evidently the United States is to play a leading part.

Such a conception of a third term for Mr. Roosevelt has not been widely held heretofore. This correspondent and others have repeatedly dismissed as absurd the idea that Mr. Roosevelt would lead this Nation into war either for the purpose of bringing on a crisis through which he might win reelection or to secure vindication for his previous policies. But the Wallace speech leaves every disinterested observer puzzled. The address was not an impromptu affair. It was premeditated attack on the Republican Party as the party of peace and can leave the inference that the Democratic Party is unashamed now boldly to consider itself the war party.

"Powerful elements in our opposition," said Mr. Wallace, "will, if the Republicans come into power, force us to make one economic concession after another to totalitarian countries."

RAISES WAR-PEACE ISSUE

There is absolutely no basis for such an assumption. Wendell Willkie in his acceptance address expressed his belief that America would beat Hitler on her own economic terms and there wasn't the slightest suggestion of yielding to the aggressors any advantages in trade.

It is surprising, therefore, notwithstanding the existence of the Willkie statement, for the New Deal strategists to decide to make a political issue out of foreign policy—the Wallace speech sets off the fireworks and from now the question of war or peace will become the livest issue of the campaign. Does Mr. Roosevelt intend to go to war after November? Why is he so anxious to call the Republican Party a party of "appeasement"? Is this intended as a means of inflaming public opinion and whipping up a war hysteria? The Wallace speech certainly opens the way to such an interpretation of the New Deal's political strategy in this campaign.

BUSINESSMEN COOPERATED

Any other explanation would seem illogical, for there isn't the slightest evidence that the businessmen of America believe in totalitarianism or that they would welcome Hitler's victory. On the contrary, businessmen are here in Washington with the Government to speed up defense, and businessmen, moreover, if the administration would tell all the facts to the public, have cooperated secretly to withhold munitions and byproducts from all countries which the administration thought should be deprived of sinews of war, and this happened when "moral embargoes" were applied without the sanction of law.

Secretary Wallace has libeled millions of large and small businessmen in this country. He has accused them of wanting to see Hitler win. He owes an apology to them all or he owes it to candor to name a half dozen American businesses composed of Republicans which have in any way indicated their desire for Hitler's conquest or for the making of post-war deals with the Nazis. A few more political speeches covering clumsy areas entered by Mr. Wallace and the Vice Presidential nominee of the New Deal will become more of a handicap than a help to the third-term cause.

Conscription

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEE E. GEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 5, 1940

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, both of my grandfathers came to America to escape the Prussian military dictatorship of conscription slavery. It is not strange then that I fail to see any connection between this violation of personal liberty and the American way of life. This bill is not democracy. It is Fascist regimentation. Is there a man in this House that will tell me that conscription has done anything for the democracy of Japan, Russia, Germany, or Italy or that it has preserved the democracy or done away with disloyalty in France, Belgium, or Holland?

Can you call this bill democratic when it provides for the selection of the unemployed and leaves to the employer the decision as to who shall or shall not be deferred among those that are employed?

LABOR

Has anyone noticed many really interested in the cause of labor coming out for this bill? Wall Street Attorney Clark, who wrote the original bill, is a member of the reactionary Economy League, and has no trace of sympathy for organized labor that anyone has ever discovered. The authors of this measure in the two Houses have never been accused of being over-sympathetic in labor's cause. Every labor-hating employer in the Nation is strongly behind this measure. The chambers of commerce approve it. Does this mean anything to you friends of labor? I believe this bill, to be passed under a hysteria of war fever, is nothing more nor less than a bill to bring labor to its knees. This bill will do what its proponents cannot and dare not do openly—rub out all the gains that labor has made in the last 7 years. What employee that loves liberty and desires to stay with his family will dare to take the lead in organizing or perpetuating a labor union when he knows that to get a deferment from service, he must get an affidavit from his employer that he is essential to the industry? Few employers would deem him to be essential if he was interested in any kind of a union other than a company union. Yes; this bill is a bill to break the back of the labor movement. This is why the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. are both violently opposed to it.

These great organizations have never been lacking in patriotism. They know the dangers of a bill like this in time of peace. They know the volunteer system has not failed, in fact has not even been tried. They know also that this will be a step toward war and that it will take the unemployed away from a $52 job and put him on a $25 one, thus saving a few paltry dollars for those with already swollen fortunes. Yes, all labor, church groups, and liberal organizations all over the Nation are opposing this European innovation. These are the reasons and many others. I, too, oppose it.

HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 5, 1940

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, yesterday at a hospital in my district one of America's most gifted sons, Dr. Hans Zinsser, passed to his eternal reward.

Born in New York City of German parents, he was a shining example of the culture, refinement, and brilliance of mind which characterized my neighbors of German birth and descent with whom I have lived all my life.

To his many honors, professional and civil, was added his own Government's much-coveted Distinguished Service Medal.

The story of this remarkable man's last days upon this earth is told in the following article which was published this morning in the New York Times:

Dr. Hans Zinsser, the world's leading authority on typhus, who in the last 5 years also achieved prominence in letters, died of leukemia at 4:30 o'clock yesterday morning at the Memorial Hospital for the Treatment of Cancer and Allied Diseases, at the age of 61.

He had known for 2 years that he was suffering from a fatal malady against which the best of medical knowledge was of no avail. Two weeks ago he entered the hospital fully aware that he had only a very short time to live.

Dr. Zinsser spent what he knew were the last 2 years of his life in writing a unique autobiography in the form of the biography of a third person—a friend whom he knew very well. It was published June 25 under the title, "As I Remember Him," with the subtitle, "The Biography of R. S.," and became a nonfiction best seller. The initial R. S. stood for Romantic Self, it was learned yesterday through the Book-of-the-Month Club, which made the book its selection for July.

WROTE OF OWN DEATH

The news of Dr. Zinsser's death made it clear that in the description of the death of R. S. in the final chapter of the book the author actually was writing about his own death, which he knew was only a few months off.

"Something took place in his mind," he wrote, "that he regarded as a sort of compensatory adjustment to the thought that he would soon be dead. In the prospect of death, life seemed to be given a new meaning and fresh poignancy. From now on, instead of being saddened, he found—to his delighted astonishment—that his sensitiveness to the simplest experiences, even for such things that in other years he might hardly have noticed, was infinitely enhanced.

"As the disease caught up with him R. S. felt increasingly grateful for the fact that death was coming to him with due warning and gradually. So many times in his active life he had been near sudden death by accident, violence, or acute disease, and always he had thought that rapid and unexpected extinction would be most merciful. But now he was thankful that he had time to compose his spirit and to spend a last year in affectionate and actually merry association with those dear to him."

Hans Zinsser first became known to the public in 1935 with the publication of Rats, Lice, and History, in which he weighed lice, rodents, and human beings in the balance and found the first two more respectable, inasmuch as they had failed as yet to evolve into political animals. His Biography of R. S. brought him further fame as a literary man.

Long before he became known to the public as a literary figure, however, Dr. Zinsser had gained a reputation in the scientific world as one of the foremost bacteriologists of his day. He was recognized among his colleagues as a leader in the fight against typhus, the plague that perhaps had played a greater part in history than any other disease. Largely as a result of his work, it may be said that man is now well on the way to conquer another of his great plagues.

KNOWN FOR VERSATILITY

Dr. Zinsser was in addition a philosopher, historian, poet, and wit, who blended all these qualities in an unusual personality. Those who knew him described him as one of the most versatile of men, who could converse as fluently about Arabian architecture and French literature as he could about politics, history, and bacteriology.

In the last pages of his autobiography Dr. Zinsser gave the views of a dying philosopher-scientist on the current scene.

"He was not sure," he wrote, "whether the world that was rushing by was going forward or backward. He wondered whether he had not, perhaps, been born a little too soon and remained unable to catch up with his time. * * * Scientific progress had brought as much sorrow as happiness. With immensely enhanced powers of production, millions were out of work and starving. Ideas of democracy and individual freedom which he had accepted as the gradually evolved goals of centuries of struggle were not only being denied, but entire nations were frantically intent on destroying them. * * * At the time of his death he was as thoroughly bewildered as any thoughtful individual of our time is bound to be."

Dr. Zinsser was born of German parents in New York City, November 17, 1878, son of August and Marie Theresia Schmidt Zinsser. His parents were Rhineland Germans who came to America because they loved the things America stood for. As a child, he wrote later in his autobiography, he spoke English with a German accent and lived in the cultural tradition of the Rhineland and the Black Forest, which, as he said, "had long been under the influence of French thought and political doctrine." While on trips abroad as a child, he related, he was taken to so many galleries in Italy that his feet hurt whenever he thought of an Italian primitive.

He was graduated from Columbia University in 1899 with the degree of A. B., and then continued with his studies at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, Columbia, from which he was graduated with the degree of M. D. in 1903. That same year he also received the degree of A. M. from Columbia. He served his internship from 1903 to 1905, and then began his career as bacteriologist at the Roosevelt Hospital and the College of Physicians and Surgeons.

HE TAUGHT BACTERIOLOGY

During the next 5 years he served as instructor in bacteriology and hygiene at the latter institution and as assistant pathologist in St. Luke's Hospital, when he was called to the post of associate professor, and then full professor of bacteriology at Stanford University, Calif. In 1913 he returned to Columbia as professor of bacteriology, a post he held for 10 years, when he joined the staff of the Harvard Medical School as professor of bacteriology and immunology, a position he occupied until his death.

Dr. Zinsser began his international career as an epidemiologist during the World War when he went to Serbia in 1915 as a member of the American Red Cross Sanitary Commission. During that excursion he related in his autobiography "he took care never to sleep in a bed. He carried a Red Cross blanket, an extra suit of underwear, a beer bottle full of kerosene and another of chloroform. Upon arrival almost anywhere at all he would strip to the skin, hanging his outer clothes upon a hook and packing his discarded underwear into his boots.

"Then he would pour a teaspoonful of chloroform into each boot and tie a string tightly about the tops, thus executing the day's accumulation of vermin. Next came a thorough wash. Then, sprinkling the floor with kerosene, he would climb into his extra underwear, wrap up in his blanket and sleep."

Dr. Zinsser served first as a major in the United States Army Medical Corps when this country entered the war and later was promoted to the rank of colonel. He was sanitary inspector of the First Army Corps and of the Second Field Army of the A. E. F. in France, as well as assistant director of laboratories and infectious diseases for the A. E. F.

In the summer of 1923 he went to Soviet Russia as sanitary commissioner for the League of Nations Health Section. He also served as exchange professor in Paris in 1935 and at the Peiping Union Medical College in 1938.

RECIPIENT OF MANY HONORS

Professor Zinsser was the recipient of many high honors. The United States Government awarded him the Distinguished Service Medal. The French Government made him a member of the Legion of Honor, and the Serbian Government decorated him with the Order of St. Sava. He was president of the New York Pathological Society in 1915 and of the Association of Immunologists in 1919.

He was a member of the National Academy of Sciences, American Philosophical Society, American Association for the Advancement of Science, American Academy of Arts and Sciences, Harvey Society, Society for Experimental Biology and Medicine, Association of Pathologists and Bacteriologists, Society of American Bacteriolcgists, American Cancer Society, and American Association of Experimental Pathology. Dr. Zinsser also was a member of the American Medical Association, American Academy of Tropical Medicine, American Association of Immunologists, American Birth Control League, American Committee for the Control of Rheumatism, American Epidemiological Society, American Public Health Association, Association of American Physicians, National Research Council, Leonard Wood Memorial for the Eradication of Leprosy, Alpha Omega Alpha, Nu Sigma Nu, Sigma Xi, and Zeta Psi.

He was a member of the Columbia University, Century, Harvard, Tavern, and Groton Hunt Clubs. His scientific writings included Textbook of Bacteriology (1911), Infection and Resistance, and Resistance to Infectious Diseases (1935).

SERVED SEVERAL HOSPITALS

Professor Zinsser was awarded honorary degrees of doctor of science by Columbia, Western Reserve, Lehigh, Yale, and Harvard. At the time of his death he was chief of the bacteriological service at the Children's Hospital and Infants' Hospital and consulting bacteriologist at the Peter Bent Brigham Hospital in Boston.

The outstanding scientific achievement of Professor Zinsser was the development under his direction at the Harvard Medical School of a method for preparing a vaccine and a serum against the organisms that cause typhus, the scourge that had taken millions of lives, particularly in times of war. In January 1940 Professor Zinsser announced the development of a method, after more than 15 years of effort by himself and others, that made possible for the first time the mass production of a vaccine against typhus fever of the European type, a development of enormous importance to armies and civilian populations in times of war.

Mr. Speaker, I would conclude with this brief quotation:

But life is sweet, though all that makes it sweet
Lessen the sound of friends' departing feet;
And death is beautiful as feet of friend
Coming with welcome at our journey's end.

Exchange of Destroyers for Naval and Air Bases for National Defense

OF

HON. SOL BLOOM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 4, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE CHICAGO DAILY TRIBUNE

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein the following editorial which appeared in today's issue of the Chicago Daily Tribune, on the subject of the transfer of destroyers to Great Britain in exchange for air and naval bases in this hemisphere for national-defense purposes:

[From the Chicago Daily Tribune of September 4, 1940]

WE GET THE BASES

President Roosevelt notified Congress yesterday of the agreement between the United States and Great Britain which gives this country leases for naval and air bases in British-American possessions.

Lord Lothian, British Ambassador, in a note to the State Department, said the leases would apply to the eastern side of the Bahamas, the southern coast of Jamaica, the west coast of St. Lucia, the west coast of Trinidad in the Gulf of Paria, to the island of Antigua, and to British Guiana within 50 miles of Georgetown.

The Tribune rejoices to make this announcement, which fulfills a policy advocated by this newspaper since 1922. In spite of much discouragement, the Tribune persisted, month by month and year by year, in calling for these additions to the national defense. It may be found, as we think it will be, that this is the greatest contribution of this newspaper to the country's history since the nomination of Lincoln.

The agreement is not in the terms the Tribune would have preferred. Nevertheless, any arrangement which gives the United States naval and air bases in regions which must be brought within the American defense zone is to be accepted as a triumph.

Go to Fort Knox and See a Mechanized Army Unit

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. BUELL SNYDER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Wednesday, September 4, 1940

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, accompanied by my colleagues the gentleman from Alabama, the Honorable JOE STARNES; the gentleman from Arkansas, the Honorable DAVID D. TERRY; and the gentleman from Texas, the Honorable GEORGE H. MAHON, I took off from Bolling Field at 7:30 a. m., eastern standard time, August 3, 1940, with the primary objective of inspecting Army Air Corps bases in the Territory of Alaska. Certain key Army posts were inspected en route to and from Alaska.

The first stop of the subcommittee was made at Fort Knox, Ky., where we landed at 9:45 a. m., central standard time, August 3. I was amazed and pleased to note the tremendous improvement in the airfield—Godman Field—which had been made since my last visit some 2 years ago. At the time of my last visit it was possible to use this airfield only during good weather. During wet weather, and particularly in winter, it was necessary for airplanes to use Bowman Field, Louisville, Ky. Now, however, as a result of working night and day for over 2 years, during which time over 1,000,000 cubic yards of earth have been moved, about one-half the runways of a fine airfield, which will accommodate the largest, heaviest, and fastest airplanes, have been practically completed. There remain, however, some half million cubic yards of earth yet to be moved before the entire airfield will have been brought to the desired grade. Because of the appropriation of $740,000, contained in the Army Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1941, these funds will make possible the construction of a large hangar, necessary appurtenant buildings, concrete aprons, and runways, thus finally completing this splendid airfield, which is so strategically well located and so important to the national defense. All of the preliminary work on the airfield, including hauling thousands of tons of dirt, has been accomplished by the local authorities by using a minimum of appropriated Air Corps funds, thus releasing the $740,000 of Air Corps funds for necessary permanent construction which could not be done by the W. P. A. When this airfield is completed and the addition to Bowman Field at Louisville, Ky., has been secured, it will be possible to locate units of combat aviation at Fort Knox and at Bowman Field so that combat aviation—particularly bombardment squadrons—may train with Fort Knox units of the armored force and thus perfect that essential coordination of airplane, tank, and gun which played such an important part in Hitler's recent European conquests.

During my visit to Fort Knox I saw evidences everywhere of the tremendous expansion in manpower, in material, and in facilities of the units of the armored force. In many places tent camps had been erected to take care of the overflow of soldiers from the permanent and cantonment type barracks. To house this overflow and to house the large increase in the garrison of Fort Knox, incident to the creation of the armored force and the stationing at Fort Knox of the armored force school and replacement center, General Headquarters tank battalions, the First Armored Division, and other units, it will be necessary to build more than 350 temporary buildings of the cantonment type. I am informed that the lay-out plan for these buildings has been approved, that proposals for bids have been circulated, and it is hoped to let necessary contracts in the near future. Contracts will contain the proviso that these buildings must be completed within 90 days after contracts are awarded.

I was informed that shortly it was expected that there will be stationed at Fort Knox some 15,000 to 18,000 troops of the armored force.

The intensity of training activities now in progress at Fort Knox was reminiscent of the scenes of 1917. I was impressed by one outstanding difference, however—the much faster tempo of this modern tank center.

It has been necessary to build temporary barracks for the following units and installations: First Armored Regiment (L), Sixty-ninth Armored Regiment (M), Sixth Infantry (armored), Twelfth Observation Squadron, Forty-seventh Signal Company, Armored Force School and Replacement Center—which includes radio, motor, and other schools—Quartermaster, Ordnance, and Medical Detachment units; additional hospital technical buildings, Quartermaster, and Ordnance maintenance shops and warehouses.

I found that in order to house the additional hospital facilities which are required, about one-third of the permanent barracks of the First Armored Regiment (L) will be preempted for hospital ward space. This procedure is in accord with present policies of the War Department to utilize existing structures for hospitals without building additional permanent buildings at this time. The enlisted men displaced will be housed in temporary cantonment-type barracks to be built nearby.

Also, it has been necessary to build of temporary construction a cantonment to house approximately 2,000 W. P. A. workers who are transported by rail from western Kentucky to Fort Knox for work on Federal and State projects. The cost of transportation and of meals while at Fort Knox is borne by the W. P. A. workers, who return home with a substantial check in their pockets as pay for their labor. These cantonment barracks will be available for troops when the necessity for use of W. P. A. workers in large quantity has ceased.

I wish to comment particularly on the employment of W. P. A. workers at Fort Knox. I found that W. P. A. workers were operating a large rock quarry on the reservation which is the sine qua non of the comparatively low cost of Fort Knox construction projects. By working day and night shifts, this quarry is providing, at a minimum of expense, all of the rock used in the runways and aprons of the airfield, on the roadways, in motor vehicle parks, and in the manufacture of concrete blocks and pipe by the thousands. This post has a concrete-block and pipe plant which is operated by the W. P. A. workers, and by means of which the foundations and basements of many permanent buildings and many semipermanent buildings in their entirety have been constructed. I was impressed with the efficient organization, skillful supervision, and direction of the W. P. A. workers at Fort Knox. It is my belief that nowhere is the Government receiving a higher return for the money invested in W. P. A. projects than at Fort Knox, Ky.

I found that although the present Fort Knox Reservation consists of approximately 33,000 acres, 10,000 acres are northeast of Salt River and are of little maneuverable value, but are necessary as an artillery backstop. The remaining 23,000 acres are too small to accommodate all of the many activities, including firing practice of four field artillery regiments of the Regular Army, and six field artillery regiments of the National Guard, which heretofore have come to Fort Knox in summer for their training. In addition, the armored regiments and G. H. Q. tank battalions of the armored force will have need of extensive firing ranges for moving combat fire, mortar, and other types of fire. The reservation is the normal summer training place of the Thirty-eighth Division and the One Hundred and Twenty-third Cavalry Brigade of the National Guard. Also, some 1,800 to 2,000 Reserve officers, and some 800 R. O. T. C. students train at Fort Knox each summer. This reservation in the past has been crowded from one end of the year to the other. The Congress has recognized the need for additional land at Fort Knox, and authorized by the act approved July 26, 1939, the acquisition of 51,342 additional acres at an estimated cost of $1,600,000. The present session of Congress has given effect to this authorization by appropriating approximately $667,000 of the estimated amount required. This current appropriation will permit the acquisition of approximately 15,000 or 20,000 badly needed additional acres. With the creation of the armored force, and its subsequent great development and expansion, there should be placed in first priority the appropriation of the additional $1,000,000 for the purchase of the remaining authorized acreage which must be acquired in order to provide units of the armored force the maneuver area which, because of the large number of tanks, armored cars, motorcycles, and motor vehicles of all kinds, and the speed and radius of action of these units, is absolutely necessary.

All construction provided for Fort Knox in the Public Works Act of fiscal year 1939 has been completed. An immense program of rehabilitation, repair, and minor construction has been and is being carried on currently with W. P. A. funds, both Federal and State. Such projects have included work on the airfield, the construction of roads, walks, sewers, construction of basements of permanent buildings, construction of 62 semipermanent noncommissioned officers' quarters, construction of latrines, mess halls, and tent floors in the concurrent training camp, construction of a post signal building, ordnance magazines, roads and trails on the reservation, moving and rehabilitating quarters for officers and noncommissioned officers, rehabilitation of the cantonment barrack areas, and innumerable other projects.

I was informed that construction of an ordnance automotive shop, ordnance shops for small-arms repair and ordnance storehouses and magazines, which has long been a necessity in this large mechanized garrison, are to be built from funds recently made available by the War Department.

Based on my observation, I strongly urge that the acquisition of all the additional land for Fort Knox, totaling 51,342 acres, authorized by the act of Congress approved July 26, 1939, be placed in first priority.

Next to the acquisition of additional land, the most pressing needs now are:

a. Cold storage and ice plant	$400,000
Ice-making machinery	75,000
Total	475,000

I noted that the present ice plant of World War construction is delapidated, worn out, and entirely inadequate for present-day needs. It must be replaced to meet the needs of the vastly increased garrison of this post.

b. Laundry, total cost	$400,000

I found that the present laundry is greatly overtaxed and overburdened and inadequate to provide laundry service for the present garrison. The existing laundry plant will be entirely inadequate to serve the needs of the expanded garrison.

I observed that the United States post office at Fort Knox was housed in a small, old, and run-down building of cantonment type. This building is a disgrace to the Post Office Department and to the Federal Government. I urge that the Post Office Department undertake the construction at Fort Knox of a suitable post-office building at the earliest possible date.

The Air-Base Agreement and Dictatorship

OF

HON. RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 5, 1940

ARTICLE BY DAVID LAWRENCE

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by David Lawrence appearing in yesterday's Evening Star:

[From the Washington Evening Star of September 4, 1940]

AIR BASE DEAL HELD AKIN TO DICTATORSHIP—PRESIDENT'S FAILURE TO CONSULT CONGRESS SHARPLY CRITICIZED

(By David Lawrence)

While the acquisition of a ring of airplane bases in mid-Atlantic in exchange for some outworn naval destroyers gives the United States much the better of the trade and a defense asset of incalculable value, the method by which President Roosevelt handled the transaction is open to the severest criticism.

Instead of trusting to the Congress of the United States to share with him the responsibility of an epoch-making transaction, the President has decided on the basis of a technically worded opinion from his Attorney General to consummate the deal and let the matter be debated afterward.

This is precisely the manner in which the heads of totalitarian states function and it is the first evidence that the President of the United States is truly distrustful of the democratic process. There is some justification for his belief that if he had put the matter before Congress it might have been filibustered to death in the Senate or blocked by other legislative means exercised by a minority of Members. But to refuse to put the question to a test and to assert his leadership at this time and let the Congress decide the matter is to concede a fear of the minority rule in the National Legislature.

The rules of the Senate in March 1917, permitting unlimited debate, blocked an effort by President Wilson to secure authority to arm American merchant ships—a step which he believed would avert war—but since then cloture has been adopted and the rules permit two-thirds of the Senate to compel termination of debate. If two-thirds of the Senate wanted to approve the exchange of destroyers for bases, there would be no filibustering.

AUTHORITY AT ISSUE

Thus it is apparent that Mr. Roosevelt feared he could not command two-thirds of the Senate for a treaty for the passage of a cloture rule which would force quick action on a joint resolution approving the exchange of air bases for destroyers.

In any event, the Attorney General's opinion alleging that the President has power virtually to do anything he pleases with the property and territory of the United States under the broad constitutional authority which the President possesses as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy is so startling an interpretation that it transcends in importance the acquisition of the air bases themselves.

It is not a matter of neutrality, for that word has become virtually obsolete with the financial aid already given by the American Government to American manufacturers of airplanes and war supplies for British use. It is much more a question of domestic statutes and constitutional authority to surrender American naval property to foreign governments in accordance with Executive agreements.

Although the object in this case is a desirable one—and it is not infrequently that a desirable objective is claimed in Washington to justify any means however illegitimate—the scar left by the refusal of the President to lay the matter before Congress in advance of consummation will not soon be removed.

QUESTION OF DICTATORSHIP

For one thing, in the middle of a Presidential political campaign in which Mr. Roosevelt has done an unprecedented thing in accepting a third-term nomination, it will raise the question of dictatorship in a new form. It will also tend to emphasize what Secretary Wallace's recent acceptance speech left the public to infer, namely, that the President and the New Deal party have become the war party and are ready evidently to go to the polls with that issue clearly established.

The entire executive branch of the Government and the New Deal leaders in Congress are behaving as if the United States is already in war and as if the President should have the power to use any form of coercion he may desire to attain anything he may choose to characterize as a national-defense objective. The Russell-Overton amendment of the Senate has now been matched by an amendment passed by the House Military Affairs Committee, which enacts word for word a statute hitherto used only in wartime to commandeer plants and factories. The logical corollary to this is the future passage of a measure to conscript labor and force the American workingman to give his services at Army pay, if necessary, to achieve defense objectives.

Totalitarianism came to both the peoples of Germany and Italy in a cloak of beneficence. Everything that was done, even the abrogation of constitutional guaranties, was accomplished by following the alleged forms of constitutionalism. The document in which the Attorney General justifies the transfer of 50 naval destroyers for air bases is typical of the logic used by foreign dictators and their spokesmen in making seem legal that which was flagrantly illegal.

PUBLIC APPROVAL SEEN

There is no way that the acts of a President can be subjected at this time to court review, but quite apart from the technicalities involved, the question which remains for the American people to decide at the polls this autumn is whether they want the Chief Executive to take steps of such a far-reaching nature without permitting the Congress as a coordinate branch of the Government to express itself at the same time. The superficial excuse is that Congress might have delayed action and that time was of the essence. But the present administration has jammed through legislation in 24 hours of much less consequence. The real reason, of course, is that the President did not wish to risk his leadership at this time because he is a candidate for a third term and the administration did not relish debate. Had he decided to take the risk, the President would have won hands down, for the trade of the destroyers for the air bases will be approved by public opinion, irrespective of party. Unfortunately a precedent has been set for specific future actions which may not have congressional approval but which a President may feel justified for vague reasons of national defense in putting into effect without the approval of either House of Congress. Thus does one of the most important elements of the democratic process disappear overnight from the Washington scene.

Steps Toward British Union, a World State, and Internal Strife—Part IX

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 5, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include certain excerpts from the magazine Prophecy, monthly—current events in the light of Scripture, June 1936.

I am endeavoring to shed a little light on the British-Israel World Federation and the Anglo-Saxon Federation, for both of these movements are not, as I have said, in the interest of the United States.

Unfortunately, members of these groups—and I believe many of them are innocent members—are going hand in hand, supporting a plan which is undermining our churches, changing our educational system, so as to prepare the public to quietly accept a colonial status in the British Empire.

This movement is carried forward, as I have said, by the various endowment foundations and by the many pro-English organizations, such as the Overseas Club, the Pilgrims, American-Canadian Clubs, and Anglo-American Clubs, and even the Octavia Society of England. All of these have many branches throughout the United States, and are in reality as subversive as the communistic party itself. The only difference is in that the membership of these upper-strata organizations occupy a social status, which leaves them more or less immune from criticism. However, it is important that light be shed upon their activities, so that we may know them for what they are.

The first article concerns Bishop William T. Manning, and is evidently a criticism of statements which he has made. Bishop Manning is well known and no doubt the walls of his church carry many secrets that in themselves would be a revelation. I shall now quote this article:

[From Prophecy Monthly—Current Events in the Light of Scripture of June 1936]

WORKING TOWARD THE ONE VISIBLE CHURCH

"Mystery, Babylon the great, the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth" (Revelation, 17: 5).

The Episcopal bishop, William T. Manning, who a few years ago had something of a testimony for orthodox Christianity, is now campaigning for a great religious federation to include everything Protestant and Catholic. In an essay being distributed in several nations he decries the "sin" of disunion of Protestantism and Catholicism.

He calls for "true and full conversion to Christ" in Protestantism of all sects and Catholicism, whether Roman, Anglican, or otherwise.

The essays are to be the subject of discussion and questionnaires among these Anglican communicants during the next 4 years to obtain a statement of essential principles, or a platform on which the reunion of Christendom may be approached by Anglicans.

This platform will be presented at an international convention in London in June 1940, to which three representatives from every Anglican diocese in the world will be invited.

"In the great task of reconciling Protestantism and Catholicism," he said, "it seems that God has set the Anglican communion in the middle place for the very purpose of reconciliation."

We can never believe that when our Lord prayed that His people "might be one" that He contemplated that the desired unity should be manifested by one comprehensive religious corporation. Where will we find in the church epistles any intimation that God recognizes in any way the existence on earth of one visible church under the authority of one ecclesiastical organization? God recognizes only the mystic church, comprised of born-again persons, wherever they may be, and God's purpose requires no tinkering at the hands of schemers to repair its unity, for it has never been broken. The unity for which our Lord prayed (John, 17: 21–23) is a unity of life in the Father and in Himself.

If the good bishop is working for such a unity, produced only through the regeneration of individuals, we are with him. A church that is the creation of the Holy Spirit must be a church founded on the eternal rock—the deity and atoning work of Jesus Christ. The apostate denominations can never be brought together on such a basis. Any vast human organization such as is proposed can be brought into existence only through compromise. It would be the counterfeit of the body of Christ, the prophesied federation of apostate sects which is to mark the days of the age end. With such a movement, we would have no part whatever.

The words of the risen Christ recorded in Revelation should be sufficient guidance as to His mind in this age. Here He addressed each of the several churches of Asia and His appeal at the close of each is: "He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." His appeal is to the individual believer in respect to His Word and He holds each individual church responsible directly to Himself.

My opinion is that the people should be left free to worship as they please, within the rights and liberties of the Constitution. For anyone to attempt to establish a monopolistic church, as advocated by Bishop Manning, is as unsound as monopoly in commerce and of the gold which is now in the Treasury of the United States. All of this is a part of the British-Israel plan to undermine the United States. I shall now quote an article from the same magazine entitled "Proofs of British-Israel Trickery," on page 21:

PROOFS OF BRITISH-ISRAEL TRICKERY

If it seems to some of our readers that we have much to say on the subject of Anglo-Israelism, they should understand that our mail is flooded with letters and literature from readers who are taking up with these ideas, and our increasing conviction that this is one of the latter-day deceptions, leads us to repeat our warnings.

We sometimes receive letters from premillennial ministers defending these doctrines, and remonstrating that we have no right to term this a heresy for it is being preached by many who are true to the fundamentals of salvation. This we do not doubt, yet we are certain that these sincere men do not realize to what extent they have been imposed upon by official literature of the movement, or to what port they are being led. It may be true that some advocates of Anglo-Israelism preach "Christ and Him crucified," but it is equally certain that some of the outstanding writers on the subject have no place for this message but preach legalism in its full potency. In all the literature, it is the peculiar "gospel of the kingdom" which is given prominence, and this is a doctrine of the supremacy of the Anglo-Saxon people and their calling to reform the world.

One of the most startling exposures of the official literature that we have seen in small form is a recent booklet by Rev. Roy L. Aldrich, of Detroit, entitled "Anglo-Israelism Refuted." Mr. Aldrich dated the subject with Howard B. Rand, general secretary of the Anglo-Saxon Federation of America, in a high school auditorium in Detroit. Mr. Rand utterly failed to answer the propositions stated by Mr. Aldrich.

In the booklet mentioned, Mr. Aldrich gives numerous quotations taken from the best known books of the movement, showing how the writers have deliberately misquoted Scripture or omitted portions of verses which would have ruined the argument. He shows how they have also misrepresented the position of other writers. But if one wishes conclusive evidence of the fallacy of the thing, he should read the quotations as to time reckonings and the setting of dates based upon pyramid measurings and the year-day theory. He quotes again and again from positive predictions of officially recognized leaders, showing how their dates brought forth nothing, and how subsequent issues of the books dropped these references and substituted references to dates still in the future.

Anglo-Israel literature has been saturated with predictions that Armageddon would take place in the years 1928 to 1934. In this period was included the seven times for Judah's trouble, the gathering of all nations against Jerusalem, the repealing of all man-made laws by Britain and America, the adoption of the constitutional law given to Moses and the assumption of Authority by Christ. We were to see in 1934 the last war for 1,000 years. It was flatly stated that if these things did not come to pass as scheduled, it would be the first time that the revelation of the Sone Bible (pyramid) had ever failed. One of their most cocksure writers, W. C. McKendrick, went so far as to say: "You can depend upon it that every divinely inspired prophecy from 1917 to 1936 will come true at the allotted time. Armageddon will be upon us 11 years from the time we took Jerusalem."

Those who are sincere seekers of truth should accept our challenge to read Mr. Aldrich's booklet and check his quotation with the standard books from which they are taken. They will find that they are following blind leaders who have not hesitated to employ trickery in their efforts to maintain a following. We do not question the sincerity of many who have accepted and are teaching these doctrines, but we do pray that they will let the sure Word of Prophecy be their guide. When the books of men become essential to one's maintaining of a system called Christian, we have reason to suspect that we are off the main track.

I have taken the liberty of including this article, in order to show that British-Israel is suspected by many people, who know the real background of this movement. My reason for inserting these articles is to bring to light the fact that there is a movement on foot to try to establish authenticity, or to prove the prophecies of the Old Testament. We have no need for occultism, or for astrology, or for phrenology—feeling the bumps on the head, and such hocus-pocus. What we need is good, sound statesmanship, that is based upon the Constitution of the United States. What do we care about Moses, and what do we care about the prophecies of the Old Testament? What interest can we have in the people who are trying to interpret these prophecies in order to compel us to enact these mysteries in a real world war, which can only end in the sacrifice of millions of lives. Let us get back to sound reason and common sense, and forget all of this soothsaying, legerdemain, and phophesying. Our Nation cannot be guided by astrological predictions or by any other mystic procedure, for such entertainment is fine in the parlor but has no place on the ship of state.

I shall now quote another short article from the same magazine:

THIS IS JERUSALEM SPEAKING

"Then will I turn to the people a pure language." (Zeph. 3: 9.)

It is interesting enough to find that a language for centuries considered dead, should be suddenly revived and spoken by 90 percent of the Jews in Palestine, but doubly striking to learn that within the last few months, a Palestine Jew, Jacob Maimon, has adapted the international stenographic system to the Hebrew language, achieving the maximum of efficiency required. Maimon and his adept students are a familiar sight at meetings of the Zionist General Council and the Zionist Congress, compiling complete records in Hebrew. Classes were started some time ago in Tel Aviv, and the first shorthand writers are on the staff of Daver, the Hebrew labor daily.

On March 30 Hebrew made its world debut as a radio language, when the Palestine broadcasting service was inaugurated, with addresses by Sir Arthur Wauchope and members of the Jewish and Arab community.

"This is Jerusalem calling" were the words that opened the station in English, Hebrew, and Arabic, and introduced the speech of Postmaster General William Hudson.

In various parts of Jerusalem, crowds thronged the outside of radio stores listening as the radio loud speakers broadcasted the country's first program.

We read in a Jewish paper that a serious disturbance threatened as Arabs warned the Palestine Broadcasting Co. that a national issue would be made of it, if the new broadcasters dared to refer to Palestine as "Eretz Israel." Use of the phrase, which is the Hebrew for "the land of Israel" has already caused the resignation of the Arab section of the broadcasting station.

It is quite evident, after reading this article, that the Arabs did not like the Jews to say, "Eretz Israel." The Arabs no doubt look upon Arabia as their own home, which is proper and right, because they have lived there longer than anyone else.

This article also calls attention to the split in the false and true Semitic ranks, for the Arab, we must confess, is a true Semite.

I wish to quote still another article from the same magazine, which is in regard to a manifesto, which the editor received:

We who have subscribed our names hereto declare that we are opposed to anti-Semitism in whatever form it may take, as inconsistent with our heritage of liberty and fair play as citizens of America, and as unworthy of those who bear the name of Christian. We further declare that any attempt to use the Scriptures as an excuse for an anti-Semitic attitude is a perversion of God's Word and irreconcilable with the spirit and teaching of the Lord Jesus Christ. * * * We wish our lives to be worthy of the gospel of Christ so that the Jew may differentiate between the gentile who is a Christian and the one who is not. And wherever there are those seeking to make the Jewish people acquainted with the contents of the Christian message, we wish to uphold their hands in prayer and sympathy. * * * To the Jewish people we declare: We have for you a heart full of sympathy. * * * We have no part in the stirring up of base passions against you, and we want you to know that those who are thus guilty do not express the love which the Lord Jesus Christ has commanded us to show you.

Among the many signers are Dr. George W. Arms, Brooklyn, N. Y.; Dr. Arthur I. Brown, Bible lecturer; Dr. Oliver Buswell, Wheaton College; Dr. Herbert W. Bieber, Philadelphia; Dr. O. F. Barthoiow, Mount Vernon, N. Y.; Dr. H. A. Ironside, Chicago; Dr. Howard A. Kelly, Baltimore; Dr. Fred Melday, Denver; Dr. Lewis Sperry Chafer, Dallas; Dr. Robert Evans, Pasadena; Dr. Otis Fuller, Grand Rapids; Dr. Albert G. Johnson, Portland; Dr. Cortland Myers, Pasadena; Dr. Wm. Pettingill, Wilmington, Del.; Dr. Herbert Booth Smith, Los Angeles; Dr. John Bunyan Smith, San Diego; Dr. W. H. Rogers, New York; Dr. W. P. White, Los Angeles; Dr. Harold Strathearn, Rochester, N. Y.; Dr. Theodore Taylor, New York; Dr. Frank Throop, Columbus, Ohio; Dr. I. L. Yearby, El Paso, Tex., and many others.

People like the signers of this manifesto are responsible for anti-Semitism, for it is they who designate the anti-Semite and who raise the question so that it becomes an issue. These gentlemen who signed the manifesto must be Semites themselves, or else why would they go into battle against an enemy of their own selection and designation? Surely no one bears any enmity toward the Semites as long as they are willing to conform to the same rules and regulations that all Americans have obligated themselves to do. A citizen of the United States, however, has the right to speak in defense of his own Government, without having his life threatened by those who employ the term anti-Semite, and who are Semitic; and I include the gentlemen who signed the manifesto in that category.

Would it not be more honorable if the same gentlemen said, if they are not Semites themselves, that they are supporters of the Semites; that they believe in extra constitutional rights for them; that they believe they should own and control all the gold; that they believe they should own all the business and means of communication in the United States; that they believe the so-called anti-Semitic, or gentile American should work with a pick and shovel while the people they support, the Semites, should be lords over the land? Should these gentlemen come out like this, we would know where they stand; but they, like the others, hide behind a screen of deception.

From now on I shall assume that all who use the designation anti-Semitic are Jews or close associates of the Jew. I believe the gentlemen in question will concede this point to me, and in doing that they have also classified themselves.

The so-called anti-Semites, or gentile Americans can then meet this unfair designation as a clear-cut issue.

I was indeed astonished to hear the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] denounce those of his own race of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob for having besieged him in his office, to express their views on a critical piece of legislation. They, of course, acted within their constitutional rights, in seeking this audience; and, more than that, they acted within the provisions of a resolution passed by a conference of rabbis, who, in 1936, went on record as claiming military exemption for conscientious objectors of their own race.

I can well understand the Member's embarrassment, particularly in view of the position he has taken in regard to the conscription bill; yet these people are, as I have said, clearly within their constitutional rights, to express their opinion; for it is the people of this Nation who must fight and die in defense of their own rights. I take it that these people do not object to service within the United States, but they do object being conscripted into service and then sent to the Far East to fight for a nation and for a cause in which they have little interest.

As a Representative in Congress, I have given audience to many people who are not residents of my own State, but I look upon this as a public duty to treat all people with consideration and courtesy—no matter who they may be. After all, it is the people who are the power in this Nation, and we Members of Congress are elected to protect their rights; and when we fail in this worthy object they must, in view of our failure, act in their own behalf. It is because of this that these people are here in Washington to protest against the conscription bill.

I wish to further quote from the Prophecy magazine:

Can it be that the modernists sense the need of a revival and of getting back to the great commission?

Let us read on:

That Protestantism is not as potent as it once was is hardly a matter for dispute. Our denominations mean less and less to us. They represent no important convictions on the part of their membership, and would visibly collapse were it not for their vested interests and the spirit of fellowship sustained by a common tradition.

Yes; all this we can follow if the writer is thinking of the results of a denatured gospel, with its resultant loss of a missionary incentive. Surely there are many churches where the pulpit stands for no positive convictions, and membership in them amounts to little more than belonging to a social club. But perhaps we have not caught this editor's drift. He proceeds:

"It is high time the churches and leaders who sense the weakness of our sectarian missionary structure should come together in a missionary project which is independent of denominational control. An ideal alternative would be for the Federal Council of Churches to take over the missionary enterprise of such denominations as would transfer their present responsibilities to it. It is both logical and urgent."

And why, pray tell, should we hand over the management of missions to this troup of Modernists?

"The primary reason," says the Christian Century, "is that denominational agencies do not and cannot express the conception of Christianity which is taking form among us today. The goal should be nothing less than the reorientation of the Christian Church in respect to the world mission of Christianity. It is probable that the very word 'missions' would have to be abandoned for a more Christian term."

The cat is cut of the bag. It is not a revival of the old-time religion that these gentlemen are desiring. New emphasis upon the marching orders given by our Lord, is not in their thoughts. No; they would even rid the church of the word which implies that men without Christ are lost and needing the good news of salvation. Instead of going forth "to seek and to save that which is lost," they would instill into the church the "new conception of Christianity's social responsibility."

No longer are we to regard missionaries as saving brands from the burning. Under the direction of the Federal Council of Churches, we would delegate them to put out the conflagration by introducing modern scientific methods and mass social reforms. As Dr. Shailer Mathews once put it: "The church should be less concerned in rescuing people than in educating them to keep out of danger."

But if we are to set aside completely the fundamental basis of missions as given us by the Lord Jesus Christ; if the church is no longer to hold convictions based upon a divinely inspired Christian revelation—one wonders why we should trouble ourselves to maintain such an organization as the Christian Church, or what need we have of a Federal Council of Churches of Christ? "Woe unto them, for they have gone in the way of Cain."

In concluding this speech, may I say that the Federal Council of Churches is a subversive organization, the members of which are clothed in garments of pink, red, and scarlet, all the colors of radicalism and communism. It is now well to take heed, for this movement is carrying this Nation into trials, tribulations, and war. No nation can survive unless it maintains Christian morals and believes in the teachings of the Man who came from Galilee. It is this faith that has carried people on, and it is this faith which has built up the Christian civilization, a civilization which cannot survive when we deny Christian teachings.

I have included these articles in my remarks because they are self-explanatory and more or less in line with the position that I have taken as a Member of Congress. No nation can survive that foregoes the teachings that gave it life and security, and these teachings cannot survive if we destroy the Nation that gives the people an opportunity to express and fortify themselves in the comfort that such teachings give them.

We must, therefore, as I have said before, return this Nation to those sound and fundamental principles upon which it came into life, namely, the Constitution of the United States.

ARTICLE BY WALTER LIPPMANN

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Walter Lippmann in which he draws a most interesting parallel between the Louisiana Purchase, and other historical events of that day, and the events of today.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TODAY AND TOMORROW—THE GREAT PRECEDENT

(By Walter Lippmann)

The negotiations now under way between the British Empire and the United States demonstrate how permanent and continuous, in spite of changing circumstances, are the fundamental lines of American foreign policy. To those who have forgotten or have never learned the tradition in which American foreign policy was formed, it may seem novel and therefore surprising for the United States to negotiate an understanding with Britain in the midst of a great imperialistic revolutionary war. But as a matter of historic fact the basic foreign policy of the United States, which gave this hemisphere a century of security, independence, and freedom, was shaped by just such understandings with Great Britain during the great wars of Napoleon and the threatened wars of the despotic Holy Alliance.

Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe would have recognized these negotiations as a continuation of their own, as dictated by the same necessity, as actuated by the same vital interests, as inspired by the same instinct of self-preservation. The negotiations between Jefferson and the government of Pitt which preceded the Louisiana Purchase and the negotiations between Monroe and Canning which led to the Monroe Doctrine were two decisive chapters in the same story which is now continued in the negotiations between Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill.

The analogy is not apparent and superficial. It is real and it is organic. The foundations of our foreign policy were laid by necessity in the tremendous upheaval of the Napoleonic era. That same foreign policy is being developed by necessity in the tremendous upheaval of our own era.

On February 15, 1798, while Great Britain was at war with the revolutionary imperialism of Napoleon Bonaparte, the American Minister in London had a conversation with Lord Grenville in which he learned that Napoleon might obtain control of Spain, and through Spain of "the resources of South America." Shortly afterward it was learned that Spain had secretly ceded to Napoleon the great region of the Mississippi Valley known as Louisiana. When Jefferson became President he took the position that while the United States could tolerate Spanish possession of this territory because Spain was "feeble" and pacific, it could not tolerate its possession by Napoleonic France because of "the impetuosity of her temper, the energy and restlessness of her character."

He then went on to say that "the day that France takes possession of New Orleans fixes the sentence which is to retain her forever within her low-water mark. It seals the union of the two nations who, in conjunction, can maintain exclusive possession of the ocean. From that moment we must marry ourselves to the British fleet and Nation. * * * This is not a state of things we seek or desire. It is one which this measure, if adopted by France, forces on us as necessary as any other cause, by the laws of nature, brings on its necessary effect."

The Louisiana crisis was settled by purchase and not by war. It was settled that way because Napoleon lost command of the seas and could not, therefore, maintain his empire in this hemisphere. But Jefferson, unlike the latter-day isolationists who cite his words without studying his acts, had no illusions on three fundamental points. The first was that revolutionary imperialism must not be allowed to establish itself on this side of the Atlantic. The second was that this could be prevented only by Anglo-American control of the ocean. The third was that to preserve the "exclusive possession of the ocean" he would, if necessary, "marry ourselves to the British Fleet and nation." Jefferson took this position on April 18, 1802; 13 months earlier in his first inaugural he had coined the historic phrase warning us against "entangling alliances."

It is evident that in his mind an understanding with Great Britain for the joint control of the Atlantic ocean was not an entanglement but the very basic condition of American security. So what Mr. Willkie said at Elwood about our relations with Britain and what Mr. Roosevelt is doing in his negotiations with Mr. Churchill is in the direct line of descent from the founders of American independence.

That Jefferson's views about Anglo-American relations at the time of the Louisiana Purchase were no passing notion is clear from the fact that 20 years later, in the crisis which led to the announcement of the Monroe Doctrine, he repeated them no less emphatically.

In 1823 the Continent of Europe was in the grip of four despotic monarchies bound together in the so-called Holy Alliance. They turned their eyes to this hemisphere. The Russian Empire began to move down the west coast from its base in Alaska; the other European despotisms began to formulate plans to reconquer Spanish America, which had rebelled and become independent. Again as in the case of Louisiana 25 years earlier Great Britain and the United States began to negotiate and in these negotiations between Canning and our minister in London, Benjamin Rush, an agreement was reached to forbid, if necessary by war, the conquest of Spanish America. The agreement was reached in London on August 23, 1823, and the papers were received in Washington by Secretary Adams and President Monroe on October 9, 1823. A week later the President sent the papers to Jefferson, asking his advice.

Within a week Jefferson replied, urging acceptance, and said that while "Europe is laboring to become the domicile of despotism, our endeavor should surely be to make our hemisphere that of freedom. One nation, most of all, could disturb us in this pursuit; she now offers to lead, aid, and accompany us in it. By acceding to her proposition, we detach her from the bands, bring her mighty weight into the scale of free government, and emancipate a continent at one stroke, which might otherwise linger long in doubt and difficulty. Great Britain is the nation which can do us the most harm of any one, or all on earth; and with her on our side we need not fear the whole world. With her, then we should most sedulously cherish a cordial friendship; and nothing would tend more to knit our affections than to be fighting once more, side by side, in the same cause. Not that I would purchase even her amity at the price of taking part in her wars.

"But the war in which the present proposition might engage us, should that be its consequence, is not her war but ours. Its object is to introduce and establish the American system, of keeping out of our land all foreign powers—of never permitting those of Europe to intermeddle with the affairs of our nations. It is to maintain our own principle, not to depart from it. And if, to facilitate this, we can effect a division in the body of the European powers, and draw over to our side its most powerful member, surely we should do it. But I am clearly of Mr. Canning's opinion that it will prevent instead of provoking war. With Great Britain withdrawn from their scale and shifted into that of our two continents, all Europe combined would not undertake such a war, for how would they propose to get at either enemy without superior fleets? Nor is the occasion to be slighted which this proposition offers of declaring our protest against the atrocious violations of the rights of nations by the interference of anyone in the internal affairs of another, so flagitiously begun by Bonaparte, and now continued by the equally lawless alliance calling itself holy."

At President Monroe's request, Jefferson sent the papers to Madison, who replied on November 1, saying, "I return the letter of the President. The correspondence from abroad has gone back to him, as you desired. I have expressed to him my concurrence in the policy of meeting the advances of the British Government, having an eye to the forms of our Constitution in every step in the road to war. With the British power and Navy combined with our own, we have nothing to fear from the rest of the world; and in the great struggle of the epoch between liberty and despotism, we owe it to ourselves to sustain the former, in this hemisphere at least."

It was after this consultation by the most eminent living Americans, themselves the founders of the Republic, that the Monroe Doctrine was promulgated one month later in the form, be it noted, not of a treaty but of a Presidential declaration. Yet there are men today who dare to charge that a negotiation based upon recognition of the vital connection between American security and British sea power is "un-American."

But Mr. Roosevelt need have no doubts and Mr. Willkie need have no doubts that they are walking on the main highway of American foreign policy and that they are following the greatest precedents of American history.

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, it was refreshing to find the following editorial in the columns of the country's leading newspaper. Too often the passing of a great personage receives scant notice from the press.

[From the New York Times of September 6, 1940]

AS WE REMEMBER HIM

Hans Zinsser was of fine old German stock. His father, August Zinsser, none the less German because he found in America (as his son said) "the promised land where there was still room for all the free spirits whose wings were clipped at home by bigotry and political oppression," was a true child of the idealistic tradition of the old Fatherland. Hans Zinsser, who in boyhood spoke English with a German accent, carried the tradition on, wedding it to science, finding it in no way inconsistent with America's democratic hope. His scientific achievements won him respect among his colleagues long before the general public heard of him. He was a bacteriologist who went where the bacteria lived, risking with philosophical composure the ugly death from which he was trying to save others. In the laboratory and out his findings were regarded as sound by those who know about such things.

But he was more than a man who got things done. Aside from his output, scientific and literary, he was a remarkable individual. His friends knew this at first hand, his readers at a very good second hand. His two popular volumes, "Rats, Lice, and History" and this summer's disguised autobiography, "As I Remember Him," were abiding literature because they were such good, offhand, honest, humorous talk. The whimsicality that he couldn't indulge in his scientific reports came out in them like a wandering breeze over hay fields after a late mowing.

Much has been made, and should be made, of the gay and wistful courage with which he faced the knowledge that he would surely die. There is brave comfort in As I Remember Him for those who fear sickness and the final pangs. "From now on," he wrote, knowing that the doctors could do nothing for him, instead of being saddened, he found—to his own delighted astonishment—that his sensitiveness to the simplest experiences, even for things that in other years he might hardly have noticed, was infinitely enhanced. Perhaps this wasn't courage, after all. Perhaps it was a discovery of a principle, open to a man who had rebelled against many things, great and small, but never against Nature herself. It was at least a nobler, a more heroic, attitude than that of the fanatic rushing to some flaming death, ignorant of its meaning, because a leader sent him.

Hans Zinsser's life and death have profound meaning at this very time. Those Americans who, like him, have German blood in their veins may well ponder the meaning. For here was a man molded in the Teutonic culture whose interests were universal, whose pity was in acts rather than words, who loved wine and gayety and women's smiles, who did not aspire to power but to understanding. There are such men in Germany still, let us not doubt; there are such German souls waiting to be born; out of them can still come a Germany that will be humane and splendid.

Ambassador Joseph P. Kennedy

OF

HON. FRANCIS T. MALONEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 6 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM BOSTON POST

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be published in the Appendix of the RECORD editorial comment referring to Ambassador Joseph P. Kennedy.

I am asking the insertion of this comment, which appeared in the Sunday Post, of Boston, on August 25, 1940, because of my own admiration for our Ambassador to Great Britain and because the editorial comment refers, in part, to the outstanding abilities and accomplishments of this distinguished gentleman, who has represented our Government so well on this important assignment, as he has served his Government so well in other extremely important places.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Boston Post of August 25, 1940]

KENNEDY'S PLACE IS HERE

Many people are beginning to wonder why it is that Ambassadors Bullitt, Biddle, Cudahy, and Phillips are safely in America while Joseph P. Kennedy, one of the outstanding Americans of our time, is still kept in the obviously perilous post at London.

Of course, we all realize that Mr. Kennedy's job is one of the most important in the world at present.

He is tremendously active in reporting trends, opinions, and other vital information to the President. He does an ocean of work which does not show publicly.

But affairs have taken such a turn that the President himself is directing our relationships with England and her dominions.

The recent conference with Prime Minister Mackenzie King of Canada shows this. The speech of Prime Minister Winston Churchill before the House of Commons openly reveals the fact that he had been in constant and perhaps direct touch with the President.

Two facts are evident lately. One is that Ambassador Kennedy would naturally like to come home. After all, he is a devoted family man and his wife and children are here in this country. Secondly, the original task for which he was sent to England has long since been supplanted by newer labors.

England is now a nation in a state of siege. One of the most important things to be reported to Washington is the result of the actual fighting.

We have sent over a large and sagacious delegation of naval and military men for just this purpose.

With this duty being cared for by the men who have made a life study of it, and the President himself attending to the important details of diplomatic relations, it is about time that Ambassador Kennedy was brought home to extend his talents to the utterly vital problem of national preparedness.

In Washington, we have a committee of high industrial leaders, called to the service of their country to shape the defense program. Knudsen, Stettinius, and the rest are engaged in a task gargantuan in its proportions. It involves billions of our dollars and requires speed, decision, and cooperation.

The present set-up has the President himself acting as coordinator of the work.

But, surely, no American wants to see Mr. Roosevelt risking his health in trying to accomplish all these tremendous tasks.

The hours are not long enough, nor the days, for a President to do all of these jobs. For a long time we have heard that the physical demands upon the Presidency, even in times of peace, are superhuman.

Many trace the illness of Wilson, the deaths of Harding and Coolidge to overwork in the White House.

This job of coordination should be done by a man who has the keenness and the experience, and he should do nothing else.

There is no one man in the country as well fitted and potentially able in such a position as Ambassador Kennedy.

He has been the Hercules of the Roosevelt administration.

The jobs that none of the brain trust could handle were given to him. He is used to vast transactions and quick decisions. He has tackled the securities problem, the maritime problem, and diplomatic relations with England in quick succession. His success has been phenomenal, and now he should go to a bigger field or should be given a rest. * * *

Kennedy has no place in the path of bombs and the "blitzkrieg." He is worthy of higher honors—fuller recognition.

Compulsory Military Service

EDITORIAL FROM WILMINGTON (DEL.) MORNING NEWS

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Wilmington (Del.) Morning News:

[From the Wilmington (Del.) Morning News of September 5, 1940]

BEHIND THE DRAFT BILL

Opponents of conscription in the House are under no illusions about the possibility of defeating the measure. They expect to be defeated on the final vote, and they frankly say so. Since that is their attitude, they almost certainly will be in a minority when the test comes.

Realities are realities, and opponents of the draft are not to be too sharply criticized for facing them. Nevertheless, they have an opportunity in the debate in the House to pose some questions that should be answered before the bill is passed.

One such question could be based on the point made by William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, in his Labor Day speech at Denver. Mr. Green declared that it is the duty of the President to "send a message to Congress stating the manpower needs of the Nation's military forces, and recommending a definite program to fill those needs." He added that the Federation will oppose conscription until it can be shown that the voluntary system of enlistment has failed.

This is to say that Congress is about to pass a selective-service act without ever having heard from the President how many men are wanted for defense. Army heads have furnished some information, it is true, but when figures varying from 1,200,000 to 4,000,000 are flying around it appears that Congress is being asked to write a blank check to permit the President to draw on the Nation's manhood as it suits him.

Members of the House should also demand more light than has yet been forthcoming on whether the men to be drafted are to be called merely for training or are to be welded into a permanent conscript army. If the idea is that the men inducted are to become a reserve against a possible emergency, that is one thing. If the aim is to merge the Regular Army and the drafted men into a huge military establishment of the European type, that is another.

Certainly the purposes of the administration have not been made clear. What is behind this bill? At least the minority in the House can demand a full disclosure before throwing up the sponge.

Transfer of Naval Vessels to Great Britain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

Friday, September 6, 1940

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the methods by which President Roosevelt secretly traded off 50 so-called over-age destroyers, important to our own national defense, for naval and air bases leased to us by Great Britain, were the methods of a dictator. Regardless of the results of the deal, whether we become involved in war because of it or not, it remains a fact that Mr. Roosevelt showed his distrust and his contempt for constitutional methods. He showed his contempt for the Congress—the people's representatives. He showed that he considers any end which he desires to justify any means he may choose to adopt to achieve that end.

There is no question but that Mr. Roosevelt deliberately misled the American people, Congress, and the press in this matter. At a press conference 2 weeks before he informed the Congress of this fait accompli, he had assured the representatives of the press not once but three times, and with emphasis, that Great Britain's request for American destroyers was in no way to be associated with the acquisition of naval or air-base rights from that country. Any citizen may draw his own conclusions as to whether Mr. Roosevelt knew, 2 weeks in advance of the consummation of this deal, that he did intend to trade these destroyers to Great Britain.

There is little point now in arguing whether or not the President's act was a flagrant violation of our neutrality. It was. But the President has committed so many other acts in violation of our neutrality that one more or less does not make a great deal of difference.

The important point about this deal is that the President was grossly unfair to the press, and to the public, and to the Congress as well. He showed in this, as in many other acts, that he has little respect for the public intelligence; that he has either a deep suspicion or a great contempt for democratic methods; and that he does not hesitate to do surreptitiously those things which he believes the American people do not want done, and which he believes the Congress would not agree to do.

We are now face to face with the warning that was voiced years ago by James Bryce, who was a great British student of American Government, when he said:

> If a nation desires perfect stability, it must put up with a certain slowness and cumbrousness; it must face the possibility of a want of action where action is called for. If, on the other hand, it seeks to obtain executive speed and vigor by a complete concentration of power, it must run the risk that that power will be abused and irrevocable steps taken too hastily.

The press reported that President Roosevelt referred with pride to the fact that one of his relatives, Robert Livingston, was one of the two commissioners who carried through the Louisiana Purchase for President Jefferson. There was another Livingston, Edward Livingston, also a great man, who said something that applies with peculiar force to Mr. Roosevelt at this time. It was this:

> The gloss of zeal for the public service is always spread over acts of oppression, and the people are sometimes made to consider that zeal as a brilliant exertion of energy in their favor, which, when viewed in its true light, would be found a fatal blow to their rights. In no government is this effect so easily produced as in a free republic; party spirit, inseparable from its existence, aids the illusion, and a popular leader is allowed in many instances impunity—and sometimes is rewarded with applause—for acts which would make a tyrant tremble on his throne.

The American people had better put an end to this growing dictatorship next November, if they wish to protect our constitutional Republic and to keep the Bill of Rights in force.

The Swiss System of Universal Service Is True Democracy

OF

HON. KNUTE HILL

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 6, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE WASHINGTON TIMES-HERALD

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, the following article from the Washington Times-Herald for Thursday, September 5, is such a splendid exposition of the Swiss system of universal service in a republic so similar to ours that it is worthy of the study of all Americans, and especially the Members of the United States Congress.

This system is really democratic, is popular with the Swiss people, and is effective.

[From the Washington Times-Herald of September 5, 1940]

IN THE NEWS—THE SWISS SYSTEM OF UNIVERSAL SERVICE IS TRUE DEMOCRACY

Citizens, let us make one last appeal to the United States Congress to continue this country as a democracy and not transform it into a militaristic state.

Let us endeavor to persuade the Congress to adopt the defensive system of Switzerland, a true and enduring Republic, instead of the systems of the totalitarian powers.

Let us try to secure for the defense and perpetuation of our American liberties a citizen soldiery, instead of a great standing army.

The present Burke-Wadsworth bill before Congress provides for continuous service in the Army of not less than 1,000,000 men.

It proposes to take a million young Americans from productive and acceptable employment and by compulsion to make professional soldiers of them for a period not to exceed 5 years.

The number of men under arms and at the command of the Executive may at any time be increased, however, by subsequent measures, when the principle of a great standing army is established.

The force necessary to compel acquiescence with such a demand, or any other demand of an autocratic government, is fully provided, once a great standing army under the control of the government is created.

Democracy is not necessarily a permanent form of government.

From the time of ancient Greece and Rome, we have seen democracies disappear and tyrannies take their places.

All that we can say of democracy is that it is the noblest form of government, the happiest form of government, the freest form of government.

But to preserve democracy a people must deserve democracy.

They themselves must be noble and worthy of the liberties they enjoy.

They must appreciate their happiness, rejoice in their freedom, and realize that the price of liberty is eternal vigilance.

They must certainly have the simple intelligence and the common knowledge to know that militarism is the most usual means of corrupting and destroying democracy, and that universal citizen service, in defense of a free country by a free people, is the surest and safest way of preserving democracy.

What system, then, of citizen soldiers, of giving protective military service while remaining free and unenslaved citizens, is the best and most effective means of both defending and preserving the Republic?

What system has been in operation in a free republic for the longest period of time, and with the greatest measure of success?

What system now operates with the highest success in a republic most nearly like our own free land?

What system has been amply proven to protect a free people in their rights and liberties, and is so popular with the people that enrollment in it is sought as an honor and benefit as well as a civil duty?

There is only one answer—the Swiss system of universal popular military service.

What is it?

First, we must remember that Switzerland is a republic exceedingly similar to our own, that it has a free government like our own, and that it is divided into Cantons or States, each with a measure of self-government like our own.

Second, we should remember that Switzerland is inhabited by a virile people like our own who cherish freedom and who have fought for it, secured it, and preserved it.

Third, that Switzerland in the midst of the clash of arms which continually surrounds it on every side has so remained free—and neutral—that its national emblem, the Red Cross, has become the insignia of peace and neutrality and freedom throughout the world.

The complete analogy between the Swiss people and nation and Government and our own having been established, the appropriate application to us of the military system they have found most desirable to defend such a people, nation, and government, becomes apparent.

In the Swiss system every citizen is a potential soldier; but no soldier ever ceases to be a free and productive citizen, residing in his own home and pursuing his chosen occupation.

A limited but adequate military training is merely a part of his life and his duty—his pursuit and his pleasure.

At the age of 14, a reasonable physical and military training begins in the schools.

At the age of 20 to 21, 3 months of active military training and practice is given the youth as an introduction to his duties of citizenship.

After that the field military training is confined to 1 month of each year—or even less—and all in addition that is demanded of soldierly duty from the citizen is that he take his equipment home with him and keep it in good condition for the field practice of the coming year.

The physical training for boys is provided by the Cantons (or States) under the supervision of the Federal Government.

The military training of adults is carried out entirely by the military department of the Federal Government.

Officers are trained in cadet schools, as in our United States.

Service is compulsory, but desired and sought for.

Moreover, it is not accepted unless the candidate for the military honor is qualified physically, mentally, and morally, as determined after authoritative examination.

Those who are unable to pass the examination are rejected, and rejection is regarded as a humiliation and misfortune.

A candidate may be reexamined in subsequent years.

If unable to pass examinations, he pays a special tax in lieu of military service.

The amount of the tax depends upon the citizen's income and property.

All successful candidates are assigned to the branches of military service for which they are best suited, as determined by the occupations, professions, or businesses which they habitually pursue.

So that for the 1 month or less that a citizen performs his military practice in the field he still adheres to the general line of occupation which he follows during the 11 months of his regular business.

There is no more a policy of depriving a citizen of his habitual and sustaining occupation in the Swiss system than there is of depriving him of his home and his family life or of transforming him from a creative, free man into a military robot.

Indeed, the period of 14 to 30 days yearly military practice is regarded as a pleasurable and beneficial outing, and enjoyed not only as a patriotic obligation gratefully performed but as an agreeable vacation.

Nevertheless, the citizens while performing their military duties receive pay, and furthermore their families are aided by the Government if any inconvenience is suffered through the temporary absence of the head of the family on his military outing.

The Swiss system of universal military service preserves the family life of the citizen, preserves the occupational productivity of the citizen, preserves the rights and liberties of the citizen, and maintains the Republic in the full military strength and in the firm affection of its people.

Why should not the United States adopt such a provenly successful and effective system instead of a system so dangerous to democracy as forced conscription in a great standing army?

Why should we experiment in doubt and danger when we can adopt a proven program with certainty and security?

Why should we become the military autocracy we are presumably organizing to oppose?

Why should we adopt any autocratic system when there is a democratic one ready to use at our hand?

A popular system, a democratic system, and a more effective system—more effective because under the system of Switzerland we could have in the same proportion as to population an army of 10,000,000 free men to save the Republic instead of a bureaucratic standing army of a million men to menace it.

Let us have an effective army adequate for our defense, but let us remain Americans and continue to be free.

The Measure of Wendell L. Willkie

OF

HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 6, 1940

ARTICLE COMPILED BY JOE SMITH, OF SEATTLE, WASH.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Joe Smith, of Seattle, Wash.

At the time of his nomination for President, Wendell L. Willkie was the president of the Commonwealth & Southern Corporation of Delaware. The Commonwealth & Southern is a holding company for the securities of public-service corporations. It owns a controlling interest in the securities of corporations serving 2,760 communities in the States of Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Ohio, and Pennsylvania.

In a radio debate with Willkie on January 6, 1938, Robert H. Jackson, now Attorney General of the United States, said:

"Mr. Willkie is a good operator—especially with the T. V. A. alongside of him to strengthen his resolve to be good. But Mr. Willkie represents control of utility companies in six States, through one great holding company. It is the democratic instinct of our people that arises in the holding-company law. People would feel more comfortable if Mr. Willkie could control only two or three States."

During the Hoover administration one of these Willkie companies made a contract under which it purchased the power from the Government's Muscle Shoals power plant for less than 2 mills a kilowatt-hour. This current was resold to residence consumers in sight of the dam for 10 cents a kilowatt-hour. Under this arrangement the corporation was selling for $100 electric current it purchased from the Government for $1.56. (Testimony before the congressional committee to investigate the T. V. A., p. 5455.)

The Tennessee Valley Authority Act was enacted during the early days of Roosevelt's first administration. Its purpose was to provide for the orderly development of the power, navigation, flood control, forest and agricultural resources, and the conservation of the human resources of the Tennessee Valley.

Quoting now: "Norris Dam was completed by the T. V. A. on August 3, 1936. Commonwealth & Southern was still the only purchaser of the bulk of the Authorities' power * * * Mr. Willkie demanded immunity from competition in territories where he was to operate * * * The Authority suggested a plan for a southwestern power pool offering a uniform pool getaway rate to all distributing systems, public and private. * * * A conference was held at the White House September 30, 1936, resulting in an agreement to explore the possibilities of a power pool." (T. V. A. Committee's report, p. 204.)

While these negotiations were pending a group of Willkie's utility companies went into court, challenged the constitutionality of the T. V. A. Act, and secured an injunction forbidding the T. V. A. from negotiating any other power contracts, or even from carrying out the contract it had with the Willkie interests.

Which recalls one of the famous remarks of the Abe Potash in the Potash and Perlmutter stories:

"For what good, Morris, is a lawyer who cannot tell you how to break a contract which he wrote himself."

Thereupon President Roosevelt, on January 25, 1937, advised the Commission to discontinue negotiations for new agreements with interests which had asked the courts to forbid them carrying out of their old ones. President Roosevelt said:

"The securing of an injunction of this broad character, under the circumstances, precludes a joint power facility arrangement and makes it advisable to discontinue these conferences." (T. V. A. Committee's report, p. 204.)

"All told the constitutionality of the T. V. A. Act has been raised in 37 actions between 1933 and June 1, 1938. In 38 of these actions injunctions were sought, effecting the activities of the board. In all of these suits appealed to higher courts the injunctions were dissolved and the validity of the act upheld, or the case decided in favor of the Authority on other grounds." (T. V. A. Committee's report, pp. 7 and 8.)

Up to June 30, 1938, the T. V. A. had expended $518,159 in defending these actions. It was estimated in evidence taken by the committee that it cost the corporation and other plaintiffs, $600,000 of their own, their stockholders', and their customers' money to prosecute these suits (T. V. A. report, p. 9).

It was estimated in evidence given to the committee that these suits caused the T. V. A. losses, on power contracts suspended, a total of $5,325,644, losses to its municipal and cooperative customers on the resale of power they were not able to purchase, a total of $7,702,000 (T. V. A. committee's report, pp. 65–66).

In all of this litigation Wendell L. Willkie, the president of the Commonwealth & Southern was the moving spirit. He and his associates waged war all along the line, in the courts, in friendly newspapers, in magazine articles, over the radio, and in politics.

"The committee finds that the private power companies have made efforts to effect the decisions of municipalities and farm organizations with respect to the purchase of electric power from the Authority by the expenditure of money, the use of misleading propaganda, the construction of spite lines, and the institution of a multiplicity of vexatious legislation" (T. V. A. committee's report, p. 8).

The most disruptive of these suits was that of the Tennessee Electric Power Co. (a Willkie corporation) and others. From the number of plaintiffs joined in this suit it came to be known as the 18 Power Companies Case. It raised the question of the constitutionality of the T. V. A. Act, and under it the trial court enjoined the T. V. A. from carrying out its contracts or making new ones. The decision of the trial court was reversed by the district court of appeals but from that judgment the power companies took appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States (T. V. A. committee's report, p. 205).

It was while this case was wending its way through the courts and the whole T. V. A. program was tied up that Willkie and his fellow corporation representatives discharged their heaviest propaganda and political artillery. There came a rift between members of the T. V. A. commission. One of them made charges against the others, but first declined to substantiate them and then withdrew them. He was removed by President Roosevelt and replaced by another appointee. And Congress ordered a comprehensive investigation of the T. V. A. and all the charges against it.

This investigation was ordered in 1938. It took 600,000 words of testimony, and made a report in April 1939 fully exonerating T. V. A. of all the charges made against it.

The chairman of this committee was Senator VIC DONAHEY, of Ohio, and the Republican Members were Senator DAVIS, of Pennsylvania and Congressmen JENKINS of Ohio and WOLVERTON of New Jersey. The committee employed Francis Biddle, of Philadelphia, as its counsel to conduct the investigation and hearings.

The report of this committee, and the testimony taken by it, is available at the Seattle Public Library for anyone wishing to consult it. It is chiefly from this record that I have compiled this information.

The committee soon discovered, if its members did not already know, that the moving spirit in this campaign against the T. V. A. and the Government's whole public power program was Wendell L. Willkie. It is impossible to read the report and the testimony without coming to the same conclusion.

"The committee finds, that the activities of the private power companies in attempting to prevent the board from executing the provisions of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act, the public interests have been injured by the retarding of the Authority's power program, the loss of large amounts of revenue to the Authority, the loss of savings to consumers, the expenditures of public money to defend the unnecessarily large number of suits, and the economic waste of spite lines." (Report of the T. V. A. committee, p. 8.)

There is a harsh word in the lawbooks which would seem to have been invented to describe one of these offenses. It is the word "barratry." Barratry is defined by Webster as "the persistent incitement of litigation." It is a charge sometimes made against ambulance-chasing lawyers. I do not recall ever having heard it made against attorneys for great corporations.

Mr. Willkie was called as a witness before the committee, and his sworn testimony of some 50,000 words may be found in part 10 of the hearings.

Mr. Willkie in his opening statement proclaimed his opposition to the Government's public power program, and his opinion that that program is unconstitutional. He said:

"Of course, it is my personal belief that the T. V. A. should go out of the power business and confine itself to its functions of flood control, navigation, and soil conservation. I have always been convinced that the activities of the T. V. A. violate the Constitution by putting the Federal Government in a business it is not authorized to engage in, thus destroying the property of its citizens. It is my view that the soundest solution, both for the Government and the utilities, would be for the T. V. A. to dispose of power generated by it to the utilities at the switchboard. The utilities could then distribute it under Federal and State regulation." (Testimony before the T. V. A. committees, pp. 4226 and 4227.)

This statement is of vital interest to the people of Washington. If we had a President who "has always been convinced that the activities of the T. V. A. violate the Constitution," we would have every reason to fear the abandonment of the Government's power program at Bonneville and Coulee. What this would mean in dollars and cents to customers in Washington is shown on page 5478 of the testimony. It is there shown in tables compiled from reports to the Edison Electric Institute. The figures are for 1936. In that year there were in Washington 454,936 customers for electric current who paid $30,735,476 for the current purchased by them. If this current had been distributed at the yardstick rates announced by the T. V. A., which correspond roughly to the yardstick rates of the Bonneville and Coulee, the savings to customers in this State would have been $12,615,661.

This yardstick rate for retail distribution by the utilities, however, does not please Mr. Willkie. His view is expressed in these words in the testimony, page 4279:

"Question by Mr. BIDDLE. You make the suggestion that your company buy the power at the [T. V. A.] switchboard?

"Mr. WILLKIE. Yes.

"Mr. BIDDLE. Under the present law the provision now is that the resale of this power must be made by the municipalities and cooperatives at the rate fixed by the T. V. A. and those municipalities?

"Mr. WILLKIE. And to which I do not agree under the law."

Mr. Willkie declared in his original statement before the committee that his motive in opposing the T. V. A. was a selfish one. On page 4226 of the hearings he says:

"It is obvious that I have a selfish interest in eliminating this Government competition because it would remove the 'stop' sign from our business and permit it to expand our operations and prepare to meet the demands of the future."

This statement was volunteered by the witness, not then under cross-examination, and apparently prepared in advance. While it is not difficult to determine what the witness was trying to say, the writer submits that the sentence will not stand grammatical analysis.

Before the committee Mr. Willkie was an evasive witness. This appears in many places. I cite but one example.

On page 5455 of the testimony Congressman THOMASON tried to get him to tell the committee about the resale rates charged by his company for Muscle Shoals current. He asked:

"Mr. THOMASON. You operated under that contract for more than 5 years and you bought the juice at the Muscle Shoals gate for less than 2 mills, and sold it right at the dam for 10 cents?

"Mr. WILLKIE. That is not correct, sir, and in addition——

"Mr. THOMASON. What did you sell it for?

"Mr. WILLKIE. You take the average rate for domestic energy in the city of Sheffield and in my judgment it was never 10 cents, but let me tell you something else——

"Mr. THOMASON. How much was it?

"Mr. WILLKIE. That is just a question, Mr. THOMASON, that doesn't have any soundness to it on your part but——

"Mr. THOMASON. I just wanted to get the facts."

Then after about a page of argument between them and other members of the committee occurs this:

"Mr. THOMASON. The power you bought for less than 2 mills at Muscle Shoals before the T. V. A. Act went into effect, for what price did you sell it at Florence and Sheffield?

"Mr. WILLKIE. We sold it at Florence and Sheffield at just the same price we sold it for all over the State of Alabama."

In his anger over the T. V. A. power program Mr. Willkie repeatedly denounced the Federal Government. Members of the committee usually took him to task for this and he sometimes modified his charges to say that he meant the agencies of the Federal Government. As for instance on page 4270 of the testimony:

"Question by Congressman BARDEN. I notice that you get just a little more indignant when you get on this subject of the trade (referring to the efforts of the T. V. A. to purchase the corporation's electric properties) than you do at any other time.

"Mr. WILLKIE. If you were in my position——

"Mr. BARDEN. Your voltage goes up a little higher.

"Mr. WILLKIE. If you were in my position and for 5 long years had the Federal Government do this to you every day, had——

"Mr. BARDEN. Well, just a moment. Let's amend that now to this extent. You don't want to sit down here and abuse the Federal Government?

"Mr. WILLKIE. I will say the agencies then."

In its report the congressional committee finds that Mr. Willkie is a boodler. The committee does not use that harsh term. Webster's dictionary defines boodle as "money paid or taken for votes or political influences, bribe money, graft." It gives the word "boodler," but does not define it. I submit that if boodle is money paid or taken for votes or political influence, then boodler is one who pays or takes money for votes or political influence.

The committee, in its report, on pages 198 and 199 says:

"In January 1935 the Tennessee State Legislature passed a statute authorizing Chattanooga to construct a municipal distribution plant, providing the voters should approve of the project in a referendum. The referendum was held on March 12, 1935, and by a vote of about 19,000 to 8,000 a bond issue to finance the proposed municipal system was authorized.

"Prior to the referendum the Commonwealth & Southern, and its operating company, the Tennessee Electric Power Co., carried on an active though unsuccessful campaign to defeat the bond issue. A so-called Citizens and Taxpayers Association was formed. The total funds used by the association against the bond issue amounted to $22,265.45. Of this sum $20,000 was contributed by the Commonwealth & Southern."

Further light on this transaction is thrown in the testimony of Paul S. Mathis, an employee of the Tennessee Electric Power Co., and treasurer of the Citizens and Taxpayers Association. On page 2667 and succeeding pages of the evidence, Mathis testified that prior to the bond election Commonwealth & Southern had contributed $10,000 to the campaign. After the election the association found itself in the hole $10,856.89. Apparently confident of Willkie's interest Mathis wrote Willkie for the money. This letter is given in the testimony. From it I quote:

"I am asking your company, as a large stockholder of the Tennessee Electric Power Co., for some further financial assistance.

"We are all very sorry that our campaign was unsuccessful. However, we feel that the fight has just begun."

Apparently Willkie felt the same way. Here is how it appears in the testimony:

"Question by Mr. BIDDLE. Did Mr. Willkie come through?

"Mr. MATHIS. Yes, sir.

"Mr. BIDDLE. How much did he send you?

"Mr. MATHIS. $10,000."

Again on page 2688 of the testimony occurs this passage:

"Question by Senator SCHWARTZ. Do you understand that they have a statute in Tennessee that makes it an offense for a Tennessee corporation to contribute funds to control or effect an election?

"Mr. MATHIS. Yes, sir."

But Mr. Willkie and Commonwealth & Southern were immune from prosecution under the Tennessee law. Willkie's address was 20 Pine Street, New York City, and his crime, if any, was committed there. And the Commonwealth & Southern is a Delaware corporation.

But there is a Federal law which those dealing with the matter have apparently overlooked. In the Tennessee Valley Authority Act, section 20 (C), occurs this provision:

"Any person who * * * shall enter into any conspiracy, collusion, or agreement, express or implied, with intent to defraud the Corporation or wrongfully and unlawfully to defeat its purposes, shall, on conviction thereof, be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both."

After his long years of fighting the T. V. A., with all sorts of weapons, Willkie finally sold to it the distributing plant of the Tennessee Electric Power Co. At one stage of the negotiations the parties agreed upon the employment of expert accountants to ascertain the cost price and depreciated value of those properties. These accountants reported a cost price of about $81,000,000, depreciation about $24,000,000, and present depreciated value of $57,000,000 (T. V. A. report, p. 206).

The T. V. A. offered Willkie $67,000,000, or $10,000,000 more than the accountants' estimate of its value. Willkie held out until finally agreement was reached on a purchase price of $76,600,000.

At this price there was more than $12,000,000 loot for the companies, as indicated by the behavior of the stock of the Commonwealth & Southern on the stock market when the deal was announced. The deal was announced on February 6, 1939. The following day the Post-Intelligencer said in its stock-market report:

"Over the week end the T. V. A. ended its long-drawn-out dispute with the Commonwealth & Southern by paying close to $76,000,000 for the utility properties in Tennessee, and sent a wave of buying into the utility and electric shares at the opening. Commonwealth & Southern preferred was the individual star, soaring 7⅛ at one time and closing at 62½. Elsewhere plus and minus signs were about equally divided at the final bell."

An increased market price of $7 a share for the preferred stock means about $10,500,000. But Commonwealth & Southern owned only three-fourths of the preferred stock of the Tennessee Electric. Adding the increase of the other one-fourth to $10,500,000 makes the gamblers' estimate of the amount of loot for the corporations in the purchase price about $13,800,000.

The committee had completed its hearings, but it said in its report, page 205:

"Immediately before this report was filed the attention of the committee was called to rumors of speculation on the stock exchange of the Commonwealth & Southern Corporation and the Tennessee Electric Power Co. during the negotiations for the purchase of the Tennessee Electric Power Co.'s electric system by the Authority. No facts were presented to the committee regarding these rumors. The committee, however, calls this to the attention of Congress for any action Congress may wish to take."

The committee had completed its work. Here is a comment on the speculation, however, by Jay Franklin, taken from his book The Future Is Ours, page 131:

"Willkie accepted; then, for the first time since his long duel with Lilienthal [T. V. A. Commissioner] began, he outsmarted himself. He chortled, he gloated, and boasted of his success, which was only human, and Wall Street, pathologically, boomed him for the Presidency as the only man who could out-foe Dave Lilienthal in a business deal.

"The deal boomeranged. T. V. A. went to Congress for authority to complete the deal. The Senate promptly granted the request. The House however * * * delayed action. There was a time when it seemed the T. V. A. would be compelled to complete a duplicate distributing system. This brought Willkie to terms. The original authorization was pushed through Congress, and the deal renegotiated. This time there was no gloating at the pay-off. It had been too narrow a squeak all around."

Which brings us to the end of the trail—or does it? Thus far this narrative has dealt with the measure of Wendell L. Willkie as it is shown in congressional reports. But there is another authority, the Supreme Court of the United States. Through all these months the "18 Power Companies Case" which had tied the T. V. A. up in a hard knot, had been wending its weary way toward that tribunal. The original trial court had tied up T. V. A. by an injunction. The district court of appeals had reversed this decision. The power companies had appealed to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court spoke in January 1939. It spoke, not through one of the Roosevelt appointees to the court, but in an opinion written by Judge Roberts, who had been appointed in 1930 by the former President Herbert Hoover.

In effect, the Supreme Court in this decision kicked Mr. Willkie and his whole caboodle of fellow corporation conspirators down stairs. It is not necessary to quote the decision at length. In its final paragraph the decision says:

"In no aspect of the case have the appellants (the power companies) standing to maintain the suit and the bill was properly dismissed (by the circuit court). (Sup. Ct. Repts. 305–7, p. 366.)

Here at long last is the full measure of a man who aspires to be President of the United States, expressed by the Supreme Court of the United States, from whose judgment, under our Constitution, there is no appeal.

And this is what Willkie, since he became a candidate (article in Fortune for April 1940) says about the Supreme Court:

"In former days the people could protect their enterprises by resort to the courts. Today the highest court of the land cannot be relied on for that purpose."

Some of our conservative friends call this "seeking to undermine confidence in the courts." But of course Willkie wouldn't do that.

The facts herein cited regarding Mr. Willkie were well known in higher political circles at the time of Willkie's nomination for President. Most of those who nominated him were familiar with them. He is the kind of a President they want. That's the reason they nominated him.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN G. ALEXANDER
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 6, 1940

LETTER AND RESOLUTION OF CITY COUNCIL OF MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter and resolution:

CITY OF MINNEAPOLIS,
OFFICE OF CITY CLERK,
September 4, 1940.

Congressman JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Attached you will find copy of action of the City Council of the City of Minneapolis, Minn., at a meeting held August 30, 1940, memorializing the Senate to refuse to pass the Wheeler-Lea transportation bill.

Very truly yours,

CHAS. C. SWANSON, City Clerk.

Resolution by Alderman Robb memorializing the Senate to refuse to pass the Wheeler-Lea transportation bill

Whereas the Wheeler-Lea omnibus transportation bill nullifies and repeals the purposes for which subsections 19, 20, and 21 of section 5 of the Interstate Commerce Act (Panama Canal Act) were enacted into law, insofar as they apply to water carriers operating on waters elsewhere than the Panama Canal; and

Whereas this bill as amended and passed by the House of Representatives makes it possible for railroads to own, lease, and operate water carriers with which they may now or in the future compete upon the Great Lakes, the inland rivers, and the coastal waters of the United States; and

Whereas the Wheeler-Lea bill as amended emasculates the existing law and destroys the protection which it has afforded during the past 26 years; and

Whereas the passage of this amendment will result in nullifying decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission protecting and making effective transportation of property through the great inland waterways; and

Whereas the passage of the amendment to the Wheeler-Lea bill is inimical to the interests of the city of Minneapolis: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the City Council of the City of Minneapolis, That the city heartily disapproves of the passage of this bill, and respectfully requests the Senate to refuse to concur in the House recommendation that this bill be passed: Be it further

Resolved, That the city clerk of the city of Minneapolis be and is hereby instructed to transmit a copy of this resolution to the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, and to each Member of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States from the State of Minnesota.

OF
HON. JOSH LEE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, September 6 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

LETTER FROM RUTH GOBER

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter from one of my former students. It is a most remarkable letter, and one which I believe, because of its literary merit, appropriateness, and timeliness deserves a place in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUGUST 31, 1940.

JOSH LEE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Am leaving for Blackwell and another year as teacher of speech in the high school there. Also, have the added responsibility of serving as vice president of the Central States Speech Association which is composed of the 13 Central States of the Nation. Was sent as president of the Oklahoma Speech Association last year to represent our group at Minneapolis and invite the association to meet in Oklahoma City. They will be there in full force in April 1941. Think bringing so many national speech authorities to our State will mean much to speech education in Oklahoma.

I learned much about speech by attending every session of the National Democratic Convention in Chicago. Learned a few new things about parliamentary procedure in the Oklahoma caucus there.

Was in Canada recently and felt the impact of the war upon those people. That Canada's danger is our danger seemed suddenly real to me.

A few summers ago, with a group of five friends, went into England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, Belgium, Holland, Germany (was a guest in the Alois Lange home during the three hundredth anniversary of the Oberammergau Passion Play), Austria, Italy, and France, and Switzerland.

One day as we were leaving Nuremberg, another American tapped my friend, Mrs. R. L. Jones, of Bristow, on the shoulder and whispered in a tense manner, "Did you hear that Dolfuss has been murdered?"

"No. When?"

"Yesterday sometime. Haven't been able to learn more."

All day Americans tried to find out just what had happened. The German papers told very little. The German people told less, except when beyond the hearing distance of another German. We were scheduled to return to Nuremberg. That night in the hotel, the five of us tried to decide just what was best to do. There was tenseness in the air. We had felt it several days. * * * The next morning as we checked out from the hotel we noticed a number of books for sale. Among them was Mein Kampf by Adolf Hitler. A member of the party remarked, "Well, now, I suppose that this man whose picture we see every time we turn around has taken up writing. Wonder if his book will find any buyers."

That was in the summer of 1934. Just 6 years later I sit in the Senate gallery and hear it said over and over again, "There is no danger from Hitler. He can never cross the ocean * * *," and then they quote facts and figures. One man bursts forth in praise of a certain presidential candidate who says something about how undemocratic it is to draft men in peacetime. As I recall, in no daily papers have I read that war has been declared upon any nation by Germany. On the desk next to that of the Senator who is speaking, from my place in the gallery, I can read the headlines in the evening paper which say, "Rumania gives in."

A young man tells me there is no need for a draft. There is no danger. "If there is a danger we will volunteer."

"What would cause you to think that there was a real danger to our Nation?"

"If England should give up—then I'd be ready to be drafted."

"It doesn't take long to train an army." I wonder.

Here is what we saw in Cologne 6 years ago.

Hitler youth marching shoulder to shoulder, row after row, every lad in step with every other lad, singing, holding high lighted torches, little lads stumbling along but holding torches proudly, smiling up at the older boys, spires of that masterpiece of architecture, Cologne Cathedral, luminous as a giant taper against the blackness of the night sky; a little old German woman finding us, five Americans, somewhat uneasily looking on at the parade. We were far back in the crowd, the voice of the little woman saying, "Come on up in front where you can see." We hesitated; we remembered the "purge of blood" which had happened in Germany just a few days earlier. The voice of the little woman reassured us with friendly, confident tones, "Come on, I won't let anything happen to you."

Memories of other marching youth, youth of other years who marched no more, seemed to fill the mind of the little old lady. These boys were marching toward something, they were symbolizing something to the older Germans who stood along the crowded street.

"See, just a few more years and they'll be soldiers. Yes; just a few more years and they'll be soldiers!" said the old German woman with a look of exultation on her face.

A middle-aged German, away from the hearing of others, told us one day, "The German youth had an inferiority complex because their parents had lost the World War. It was unsafe for a man to be on the streets after 10 o'clock at night, there were so many rival parties trying to gain control of the government. No one was strong enough to have the respect of a majority. Street fights were common. Now all that is changed. Hitler came along. He put the young boys in uniform; he gave them songs to sing. They became a part of something—they belonged. Now everything has changed. We have one party—one leader."

The youth of Germany as they were symbolized in the Hitler youth who marched along, holding high lighted torches that night, are now the men, who soaring above the European countries, are dropping flaming death from the sky.

For 12 years, as a teacher in high school and junior college and Hi-Y summer camps, I've had a special interest in the youth of Oklahoma and consequently all youth. I am for peace if possible, but I still believe in the philosophy my father used when he said to my three brothers, "Never pick a fight. Get out of it if possible, but if you see that there is no honorable way to escape be certain that you are well prepared and then get in the first lick."

And that leads up to the idea of being well prepared.

Belleau Wood, at a distance, was a beautiful forest of fresh, green trees.

"That doesn't look like the scene of a fierce battle. I thought there would be only ugly stumps of trees left standing."

That was said as we neared the woods. Once within those woods the scars of battle were glaring. For 16 years younger trees had been growing to conceal the destruction left by the war. Pieces of barbed wire; the rusting bits of old guns, now nearly covered by drifted sand; bushes filled with wine-red berries; the ghostly trunks of trees long dead, but which, like the soldiers who refused to lie down in their graves, they, too, stood as grim reminders of the death left in the path of exploding shrapnel. The pent-up emotions of international hatreds are symbolized in the many balls which fill a shrapnel—and are set off by the bursting charge of war.

Just as a new generation of youth filled the homes and the streets of the various war-torn European nations, so a new growth of trees had served as camouflage among the tree stumps.

In the nearby museum of relics of the battlefield the guide pointed to a machine gun and spoke of the shells which were linked together at regular fractions of a foot and which when passed before the trigger rhythmically belched forth death.

"See that steel linking holding the bullets together? When the war first began—you are an American, aren't you?" asked the French guide. "Well, then, you have a right to know the truth—those bullets were not linked with steel * * * it was costly. They were linked with a fiber; threads would cause backfire. Dozens of gunners lost their lives because of that imperfection in the linking of the shells; but the manufacturers made many dollars by risking human blood. Finally, when the United States joined the Allies, the quality of ammunition was slightly improved. But we often captured guns made in Great Britain."

Shrapnel wounds in trunks of trees, deeper wounds in the souls of men. * * * That was my impression of Belleau Wood.

The Russell-Overton amendment to the conscription bill will do much to save human life.

Let us not become as Austria and the other European nations who were unable to protect themselves.

In Austria, on the streets, in the cathedrals, at the opera, among those drinking beer, one was strangely conscious of the fact that there were present young men and there were elderly men; but scarcely ever did one see a middle-aged man. It was like looking at an orange tree and seeing only blossoms and ripe fruit, fruit that had been hanging so long that the fruit was beginning to loosen its hold upon the tree of life. What had happened to the in-between ages? They had become white crosses.

An Italian paper can be very confusing when one translates slowly and inaccurately and when those foreign words may hold the answer to the puzzling question, Who killed Dollfuss?

As we had gone from Austria into Italy the Italians were guarding their border. Trainload after trainload of Army trucks, guns, implements, and supplies were going toward the border line between Austria and Italy. The trains were always on schedule. The speed at that time was probably surpassed by that of no other nation. As the train rushed through the forests a shout of voices of many men went up in greeting. Looking closely, one discovered camouflaged encampments of Italian soldiers. Italy was taking no chances.

So here in Venice we were trying to find out about Dollfuss. Days had passed and still very little information had been given to the public. An Italian saw us laboring to read and came to our rescue.

"Would you like me to translate the news for you? Oh, its this article you want to read?"

So the secret was revealed. The murderer had been brought to justice. "Heil Hitler" were the last words which he had spoken just before he died for his crime. The translator turned to us with an expression of distrust and hatred in his eyes as he said in a low voice, vibrant with emotion, "'Heil Hitler.' See, it was a German who did it. We don't want those Germans on our border line."

Later we discovered that the man who had read the story was a member of the Black Shirts. * * * Now they are fighting side by side with the Germans. Something happened inside of Italy. It happened through intrigue probably.

In Washington, D. C., this week, in the halls of the Capitol, I was waiting for the door to open that I might hear congressional discussion. A woman rushed up when she saw me reading a paper and asked:

"Is the picture in there? Is the picture in there?"

Later I learned that she was interested in a picture which was taken of her "mourning veil group." Suddenly there are five women surrounding me telling me that the draft bill is unnecessary. I mention the danger from Canada and am met by a hollow, mocking laugh and the remark:

"When did you begin to think that there was danger from Canada? Germany can't get to Canada and, besides, who ever tried to take anything from the United States but Great Britain?"

Here is something I need to know more about; I appear interested. The story is told. One woman produces a map of Hungary from 1896–1940. She pushes a small wheel, the country moves apart. She tells, with rancor in her voice, how Hungary was broken up; what was hers was taken away; here was Poland and the other small countries.

There came reeling through my thoughts all that I had seen, and felt, and heard in Europe. Nations whose beauties I had loved so much 6 years ago now are no more. Here are these same elements, like insects working at the heart of another great oak. From the surface all seems well. When the enemy works long enough to sever the roots of a tree from the trunk and branches and limbs which they nourish, and a storm comes, the tree crashes. Let's continue, as you are now so ably doing, Senator Lee, to be on guard and outplay them at their own game.

In Flanders Fields one Sunday afternoon we saw crosses—row on row of crosses. The poppies were blowing blood-red in the wind among the rows of white crosses. If war must come—as we of America pray that it may not—but if come it will, then let's see that our soldiers are given every opportunity to do their best, then success will be theirs as always. Let there be as few white crosses for American lads as possible.

As I listened to the junior Senator from Oklahoma this week there came to my mind the story of a buddy to whom he had vowed that if he ever was in a position to tell the Nation a few things about war he would do it in no uncertain terms.

Senator LEE, you are keeping that vow. The opposition of money against human blood conservation is great, but right will win! From what I have seen in Europe and from what I have known to be true in America (and I sat under the hot sun in Soldiers Field in Chicago recently to hear Lindbergh speak—because what is happening in this Nation is vital to the lives of the youth in whom I am interested and with whom, beginning in September, I'll be working daily—because it is so vital to their future welfare, I feel it my duty to know as much about it as possible), it is because of these things that I so earnestly appreciate what you are saying and doing as our United States Senator from Oklahoma.

Sincerely, a former student,

RUTH GOBER.

Wanted: A Plan for Defense

ARTICLE BY HANSON W. BALDWIN

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, the article by Hanson W. Baldwin, military and naval critic for the New York Times, appearing in Harper's magazine for August 1940, presents in an intelligent way the problem of the defense of the Western Hemisphere. The article as a whole is so full of good common sense that I feel every Member of Congress should have the privilege of reading it.

[From Harpers magazine for August 1940]

WANTED: A PLAN FOR DEFENSE

(By Hanson W. Baldwin)

On May 10 Germany commenced her long-awaited and long-expected bid for victory.

As the German legions swept through the Netherlands and Belgium and on into France the great American capacity for fevered thinking—largely latent during the war's months of "sitzkrieg"—started to manifest itself. Our emotional pendulum swung from boredoom to excitation. Congress and the public, stirred by the possible implications of a German victory, became more defense-conscious than at any time since the war to end war, 22 years ago.

In itself this was a healthy reaction in a world racked by war in which we have seen the impossible become history. The defense services of the nation have been too long closely held private corporations, their actual balance sheets hidden in a maze of carefully chosen statistics, their assets known only to a few, their liabilities to still fewer. And the sincere efforts of some conscientious and balanced individuals to improve, modernize, reorganize, and strengthen what are, after all, public corporations charged with the public good have been too long met by public complacency and indifference.

Not that the public has been antagonistic to defense. Not that it has ignored it. Not that the administration has failed to recognize the fundamental importance of national security amidst international chaos. The facts refute all such contentions. This is a campaign year. We must, therefore, expect footless statements. But it is not necessary to believe them. The facts are shown in the accompanying table.

At Pine Camp Army maneuvers in 1935 I saw a lamentable spectacle. The United States Army then had some 7 usable tanks, of which we were very proud. Military attachés of many foreign nations were invited to view some of these tanks in action. Four started to cross a dreary, stump-pocked field and charge up a sandy bank where the military attachés were standing. Two broke down. One "bellied up" on a stump, its tracks working helplessly like a crab out of water. One charged gloriously up the sandy bank to demonstrate the might of Uncle Sam to the representatives of foreign powers there assembled.

The Army

	1934	1940
Officers and men (Regular Army)	134,000	242,648

The air forces

This fiasco probably represented the nadir of our post-war preparedness. About a month ago, in the Sabine River area of Louisiana and Texas, the Regular Army put almost 400 tanks into action. It is obvious that the funds appropriated for defense in the past 7 years have not been "poured down a rat hole"; it is also obvious that the administration of President Roosevelt (an administration that has happened to coincide with the era of Hitler, of rampant Japan, of expanding Italy, of aggressive communism) has done more for defense than any other administration since the World War.

But it is also obvious that neither the results achieved nor the programs planned meet our present defense needs, and it is altogether questionable whether the modernization of our defenses has been properly directed. We have got too little for our defense dollar. Red tape and inefficiency have caused delay and waste. At least 40 of 107 naval vessels commissioned in the past 7 years have had initial defects or mistakes in design which have cost millions to rectify. It takes us 4 or more years to build a battleship; Britain in peacetime requires about 4 years. So dim has been our military vision that we have had to buy the basic design for our antitank gun (a weapon still unavailable in any quantity) from Germany, for an aircraft cannon from France. We have but recently begun the manufacture of new and more powerful antiaircraft guns (37 mm. and 90 mm.), although such weapons have been in service in European armies for years.

Jealousy and conflict between the Infantry and the Cavalry have materially hampered the development of mechanized forces such as the German Panzerdivisionen, and have led to such absurd extremes that the Cavalry, which uses almost precisely the same type of light tank as the Infantry, cannot call their tanks "tanks," but must designate them "combat cars." Last summer the National Guard units engaged in the maneuvers at Plattsburg faced Army tanks for the first time in their experience. And last winter a special program of field exercises ordered by the President to bring the Regular Army to a high state of efficiency was emasculated in one unit by a general officer who displayed a meticulousness for whitewashed tent pegs and an insistence upon the "spit and polish" of housekeeping duties rather than upon the more onerous and far more important duties of the field.

It seems evident, therefore, that past expenditures have not bought present security and that the problem of defense is much more complex than the passage of legislation. In the past 7 years the taxpayer has been willing to see Congress appropriate substantial sums for defense; but that done, he has washed his hands of further responsibility. Neither Congress nor the people have manifested much intelligent interest in the all-important task of transmuting dollars into guns, with the result that much has been done that ought not to have been done and much has been left undone that ought to have been done.

II

The Nation has now, however, swung to the other extreme. All sorts of interest—intelligent and half-witted—has been displayed in our defense problem since the Germans marched on May 10. The pendulum has swung with startling rapidity. The danger now is not indifference but hysteria. There seems little sanity in the land. Wall Street (and no matter how you damn it, Wall Street is a barometer of the Nation) fears a German invasion of the United States this summer. Even the President talks about 50,000 planes, more than in all the combat air forces of the belligerents put together. Organizations called "sixth columns," that are little more than thinly-veiled vigilantes, are sprouting in the sunshine of unreasoned fear. We are talking blandly about the suppression of hard-won civil rights in the interest of national security. In early June the Nation—spy conscious, fearful—was almost poised and ready for a "witch hunt," for a repetition of the execrable Palmer "red raids." In seeking methods to strengthen the defense of democracy we may be in danger of sacrificing that democracy.

The times call for balanced thought, sane judgment, and the floodlight of fact. Any defense program must have the close and careful supervision not alone of the administration but of the taxpayer. For the taxpayer, the man in the street, must do the dying if war comes; he is not only entitled to but should participate in defense planning; for in essence defense planning is merely planning for the defense of the citizen's own life, for his family's security, for the ways and things which are dear to him, for the democracy and freedom which are more important than himself alone. But in doing it he must be careful that he does not lose those things—intangible, but real—which he is trying to defend.

All of this is a necessary preface to any discussion of our present and future defense needs. For our defense program must be based upon the starkest sort of reality, not upon bogies of our own creation, not upon complacent indifference. In the past 10 months we have seen the Allies come tumbling out of a world of dreams and mistaken theories; we have read the record of their mistakes, perhaps fatal mistakes, emblazoned in newspaper headlines. The cold truth is, in summary, that Germany prepared for this war, France prepared for the last war, Britain prepared for no war. Today we stand somewhere between France and Britain. Too many of our preparations have been for the last war, too many for no war of reality.

Now, any defense program must be bedded deep in the virile soil of realism. We must get away from out-worn concepts, from the "spit and polish" school, the "Colonel Blimps," the political admirals. We must recognize, as the Germans have done, that the gasoline engine, in the air and on the ground, has revolutionized the art of war. We must study the lessons of this war, digest them, and apply them to our defense. This is fundamental in any approach to a sound defense.

The major lessons of the war are not many. First and most important must be the renewed and emphatic stress laid upon the basic truth that the fighting individual is nowhere near as strong as the fighting team. The Germans owe much of their success in war to this principle and to the failure of their opponents to recognize it. The German command is unified, their strategic planning and tactical training unified, their operations coordinated and directed to a common end. Their fighting machine is more of a team than that of any other nation; there is little room in it for temperamental individuals. Their complete coordination of ground and air has been exemplified over and over again—in Poland, in Norway, in the Netherlands, Belgium, and France. Similar cooperation between naval units, ground forces, and air forces was demonstrated in the Norwegian campaign. Such coordinated effort is essential, not alone to the winning of a war, but to the rounding out of a balanced defense program.

Our defense forces suffer from its lack. Our officers stand too much upon pomp and prerogatives of rank. We have no unity of command, no unified planning, no higher war college where strategic planning by all arms is possible, as in France, no group or general staff of experts who know the capabilities and limitations of armies, navies, air forces, who understand the finely articulated integration of all these arms into a fighting machine.

The Germans, moreover, have had military vision. They knew the machine gun had stabilized the lines in the past war; they sought for its answer. They found it in the plane in the air, mechanized forces on the ground. The world saw a rehearsal of the German tactics in Spain, where the plane was used somewhat like artillery for bombardment of front lines, strafing of ground troops. It saw a full-dress rehearsal in Poland. France and Britain paid it scarce heed; we paid it less. It is a curious commentary too that, though the German air force is the world's largest, it is not designed or organized primarily to fight in the air. Rather is its every effort directed to one end—the common end toward which the sea and land forces of Germany are also directed. Its objectives are ground targets or sea targets; it will fight in the air if it has to, but that is incidental to its purpose.

Understanding the importance of the gasoline and Diesel engines in the air, the Germans have also recognized their capabilities—when armor protected—on the ground. The tank and the armored motor vehicles, infantry in trucks and soldiers on motorcycles, artillery towed at 30 miles an hour have made time a paramount factor in war; such mechanized and motorized units combine the functions of cavalry with the World War function of the tank—that of the battering ram. Infantry has not been abandoned; it is still the essential mass of all armies; it is recognized that in the last analysis the man in the shell hole is the one who must consolidate control of conquered territory. But the modern army that has not a considerable proportion of its strength harnessed to the motor and protected by armor is an obsolete army.

The struggle at sea has shown that for our purposes the fighting ship is of more importance than ever. The influence of air power upon sea power is evident; in narrow waters operations of fighting fleets will be circumscribed and hampered by air power; the menace of the plane must be reflected in greater deck armor and more adequate protection for exposed personnel, perhaps in the development of new types.

The epic of the Allied retreat from Flanders—one of the greatest rear-guard actions in history—illustrates most vividly the fact that, despite the importance of machines, the fundamental worth of trained and intelligent men is one of the most important elements in any recipe for an adequate defense. Contrary to most suppositions, the German doctrine also stresses this; Truppenführung, the German field-service regulations, specifically states that "in spite of technique the worth of man is the decisive factor." Indeed, man must be more finely trained than ever if he is to handle the terrific engines of destruction which the mind of man has conceived. To achieve the impact of material mass it may be necessary in our manufacturing processes to sacrifice some degree of quality for quantity, to build, for instance, aircraft engines which have lives of 30 to 100 hours, instead of 2,000; but if we sacrifice the training of the individual, we shall pay for it in blood in the next war.

Such are the broad general lessons of the war, lessons upon which we must predicate our defense program if we are to prepare, not blindly, but intelligently. But if we are to have a defense program that is more than the blind appropriation of dollars we must first define what we are prepared to defend, and we must know, second, against whom we are to defend it.

III

Neither task is easy. For no definition of defense will ever satisfy all of the vocal pressure groups of this country, much less public opinion as a whole. Nor is it easy to delimit our vital areas. Are the East Indies, for instance, with their supplies of rubber and tin—strategic raw materials which we lack—vital to us? And should we build up a defense organization capable of defending the Philippines, even though we are now legally committed to withdrawal from those islands in 1946? Must we attempt to defend our commercial shipping and interests everywhere, as the naval policy enunciated by the Navy Department would imply, or should we, on an even broader basis, prepare to defend that philosophy which President Roosevelt described as "a way of life not for America alone but for all mankind"? Is our frontier in France or on the English Channel?

There has been no unanimity on these questions, and where there is no reasonable public agreement no reasonable defense program can be developed. But there can be, and is, virtual unanimity of public opinion on hemisphere defense, which is simply a strategic way of describing the Monroe Doctrine, the most firmly rooted foreign policy in our history. The American people seem determined that the Western World is for the Western nations; this, they say, we defend; upon this concept of defense can be built a program.

Strategically, hemisphere defense does not mean what it implies geographically. There is no need for a rigid attempt to defend every bit of the land mass of the Western Hemisphere—first, because not all of it is worth defending strategically; second, because all that is required for effective defense is sufficient control of strategic points within the hemisphere to enable our planes and ships to guard any vital areas and to prevent any enemy from establishing "bridgeheads" in the west.

Practically this means perhaps that our supervision should extend over that area bounded by the international date line from northern Alaska to the vicinity of Canton Island, thence eastward to the Galapagos; thence southward to the vicinity of 40 degrees south latitude; thence eastward again to the Atlantic and northward on a line running roughly through the Brazilian island of St. Paul and through the Azores to Greenland.

This seems like a large order—and it is; but it can be simplified. For a relatively few bases, properly situated, organized, defended, and garrisoned, and with the proper forces operating from them, or ready to be sent to them, can for all practical purposes insure our control.

But bases are the first, and perhaps the most important, of our problems of hemispheric defense; regardless of who our potential enemies may be, we must have bases if hemisphere defense is to be more than a phrase on Capitol Hill. Bases—air, naval, and military—within the continental United States, in Alaska and the Aleutians, and in the complex of islands radiating round Hawaii have been, or are being, satisfactorily provided, though the Laocoön coils of red tape which have delayed construction progress need to be completely severed. Such bases effectively cover the continental United States, Alaska, western and northwestern Canada, and our mid-Pacific possessions. Farther south, near the Canal Zone, agreements similar to the understanding with Nicaragua, which allows us use of the Gulf of Fonseca, should be reached which would permit our use of the Galapagos and Cocos Islands in case of war. Some similar understanding—in return for economic or other concessions—might be reached with Chile, which would allow us the limited use of Valparaiso in case of a threatened attack against any western South American countries. However, the geography of the Pacific, with its great distances and the remoteness of any great power from the southern portion, would seem to preclude any serious attempt against western South America, particularly if we had the use of the Galapagos Islands.

In the Atlantic the real defense of southern South America must begin at the shoulder of Brazil, which juts far out into the ocean, although the richest and most industrially developed part of that continent—the only part not within our continental purview in which important alien base areas would be likely to be established—extends from south-central Brazil to the River Plate and the Montevideo-Buenos Aires area. Agreements with Brazil (tacit ones probably already exist) which would permit our use of Brazilian airports and harbors such as Rio de Janeiro, Pernambuco, Belem, and the island of St. Paul, should be definitely reached. Farther north in the West Indian-Caribbean area Aruba, Curaçao, Trinidad, and air bases in Venezuela would be of considerable utility in extending our hold upon the Caribbean and the approaches to the Panama Canal. We should at this time settle definitely any speculation as to the future status of Dutch, British, or French possessions in the West Indies or Central or South America by announcing that these possessions will be taken under our protection, if necessary, and that no change in their status quo will be permitted regardless of developments in Europe. Bermuda, most particularly, should be included in such a category, and we should also declare that any change in the status of the Azores would concern us.

Coast Guard cutters, a squadron of patrol planes, and a few submarines should cruise to Greenland occasionally, and a seasonal base might well be established there by arrangement with local authorities. And finally, definite talks with Canada and Newfoundland should be started, looking toward the use by us of their air bases and harbors (particularly Botwood, Newfoundland; St. John's, Newfoundland; Cartwright, Labrador; St. John, New Brunswick; Halifax, Nova Scotia) in case of war with any non-American power.

IV

But preceding and accompanying any such program must be the promotion of political, economic, and cultural rapprochement with all other nations and dependencies of the Western Hemisphere. We must make it worth those nations' while to be on our side; we must make it worth their while to maintain systems of government friendly to our own; we must foster pan-Americanism to the point where general staff talks and definite understandings are possible.

Once political, economic, and cultural ties have linked the hemisphere, once understandings have been reached in regard to bases (and it is important to remember that the first must precede the second), then we can staff those bases with the necessary men and guns and equip them with the long-range planes and fighting ships necessary for effective hemisphere defense.

Yet the implementation of those bases must depend upon the answer to another question, Who are our enemies? Nor can we lightly shunt aside this question or answer in the ambiguous language of diplomacy if we are to build a realistic, an effective, defense. We must know against whom we may fight, since our military strength is relative—not absolute—to that of our potential enemies.

There is no question but that the vast majority of the American people consider Germany as our No. 1 potential enemy. There is no official unanimity on such a subject; many naval officers feel that Japan is a more dangerous menace. Others think there is little to choose between communism and fascism and that we may have to face a Europe and Asia dominated by the totalitarian powers—Germany and Japan, Russia and Italy. Even to Army and Navy experts, paid to imagine the worst possible contingencies and to prepare against them, such a combination, particularly one intent upon conquest in the Western World, seems most unlikely. But it is a possibility, no matter how faint or remote, and it is against possibilities that national defense—a form of national life insurance—is designed to protect us.

Now, insofar as hemisphere defense is concerned (and the scope of this article is limited to that alone) it is perfectly clear that there is no problem whatsoever unless Germany wins the war. For without a victorious Germany, no combination of powers can be imagined that could challenge our predominance in the Western Hemisphere. And there are no nations, or combinations of nations within the hemisphere which could threaten us—even should they wish to do so.

	Armies (maximum effectives)	Navies (ships built and building)		Air forces (total planes of all types, combat training and reserve)
		Number	Tonnage
Germany	3,500,000	140–180	500,000–550,000	10,000–20,000
Japan	2,000,000	249	1,007,416	3,000–5,000(?)
Russia	4,225,000(?)	218	326,313	5,000–10,000
Italy	1,500,000	318	760,803	4,000–6,400

The 10 nations of South America could mobilize among them only 5 battleships—all of them old and obsolescent—3 modern cruisers, and a few destroyers and submarines. Their combined armies total only 290,000 men, very poorly trained; they have between them only 500 to 600 planes; their industries are in no sense adequate for the strain of war, and the war matériel they possess is almost entirely foreign-bought.

V

The increases in our defenses requested by the President in May are therefore primarily insurance against a victorious Germany. But the character of our defense problem in such an event would depend upon the character of a German victory.

This writer, for one, cannot accept easily the contention that the German conquest, if achieved, will be complete and overwhelming. We may well be facing another Napoleonic era; the odds of victory are at the present writing heavily on Germany—but not for the kind of victory that Washington is talking about. Nazi-ism, fascism, and communism have, indeed, considerable in common, but wolves do not for long lie down with lions. It seems to me to be self-evident that if Germany wins she will reap bitter crops—mistrust and fear by Russia and Italy, the necessity for constant surveillance, and uneasy domination over conquered peoples, the exhaustion consequent to any major war. Nor does it seem at all probable, even if Britain is conquered (an easy assumption, but far from an easy task), that the British Fleet will be surrendered to Hitler. It is far more likely that if Britain is defeated the British Fleet will have gone to the bottom of the sea defending England or will have retired to Canada or other Empire points.

If Germany wins we must anticipate increased power and influence and arrogance among those German and Fascist minorities which are now only irritants within the body politic of the Western Hemisphere. But our first battles—if indeed, we should ever come to such a clash of arms—would not be military or naval or air, but economic and political. For we cannot, of course, escape the effects of a German victory; our standards of living are almost certain to be reduced if autarchy stretches across Europe; we shall have to wage a fierce economic war for our markets in South America.

It will be at first an economic war, not a war of bullets, and it is possible that a military clash might never develop. But we must nevertheless—for the sake of our security, and because modern instruments of defense are not built in a day—initiate now preliminary steps to dampen the effects of any German victory. We must gage our defenses against the strengths of the totalitarian powers. In the accompanying table their standings are given.

None of this strength, or at most an inconsiderable portion of it, is now in the Western Hemisphere. (There are about a dozen old commercial transport planes of German make and possibly of German ownership in northern South America—about which so many headlines have been written—within flying distance of the Panama Canal, which is now defended by 200 to 300 planes and scores of anti-aircraft guns. If anything happens to the Canal because of those dozen German planes somebody is criminally negligent.) And none of that military strength of our potential enemies can be put into the Western Hemisphere except by sea or through the air.

Now the normal combat plane uses from 40 to 60 gallons of gasoline per hour; the pay load of the Clipper ships, for instance, that now fly the Atlantic, is only about 34,000 pounds. From 8 to 15 men are required—pilots, mechanics, ground crew, etc.—to keep 1 plane in the air, and it must have bases from which to operate, with a vast complex of fuel tanks, machine shops, ammunition and bomb dumps, food and water supplies, antiaircraft guns, etc. Mass bomber squadrons of Europe today have comfortable operating radii of 500 miles (500 miles out, 500 back), while the effective limit (and that for only a handful of planes) is not much more than twice that figure. It seems obvious, therefore, with the distances on the map in mind, that although mass bombardment, the transportation of troops by air, and parachute troops have proved of great effectiveness in the European war, we have little to fear from any of them—unless an enemy can establish bases within this hemisphere. And the plane alone cannot transport the vast matériel required for such bases over the great distances involved. There is only one carrier with cargo capacity and radius of action sufficient to do the job, one means of transportation by which the force and supplies necessary for a serious attack upon this hemisphere can be brought to this hemisphere—and that means is the ship. Yet we must remember that 7½ tons of shipping are required, on the average, for every soldier (and his equipment) transported. * * * It is obvious, therefore, that since it is only by sea and by air that an offensive force can strike at the west, ships come first, planes second, in considering the strength of our defenses.

The public has rightly been impressed with the achievement of air power in the European war. But nothing that has occurred in that war has invalidated the basic concept of sea power. German sea power put the German forces of occupation into Norway and German air power kept them there. Yet probably no more than 150,000 German troops were ever in Norway; they were transported over sea and air routes only 100 to 300 miles long. Nor has British sea power, as such, been defeated by German air power. Germany almost controls the continent of Europe because of her land and air power; yet the British blockade still cuts her off from the rest of the world. The British Navy put British troops into Norway and took them out again, with minor losses, when German air power forced their retreat. The British and French

Navies successfully evacuated 335,000 men from Dunkerque in the face of the most intensive air and land attacks ever known.

If so important in the scheme of Europe's war, sea power is therefore all the more important to us, separated as we are from potential enemies by 3,000 to 7,000 miles of ocean—ocean that can be dominated by ships alone.

The strength of our Navy, therefore, is still of primary consequence. That strength today consists of about 446 ships totaling 1,746,000 tons, built and building. The extraordinary funds requested by the President will provide moneys to lay down during the 1941 fiscal year 87 new vessels, which will increase our grand total to 2,212,070 tons. And, at writing, 84 fighting ships of 399,600 tons had been requested of Congress, bringing our potential total to 2,611,670 tons—by far the world's greatest fleet.

Compare these figures with the naval statistics of our potential enemies. The combined sea power of all four states is somewhat superior to ours in total tonnage, but in so small a ratio as to offer no danger to our security. This becomes all the more evident when one goes beyond the facade of statistics. For Russia is negligible as a sea power; her submarines could be, at worst, an irritant in the northern Pacific; it is extremely doubtful if her principal units are seaworthy enough to cross the oceans. Italy's fleet is composed of high-speed but short-range ships for Mediterranean service; some of Germany's ships have small cruising radii designed for duty in the North Sea; Japan's Navy has been built primarily for service in the Far East; our fleet is really the only blue-water navy. Today the totalitarian powers could muster against us a tenuous and theoretical superiority only if their own waters were entirely stripped of all naval protection, and a weird conglomeration of ill-adjusted fighting ships sent 3,000 miles across the seas on a mission for which they were never designed and never intended. Even then, our own fleet, a tactical, unified whole, fighting in close proximity to its own bases, aided by shore-based aircraft, would have an insuperable advantage over a conglomeration of ships operating thousands of miles from bases and constantly subject to air and submarine attack.

But our fleet has certain weaknesses. Most of it is concentrated in the Pacific. The Atlantic Squadron—which, contrary to general belief, would not be a "push-over" for any power—is an integral part of the United States Fleet, and is under the direct command of Admiral James Richardson, commander in chief of the United States Fleet, who flies his flag in the Pacific. Naval forces in the Atlantic comprise three old but still serviceable battleships, with thick deck and side armor but inferior range and slow speed; an old battleship converted into a training ship which might again be made into a fighting unit; an aircraft carrier; 5 swift, modern cruisers (plus others temporarily on this coast), more than a match for any ships of their type in the world; and a torpedo fleet of very considerable strength and mobility consisting of 40 destroyers and 20 or more submarines; and a growing "mosquito" squadron of motor torpedo boats—all backed up by the Navy's long-range patrol bombers. These Atlantic forces should be strengthened by 2 or 3 more battleships, another aircraft carrier, and some more cruisers, and will undoubtedly be so strengthened when ships of these types now building are completed.

Both the fleet in the Pacific and that portion of it in the Atlantic are deficient in mine layers—most useful for defensive purposes—and both coasts should have a larger number of long-range submarines. Greater attention should also be paid to the development of ships for specialized purposes—mine laying and anti-aircraft cruisers, net layers, and so forth.

These are, on the whole, minor weaknesses. So long as our present naval strength relative to the totalitarian powers is maintained—and this is the crux of our naval preparedness problem—we have little to fear from attack by sea. The present ratio of naval strength can change only if we neglect our own building program, if the totalitarian powers outbuild us, or—the final possibility—if the bulk of the Allied fleets should fall into German hands. Only the latter contingency could change the present ratio of naval strength overnight. The other possibilities would present a picture of gradual change, a picture to which we could adapt our own actions in ample time to conform with that change. If the swastika were raised to the gaffs of the Nelson, the Rodney, and other British and French vessels—and as we have said previously, this can be considered a most unlikely possibility—our building program would unquestionably have to be increased. But we cannot in reason attempt to outbuild the world and to prepare to the fullest against every faintly possible contingency, for to do so would be irremediably to weaken our economic and perhaps our political structure before we even entered a war. We have already taken reasonable precautions against the possibility that the British Fleet might fall into German hands by appropriating funds to start construction as soon as the ways are available of 171 new men-of-war. Our plans are therefore made and our dollars appropriated; what we need now is not further naval appropriations but the proper transmutation of dollars into fighting ships.

And that brings us to the shore organization of our Navy. We cannot maintain our present relative naval strength, vis-à-vis other powers, unless we can build good ships as rapidly as other powers, and this our Navy has not satisfactorily demonstrated that it can do. The reorganization of the Navy Department, partially carried through in recent months, should be completed; design and procurement methods altered; red tape sliced; our navy yards shaken up; new shipbuilding ways provided.

In fighting efficiency our fleet probably equals any when its actions are limited to purely naval operations; it still has a lot to learn, however, about combined operations—that type of naval, land, and air force action which requires to the highest degree coordination of all fighting services and which is the type of operations most likely to occur in any defense of the hemisphere.

VI

The German air force is a separate air force—organized, trained, and equipped under a ministry separate and distinct from the army and navy ministries. So is the French air force; so is the British. But it is obvious that the German air force has developed the use of air power to a far higher degree than either the British or French. We do not have a separate air force; our Army and our Navy control their own air forces. It ought to be evident from the lessons of the war that the type of organization doesn't matter. What does matter is the coordination between surface and air units—so marked in the case of Germany, so lacking in the case of Britain and of France.

The outstanding air lesson of the war is that air power is most effective when used in close and intensive support of naval units and ground troops—in cooperative action. Acting independently on long-range missions, it has sometimes achieved successes, but its record has been at best spotty and its success has been almost directly proportionate to the distance of the targets attacked from the home bases and to the number of planes used in the mission.

Applying these lessons to our problems we find, therefore, need for planes designed, organized, and trained to cooperate in close support of Army and Navy, and a need for powerful, long-ranging bombers capable of carrying out strategical missions in considerable mass at considerable distance from base. Our strategical problem, as has been pointed out, involves distance and bases. Given the bases—and we must have them then—we then require planes of long enough range (longer than the range of any enemy planes—and this is a challenge to our technicians) to cover all overseas approaches to those bases and to guard all vital areas of the hemisphere. But the training and operations of these long-range bombers should be closely integrated with the operations of our fleet, for the first line of defense of the Western Hemisphere is primarily a water line.

The Navy's long-range patrol bombers—great flying boats which can carry several tons of bombs and some of which have radii of 1,000 to 1,800 miles—are ideally suited for this job. But we have not enough of them. The Army's Boeing flying fortresses, faster than the patrol planes but with less range—are also well-equipped for this work.

For close cooperation with the fighting fleet and the battle line are the scout bombers, fighters, and torpedo planes of the aircraft carriers, and the catapulted seaplanes of the cruisers and battleships. We shall require from 75 to 100 more of the former types for each new carrier we put into commission, from 2 to 6 of the latter for each battleship and cruiser. We now have by far the largest ship-based air force in the world; there is no necessity for any great increment of this strength, merely the addition of sufficient new planes to provide air equipment for the new ships we build.

The Army, however, has no such closely integrated and well-knit air forces to support its ground forces. Observation planes are the only type closely attached to the individual ground units. The Army has no dive bombers; the Air Corps virtually gave up the attack plane—a type which it first developed and perfected—some time ago because some of our pilots were so bemused with the vision of an independent air arm winning wars by itself that we neglected the proper development of types to cooperate with ground troops. Dive bombers like the famous German Stukas, attack planes, and medium bombardment and pursuit types should be developed and merged into an instrument devoted to one end—support of the ground forces.

Here, then, is our air problem defined. How many planes do we need? An exact definition of our needs must depend upon an exact location of the bases available to us, but it can be said with some confidence that we do not need and should not attempt to maintain an air force of 50,000 planes. Indeed, the actual requests of the fighting services seem to be somewhat more realistic, and it is likely that the goal of 50,000 planes mentioned by the President in his defense message must have been intended to convey his conviction that our air forces should be greatly strengthened rather than to set any such figure. The Navy has asked for 10,000 planes, 16,000 pilots; the Army's exact requests at writing have not been finally determined, but apparently will be about 11,000 planes. Unless a considerable proportion of these planes are to be training planes or held in reserve (as now seems likely) these figures appear excessive, for we have nothing to fear in the air from Japan, who is a weak air power, and even Germany, the world's greatest air power, probably does not maintain in active operating combat squadrons more than 4,500 to 8,000 planes, and only a handful of these would have range enough to cross even the southern Atlantic—from French West Africa to the hump of Brazil.

The Navy could utilize effectively about 1,500 to 2,000 patrol bombers scattered throughout the Western Hemisphere. The Army should have 700 to 1,000 or more long-range bombers—most of them organized in a centralized group, such as our present General Headquarters Air Force, but ready to be immediately transferred en masse to any threatened sector. These planes should have the protection of a small force, say 200 to 400 long-range pursuits or destroyers. The Navy must maintain the strength of our ship-based aircraft; when our present building program is completed that strength will probably reach 1,500 planes. The Army must immediately build up a force of 400 to 800 planes—dive bombers, attack planes, medium bombardment and pursuit—designed for one purpose, to act as an attack instrument of the ground forces and to be under the command of whoever is assigned to command our field army. In addition, reserve fliers or civilian pilots should be organized in auxiliary fighter and interceptor squadrons, their duties the air defense of certain territorial and industrial areas in the United States. The total combat-plane strengths of both Army and Navy (including perhaps 800 planes earmarked solely for the defense of such points as the Panama Canal, Hawaii, etc.) need not be more than 7,000 to 10,000 planes, plus perhaps 25 percent reserve, plus training planes—of which a considerable number will initially be required.

For our immediate problem in the air is threefold: (1) devising the proper organization upon which our air strength can be built and achieving the maximum possible coordination of effort of Army planes with naval planes, of both with the surface forces; (2) speeding up and increasing the supply of trained pilots; (3) increasing, not so much the capacity of our aircraft factories, which even today is large, but increasing their actual production rate, which today is no more than 8,000 to 12,000 annually, and which ought to be, at least for the duration of this present international crisis, perhaps 24,000 to 36,000 annually.

VII

The Army is this Nation's and this hemisphere's third line of defense. It is an important element of that defense (we should not make the mistake of thinking that wars can be won by sea power and air power alone), and some of its functions are particularly vital. In the past we have been committed to the principle of a small citizens' army, rather than the maintenance of a huge standing army which can be utilized effectively, not in this hemisphere, but only on European or Asiatic battlefields, where the borders of hostile nations crowd across the map and mass is still hurled against mass. The mass armies of Europe or Asia cannot easily be transported to this hemisphere—can never be so transported provided we retain control of the seas and maintain a proper air defense. A small army could be transported, might elude our fleet or take advantage of its presence in another ocean to establish some beachhead in a remote area. But probably the maximum force that could be so transported—the maximum initial force that could be transported even if control of the sea were wrested from us—would not be much larger than 50,000 men. The transportation of such a force would require 375,000 tons of shipping, perhaps 40 ships, about the largest force that could conveniently be convoyed in a single operation. To supply such a force might require from 650,000 tons of shipping to 2,000,000 tons monthly; in other words, perhaps half of the tonnage of the German merchant marine would have to be devoted solely to the job of supplying 50,000 soldiers. If this force were to be doubled, the shipping tonnage necessary would be doubled; to supply an army of 1,000,000 men in this hemisphere would require at the very least 13,000,000 tons of shipping. Economically and commercially the problem seems impossible; not even Britain, or a combination of Britain and Germany, has sufficient shipping to divert such an enormous amount of it from their ordinary and vital trade routes to military purposes.

We do not, therefore, have to fear the employment of mass armies in this hemisphere; the most we have to guard against is the possible transportation of a small expeditionary force.

There are now pending various proposals for the increase in size of our Army—some of them involving relatively small but necessary numerical increases, others a basic change in the whole fundamental structure of our defense forces, a basic change indeed in the concept of our democracy. In the latter category falls the suggestion, now vigorously pressed, for conscription. Conscription in time of war can be justified. But at a time like the present it cannot be justified on a basis of hemisphere defense, for no such mass of men as conscription would provide can effectively be used in this hemisphere—with one possible exception: If we were preparing for a death struggle with a Japanized Asia and with a completely Germanized Europe in which all the navies and merchant marines, and shipbuilding facilities of the Continent were in German hands—a possibility which we have previously discussed and considered to be most unlikely.

Events do not warrant the painting of the international picture in such black overtones as this. But whether or not conscription is genuinely needed, it should never be endorsed except after careful consideration and with an understanding of the basic change in our lives and our customs that it will entail. Invocation of a compulsory-service act has many arguments in its favor, but it should be clearly understood that its adoption would create a profound, lasting, and inescapable change in the economic, social, and political life of our country and might well retard the growth of our civilization. A measure of such consequence if enacted in time of peace may become a permanent part of our institutions; it should not, therefore, be considered by Congress in this era of hysteria, but, if intended as a permanent measure, only in a time of calm calculation. On the other hand, if conscription is needed merely as a temporary-emergency measure to last for the duration of the emergency, then the emergency ought to be defined; if the international picture is black enough to warrant conscription then the President should declare a state of national emergency or Congress should declare a state of war.

And if the Army can fill its minimum needs in men without conscription there are still some valid arguments for it—but the most important, the need for manpower, falls by the wayside. And we have not yet even had a chance to try to fill our requirements by voluntary recruiting.

What are those requirements? The functions and responsibilities of our land forces are several. First, our Regular Army must provide garrisons and defenses for Army, Navy, and air bases now established, or to be established. This may require eventually 125,000 to 150,000 men, with the most heavily guarded points the Panama Canal, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and several points in the Alaskan-Aleutian area. Second, the Regular Army must provide the nucleus or cadre for coast defense and antiaircraft troops to make our continental base within the United States secure; it must have 8 to 15 men per plane to operate its air force; it must provide officers and instructors to train the National Guard and to form the skeletal structure upon which a large mass army may be built up in case of necessity after M day. And, under our broadened responsibilities of hemisphere defense, it has another function of recent development. It must provide a field force, highly trained, fully equipped, instantly ready for transportation as an expeditionary force anywhere within the Western Hemisphere—to quell, with the help of the Navy and air force, alien-inspired revolutions, to seize an advanced base, to repel an attack or hold an area, until larger forces are transported, if necessary, to assist it. Such a force certainly need be no larger than 150,000 men—perhaps half that number—about the number with which Germany, only 100 miles away, seized Norway. Adding to this the numbers required for the Army's other functions, the Regular Army, even to fulfill its broadened responsibilities, need be no larger than 400,000 men, if that large. Our present enlisted strength is about 228,000; authorized strength is 280,000; a further increase is indicated, but it should not be hard to fill the necessary quota by voluntary recruiting.

The National Guard should be reorganized and its duties redefined. Those duties should fall into 2 distinct categories. First, the guard should furnish the major portion of the forces which would provide coast and antiaircraft defense for this country. Home-guard units—some of them composed of older men—ought to be created to provide such protection for their own localities. And the other part of the guard, consisting of younger men selected for their physical fitness, should be organized and trained in peacetime to provide a field force of perhaps 9 to 12 divisions to replace the Regular Army field force if that force should be sent out of the country, to supplement it, if required, for continental defense. The authorized strength of the guard today is about 235,000 men. No increase is contemplated under the President's present plans; it should, however, have an increment of strength, primarily to furnish very considerably expanded forces for antiaircraft and home-defense purposes.

This reorganized and strengthened army needs above all to be a balanced army, with the proper number of antiaircraft units, the proper number of mechanized divisions, etc. Despite the graphic lessons of the war there is as yet no indication that our future plans have been altered to fit those lessons; there is as yet no evidence that the importance of the gasoline engine in war has been fully realized.

Hemispheric defense, it should be obvious from a study of our geographical position, from even a cursory examination of the capabilities and the limitations of the fighting ship and the fighting plane, is primarily a problem for sea power, secondarily for air power. But it is not a problem which can be solved by any one service alone, or, for that matter, by the defense forces alone. Political and economic planning within the hemisphere must precede strategical planning; the diplomatic and financial branches of government should be even more immediately interested in this problem than the military. And an integrated defense must be a defense into which each element of the fighting services, its supporting arms, and the other branches of government are nicely articulated, in which each service works, not on its own but as part of a machine.

There seems to be no such unity of concept or unity of planning in Washington. Our defense forces are, like Topsy, "jest growin'." Wanted above all is a plan for defense, a military policy, a directive, a definition of what we must defend and against whom, and the organization to carry out the plan.

We intend to spend more than $4,650,000,000, perhaps $5,000,000,000, or about $36 per capita, 42 percent of the National Budget, in this fiscal year of 1941. The dollars are flowing. But is there a plan?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, under the privilege of the House for the extension of my remarks I insert herewith an article from the Minneapolis Star-Journal, under date of

September 4, describing the funeral and burial of Senator LUNDEEN, which is as follows:

[From the Minneapolis Star-Journal]

THOUSANDS AT CAPITOL RITES FOR SENATOR—FULL MILITARY SERVICE GIVEN LUNDEEN AT FUNERAL

Final rites for Senator ERNEST LUNDEEN, victim of the Nation's worst air-liner crash, were held late today in the flower and fern-banked rotunda of the State Capitol in St. Paul.

He will be buried in Fort Snelling National Cemetery, the "Little" Arlington created by a bill he introduced in Congress.

Thousands of persons paid their last tribute at the flag-draped sealed casket, surrounded by a military guard of honor.

Mourners included State and city officials and a special delegation of United States Senators and Representatives.

The courthouse chimes were to play Senator LUNDEEN's favorite airs.

Services in the capitol, with Dr. George Mecklenburg, pastor of Wesley Methodist Church, in charge, were broadcast over WCCO, KSTP, and WDGY.

Dr. Mecklenburg paid tribute to Senator LUNDEEN's courage in standing out "against the forces of wrong."

"Today we are in one of the major crises of history," Dr. Mecklenburg said.

"Therefore, the loss of Senator LUNDEEN just at this moment seems irreparable, and we can only pray that God again will raise up more strong and fearless leaders in Congress for days like these."

Senator LUNDEEN, he said, "worked sincerely for that which he believed. It mattered not what the popular clamor of the moment might be. He was not an ordinary politician.

"We might call him a statesman. It would, perhaps, be more true to call him a prophet, a secular prophet of our times * * *.

"If the time ever comes that our prophets are under the thumb of some totalitarian party, then pity civilization."

Senator LUNDEEN, he pointed out, voted against entrance of the United States in the World War.

"Before he voted, though he knew it was hopeless, he cried out like a prophet in the wilderness against it.

"He was implacably against war because he said the poor pay the price of war. He believed in preparedness for America, but America only."

A string trio from Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, a quartet from Wesley Methodist Church, and a vocal solo by Reuben Holmquist, will be the only music.

Dr. Mecklenburg will conduct the graveside service and there will be Masonic rites by Minneapolis Lodge 19, A. F. and A. M., with military honors by United Veterans of the Spanish War, in which the Senator served.

Gov. Harold E. Stassen and Maj. Gen. Ellard Walsh headed the official delegation which met the casket at the Great Northern Depot here last night.

The casket was rolled behind a slow marching color guard of World War and Spanish-American War veterans and honor guard from Russell Gaylord Post 159, Veterans of Foreign Wars, through a silent, bare-headed crowd that jammed approaches to the station.

Behind the honor guard, marching to muffled drumbeats, the procession went up Nicollet Avenue to Tenth Street, across to Third Avenue and thence to University Avenue and the capitol.

Mrs. Lundeen, prostrated, was unable to take part. She sat in a room in Nicollet Hotel as the procession passed by.

Among mourners were the Senator's son, Ernest Ward Lundeen; two brothers, David, of Minneapolis, and Joel, of Aberdeen, S. Dak., and a sister, Mrs. Edward Widen, of Minneapolis.

Accompanying the body on the train was a special delegation including Minnesota Representatives, and United States Senators HENRIK SHIPSTEAD, of Minnesota, RUSH D. HOLT, of West Virginia, EDWIN C. JOHNSON, OF COLORADO, and JAMES E. MURRAY, of Montana.

Mark Trice, deputy Senate Sergeant at Arms, also was in the group.

At the capitol, the procession was received by a guard of honor from the Two Hundred and Sixteenth Coast Artillery Regiment, members of which stood guard all night over the casket.

State offices, and St. Paul city offices were closed today in tribute to the Senator.

Is America in Immediate Danger?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEE E. GEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 6, 1940

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, on the sea we have about 446 naval vessels today with a total tonnage of 1,746,000 tons. By 1941 we will have approximately 533 ships with a total of 2,212,070 tons. Eighty-four more fighting ships have been requested of Congress, bringing our potential total to 2,611,670 tons—by far the world's largest fleet.

At present the combined tonnage of the German, Italian, Russian, and Japanese Navies just slightly exceeds our own, but when the ships on order are built it will equal only approximately 2,584,532 tons. The Russian fleet is a negligible one, consisting of many old ships of czarist days and many boats fitted only for Arctic duty or else Black Sea service. Italy has a high-speed fleet, but her boats are short-ranged for Mediterranean service, and her submarine fleet, the strongest arm of her Navy, has inadequate cruising range for service against the United States. Although Germany has raiders, like the pocket battleship, the Deutschland, some of her ships have small cruising radii, designed only for duty in the North and Baltic Seas. As to Japan, her Navy, while formidable, has been built primarily for service in the Far East. Our fleet is really the only blue-water navy.

Today the totalitarian powers could muster against us a tenuous theoretical superiority only if their own waters were entirely stripped of all naval protection and a weird conglomeration of ill-adjusted fighting ships sent 3,000 and 7,000 miles across the seas on a mission for which they were never designed or intended. Even then, our own fleet, a tactical, unified whole, fighting in close proximity to its own bases, aided by shore-based aircraft, would have an insuperable advantage over a conglomeration of ships operating thousands of miles from bases and constantly subject to air and submarine attack.

There is, of course, for us the problem of a divided fleet; but even with the bulk of our Navy in the Pacific, our Atlantic Squadron cannot be considered a push-over, consisting as it does of 3 battleships, an aircraft carrier, 5 cruisers, 40 destroyers, 20 submarines, a fast-increasing fleet of mosquito boats, and aided by many long-range Navy bombers. Strengthened by 2 or 3 more battleships, another aircraft carrier, and some more cruisers, as the squadron will be under the present building program, it will by itself give pause to any aggressor.

Britain has assured us that her fleet will not be surrendered to the Nazis and, if necessary, will take refuge in the dominions; however, even if the remainder of the British Fleet, after the battle of Britain, becomes German, our naval supremacy will not immediately be challenged, as it would take 2 years at least for the Germans to learn to man their captured ships. After 2 years' time the Nazis, if they combined their forces with Russia, Japan, and Italy, a most remote possibility, would have a fleet about double ours; however, it would not be greatly superior to our fleet in fighting strength, and we would have the added advantage of fighting in home waters while the enemy fleet operated far from any of its bases.

IN THE AIR

We are 3,000 miles from Europe and 7,000 miles from Japan. Most of the German air force consists of Stuka bombers with a flight range of not more than 300 miles. The longest-range German bombers have a range of about 2,640 miles, which no more than insure their crossing the narrowest point of the South Atlantic without a cargo of bombs. Japan's distance from the United States makes bombing raids an impossibility except by a long flight over the Arctic route, where ice on the wings and other uncertain weather conditions would make carrying a load of bombs impractical. Then, each flight would be a suicide affair, as no return to Japan would be possible.

To operate against the United States from South America, say Brazil, Germany would have to establish air bases in Brazil, build munitions factories, provide oil supplies, establish machine-parts and overhauling plants, and transport a ground crew of 15 men to care for each plane. Such an undertaking would require a constant stream of ships to maintain supplies, and could not possibly be kept secret. Even supposing such a base to be established, then would come the precarious and lengthy flight from Brazil to the United States, with but sporadic bombing possible.

ON THE LAND

The maximum initial expeditionary force that could be transported against the United States, even if control of the seas were wrested from us, would not be much larger than 50,000 men. The transportation of such a force would require 375,000 tons of shipping, perhaps 40 ships, about the largest force that could be conveniently convoyed in a single operation. To supply such a force would require from 650,000 tons of shipping to 2,000,000 tons monthly; in other words, perhaps half the tonnage of the German merchant marine would have to be devoted solely to the job of supplying 50,000 soldiers. If this force were doubled, the shipping tonnage necessary would be doubled; to supply an army of 1,000,000 men in this hemisphere would require at the very least 13,000,000 tons of shipping. Economically and commercially, the problem seems impossible; not even Britain, or a combination of Britain and Germany, has sufficient shipping to divert such an enormous amount of it from their ordinary and vital trade routes to military purposes.

Other factors detering an expeditionary force are the difficulty of landing troops under fire, our coast defenses, the superiority of shore-based aircraft over aircraft carrier planes, the necessity confronting any invader of clearing away any harbor mines which have been laid, the fact, as Major General Hagood points out, that there are not more than five harbors in the United States at which an enemy could find the harbor equipment necessary to unload the huge artillery, the great combat tanks, the vast amount of ammunition for the artillery, and the other implements of modern warfare. Finally, after all the difficulties of landing, there is the problem of facing a fresh United States Army, fighting on familiar terrain, and backed by an unlimited amount of supplies and ammunition.

The difficulty of attack against the United States does not make necessary a large United States Army. For a regular army to make our continental bases within the United States secure we need an army of, at the outside, 400,000 men. Then to garrison our Army, Navy, and air bases, now established and to be established, we need 130,000 men. In addition, for a permanent expeditionary force, ready at any time to move to any danger spot in the Western Hemisphere, we need a force of not more than 150,000 men. This would mean a grant total of about 680,000 men for the most adequate hemisphere defense.

Today our National Guard and Regular Army, between them, total approximately 675,000 men. We have another 107,000 Reserve officers. Altogether we have over a hundred thousand more men in our armed forces than is adequate for secure national and hemisphere defense; and yet there is proposed calling 2,000,000 or 3,000,000 more men into the Army because our country is said to be inadequately defended.

It is true that many of the men who are in our armed forces are not adequately trained, but to attempt to strengthen our defenses by conscripting more men into the Army, rather than by training thoroughly the establishment that we already possess, seems extremely foolish and dangerous proceedure.

Many have been the "ifs" and "buts" of the alarmists who see America invaded within the month. Never have their arguments been based on reality, but rather they have frightened their fellows by painting them pictures of the future which can only be believed if you play the same rules of the game that they do; that is, to grant the validity of every "if" and "but" that they utter. The time has come when Americans must use their reason instead of their imagination in dealing with the foreign situation. If this pointless hysteria keeps up, it will be but a short time before we are preparing to resist an invasion from Mars because some hysterical citizen happened to find a piece of meteor in his back yard one morning.

If the issue between the friends and foes of the Burke-Wadsworth bill has narrowed down to one point—is America in danger or is it not?—the answer is "No," at least not in any danger that conscription will remedy. The most paramount and important task that confronts American defense at the present time is the training and equipping for modern war of the men we already have in uniform.

Is It Necessary To Draft Men?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM E. HESS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 6, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. ROBERT A. TAFT

Mr. HESS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered last night by Senator ROBERT A. TAFT.

The Senate has passed and the House is considering the Burke-Wadsworth bill to draft men into the Army in time of peace. Sentiment is divided, and both the advocates and opponents of the measure are violently intolerant of those who disagree with their position. There has been more invective than argument. I am strongly convinced that the best interest of the country demands the defeat of the Burke-Wadsworth bill, and this evening I will try to state calmly the reasons which have led me to that conclusion.

We face today not one emergency but two. The first is from abroad; the second is from ourselves. While I do not agree with those who think that Hitler is about to attack the United States, nevertheless we must all recognize that for the next 10 years we face a new kind of world. The development of the totalitarian nations, their effective war machines, and their complete lack of regard for international morals have created this new condition. We cannot rely on the sanctity of any treaty or any promise which may be made by the German Government and perhaps by other governments. I believe that the same condition will exist whether the German attack on England succeeds or fails. England can hardly hope to overwhelm Germany for years to come. There will always be the possibility of the destruction of the British fleet and of the breaking up of the British Empire. We must provide for that possibility. I have voted for all the various appropriations increasing the size of the Navy and of the air forces. We are agreed that we must have a navy able to defend both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. But surely it is the duty of Congress to consider as respects each measure brought before it the character and extent of the emergency. We must fully consider whether the tremendous expense involved in each bill is necessary. Because we favor a two-ocean navy, we may not necessarily find justification for an army of 1,300,000 men or the conscription of men in time of peace.

For we face another kind of an emergency at home. We have steadily drifted toward centralized government. We have vastly extended the activities of the Federal Government. We have given it power to regulate everything and everybody. There is a bill pending in Congress to give the President power to take property of any kind; to fix all prices; to assign every man to a designated position. There is a bill pending providing for a capital levy, taking a large proportion of every man's property in exchange for 1 percent Government bonds. In short, proposals made by responsible men, if added together, would create exactly the kind of Government in this country which exists today in Germany. There are many who urge with the proponents of the Burke-Wadsworth bill that the emergency requires a complete recasting of American life, a dedication of our entire energies to defense alone, and a subordination of every principle on which the American Republic is based.

With that point of view I emphatically disagree. We are not at war. I am confident that we can maintain the kind of Army and Navy we now must maintain and still keep alive the individual liberty and the system of free enterprise which have glorified the United States. The total cost of the new Army and Navy should not exceed three and a half billion dollars a year. Surely we can pay this out of a national income in excess of $70,000,000,000. Surely the manpower required need not upset our constitutional liberties. A million men may have to be permanently employed in the Army and Navy and Marine Corps, and a million and a quarter more, perhaps, trained for the Reserve. We have 42,000,000 men between 18 and 65 and over 5,000,000 of them are out of work today and looking for jobs. We can do the job without regimentation.

It is said that in time of war we have not hesitated to establish a dictatorship. I am afraid we would do so again, whether it it necessary or not. But that is a very different thing from establishing a dictatorship in time of peace on the ground that an emergency exists. In wartime it is frankly done for war purposes, and when the war is over the people know it is time to reassume their powers. While the power is exercised, most of those exercising it are intensely inspired by patriotic motives, and politics is largely adjourned. But no one knows when a peace emergency is over. We have been enjoying a continuous emergency for the last 7 years. The present emergency may well last for 10 years without war reaching our shores. Arbitrary powers granted today may never be resumed.

It is just as dangerous to exaggerate the emergency as it is to underestimate the emergency. When an emergency exists it is all the more important that we retain our respect for the principles of constitutional American government, and that we go no further in modifying them than is absolutely essential.

It is not necessary, to save ourselves from Hitler, that we plunge the country into debts and deficits so great that we bankrupt the Nation and destroy the whole financial structure on which our happiness and security are founded. It is not necessary that we set aside the right of free debate, and a free press, and free speech. It is not necessary, to avoid regimentation by Hitler, that we forget all the Bill of Rights and the protection of minorities and authorize some Executive to conscript men and conscript property.

In working out an adequate defense, I am convinced it can be worked out under a democratic form of government if we try, if we pay some attention to that principle. I am convinced it can be worked out under an economic system in which initiative and free enterprise still provide the energy and force which have made this country the powerful Nation which we are, if we try.

I am convinced that it can be worked out, retaining the principles of individual liberty for which it was founded, if we try. I am convinced that to meet the threat of a totalitarian nation we need not make ourselves totalitarian. I shudder when I hear the words "total defense." I do not know what "total defense" means, unless it means the subjugation of every other principle of our life to the one subject—military defense. If the words mean anything, they mean that the energies of every individual shall be devoted to defense, and that we shall wipe out from our minds every other goal. That is not true today; I hope it may never be true. At a time like this it is peculiarly necessary that with every measure we take we see that the principles of American freedom are guarded well. Never has the American way of life been in such danger—danger as much from within as from without.

The issue presented by the Burke-Wadsworth bill, therefore, is whether the draft of men in time of peace is necessary. There is a good deal of misunderstanding about what the bill does provide. Many of the letters which I receive advocate the bill on the ground that it imposes universal compulsory military training on all the youth of the United States; that such training is good for American boys; that it teaches them discipline and hardens their character. I think we should understand clearly that this bill proposes no such system. It is not going to take the boys as they graduate from high school or college and give them a year's training. Most boys graduate from high school at 18, and only a small proportion go to college. This bill takes men between 21 and 31, and is intended to draft them into the Army for at least a year, and I think probably 2 years. There are approximately 11,300,000 men between the specified ages. A vast registration system will be set up employing perhaps 200,000 persons to be appointed by the President. About 65 percent will be placed in deferred classes, leaving about 4,000,000 men in the first nonexempt class. Apparently about 80 percent of the 11,300,000 are employed; about 2,000,000 unemployed; 300,000 are in college or professional schools. In other words, the great bulk of these men have finished their education and have started on their life work, from which they are now to be taken for at least a year.

We should certainly avoid any such dislocation of individual lives as is provided by this draft, if we possibly can. Senator SHEPPARD, of Texas, chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, justified the bill on the ground that it was a tragic necessity. In wartime it might be necessary, but I agree with him that it is tragic to permit the Government to take a man already well established in his life work, and compel him to give up that work and serve for a year or two in the Army in time of peace. This is certainly not liberty or freedom as America has understood it. The basis of our system has been the right of individuals to choose their own way of life; to find the niche they fit in; to rise to positions of interest and power, no matter how humble their beginnings may be. Probably no quality is so essential to success as steady, serious application to a job. Yet when a man has gotten well started, and perhaps has acquired the confidence of his employer, this law will compel him to be absent for a year, and undo all the progress he has made in his chosen occupation. It is all very well to say that he must be given back his job, but someone else will have had to fill the place he has made for himself. His set-back may affect unfavorably his whole future life.

It is said that a compulsory draft is a democratic system. I deny that it has anything to do with democracy. It is far more typical of totalitarian nations than of democratic nations. It is absolutely opposed to the principles of individual liberty, which have always been considered a part of American democracy. To choose 1 man in 10 by lot and require him to leave his home against his will is more like roulette than it is like democracy. Many people came to this country for the single purpose of avoiding the requirements of military service in Europe. This country has always been opposed to a large standing army, and it has been opposed to the use of the draft in time of peace. I shrink from the very setting up of thousands of draft boards, with clerks and employees and endless paper work and red tape; from the registration of 12,000,000 men and the prying into every feature of their lives, their physical condition, their religious convictions, their financial status, and even their hobbies.

The draft is said to be democratic because it hits the rich as well as the poor. Since the rich are about 2 percent of the total, it is still true that 98 percent of those drafted are going to be the boys without means. It doesn't make much difference to the poor boy whether the other 2 percent go or not. To be snatched out of his life work may be a tragedy for a poor boy, but the rich boy will have no trouble finding another job if he is any good at all. As a matter of fact under the volunteer system you would probably get a greater percentage of wealthy boys than under the draft. This is because the wealthier boys all go to college, and the percentage of enlistment from the colleges has always been higher. The need for the defense of this country against nations thousands of miles distant is brought home to those in the colleges more forcibly than it is to the boy who is employed locally, to whom international affairs are a long distance off. Under a volunteer system the poor boys who already had good jobs would not have to go.

It is said that under the draft the slacker will stay at home and leave the burden on the patriots. But in the first place, the number of real slackers is negligible in the whole picture, and under the bill any real slacker has an easy "out." All he has to do is marry a lady who has no other means of support. The number of marriages in recent weeks has increased by thousands.

The principle of a compulsory draft is basically wrong. If we must use compulsion to get an army, why not use compulsion to get men for other essential tasks? We must have men to manufacture munitions, implements of war, and war vessels. Why not draft labor for those occupations at wages lower than the standard? There are many other industries absolutely essential to defense, like the utilities, the railroads, the coal-mining industry. Why not draft men for those industries, also at $21 a month? If we draft soldiers, why not draft policemen and firemen for city and State service? The logical advocates of the draft admit this necessary conclusion. Senator PEPPER, of Florida, has said that he believes the President should have power to draft men for munitions plants. Mr. Walter Lippmann says that if the conscription bill is to serve its real purpose it must not be regarded as a mere device for putting 1 man out of 25 into uniform but must be regarded as a method of mobilizing the men of the country for the much larger and more complicated task of industrial preparedness. In short, the logic behind the bill requires a complete regimentation of most labor and the assignment of jobs to every man able to work. This is actually done today in the Communist and Fascist states, which we are now apparently seeking to emulate.

There has been, very properly, a great outcry against the action of the Senate in authorizing the Secretaries of War and Navy to seize any industrial plant needed for the manufacture of munitions. I voted against that amendment because I do not see the necessity for that any more than for the drafting of men and because it gives uncontrolled discretion to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy. But at least the owners of such plants are to be fully compensated for their property, while men who are drafted may be forced to give up jobs paying $50 a week to receive a soldier's pay, at most equivalent to $15 a week. Their time is conscripted without compensation.

The argument in favor of conscription proves too much. If the emergency is as great as alleged, then we should adopt a completely socialized state and place ourselves and our property at the disposal of the Government. That is fascism. It could only be justified if it were the only possible alternative to the subjugation of the United States by fascism from without.

Is it really necessary to take this long step toward a system in which the state is everything and the individual is nothing? What kind of an army do we want? The developments of the present war have shown that great numbers of men in the trenches are no longer the prime requisite for success. France had universal conscription, but it did them no good against a highly organized, modern, mechanized army. According to all the best military advice, what we need today is an army of experts. We have all kinds of estimates of the number needed in the United States, but the best opinion is that an expert army of not more than 750,000 men would serve every purpose of defense. In January the President only requested funds for an army of 227,000 men. Even on May 31, after the Germans had broken through in France and France was collapsing, the President was satisfied with an army of 280,000 men, and General Marshall himself testified on June 4 that an army of 400,000 would avoid the necessity of mobilizing the National Guard and give a reasonable liberty of action up to January. Now the "ante has been boosted" to 1,200,000 men. This bill has put the cart before the horse. It is trying to provide a method of raising men before anyone has decided how many men should be raised. Up to this time the Army has had no authority to recruit men in excess of 375,000 plus the National Guard of 225,000; has had no authority to invite boys into training camps for military training.

As far as the Regular Army is concerned, conscription is the poorest possible method of getting it. Men are chosen at random from all kinds of occupations, mostly unrelated to the Army. After 1 year they naturally return to the jobs which they were forced to give up. Someone else equally unwilling and equally inexperienced has to be given a year of partial training. There is only one way to get the kind of Army we need today—that is to make the Army an occupation sufficiently attractive so that men will go to it as a matter of choice. Why should we expect men to accept pay equivalent to approximately $15 a week? Privates in the Army get board, lodging, and clothes, equivalent perhaps $40 a month, plus $21 in cash, a total of $61 a month. They should certainly get the equivalent of $100 a month. The Army does not want a lot of men who leave at the end of 1 year or even of 3 years; they want men who are sufficiently satisfied to stay indefinitely.

It is said that the voluntary-enlistment plan has broken down. Of course that is utterly untrue. In spite of inadequate pay and in spite of 3-year enlistments, from which a man cannot escape if a better job is offered, it has accomplished everything which has been asked of it. Men are enlisting today at a rapid rate—40,000 enlisted in the month of August. Yet there has been no really serious effort to enlist men, and no call by the President for volunteers. In fact, he has publicly discouraged college boys from enlisting.

Men are looking for jobs with reasonable pay. In New York City this year it was necessary to fill a position as sanitation man at a salary of $1,800 a year, which, considering the cost of living in New York City, is not very much more than Army pay plus support. There were 84,000 applications from New York City alone.

Of course the men who enlist in the Army, like the men who get jobs in any industry, are those who at the time are out of work. There are more than 5,000,000 men out of work today, looking for jobs. There are over 1,700,000 on W. P. A., and over 200,000 in the C. C. C. camps. The Government is paying these men in a way which makes W. P. A. and C. C. C. more attractive than the Army. We have not the right to require these men, as a condition of Government aid, to accept employment in the Army; but surely, if we make the Army only reasonably attractive, many of them will prefer the Army to W. P. A. or C. C. C

How utterly ridiculous it is to make 700,000 men give up good jobs at a time of life when they are first making real progress, while many millions of men out of work, and 1,200,000 boys coming of age every year, are looking for jobs. The idea that the Army is the most unpleasant occupation in the world, into which men must be forced against their will, is archaic and fallacious. In time of war Army service is dangerous, but if we prepare adequately, we should not be at war, and the Army for the most part is a peacetime, highly specialized occupation with only a chance of danger. Experience shows that men do not avoid an occupation because there is a chance of danger. There are dangerous civilian occupations—work with high-tension wires, work in tunnel construction, work in coal mines; and there is never any difficulty in finding men interested in those occupations.

The Air Corps is the most dangerous part of the Army, but more men want to enlist than can be accepted. The Army has many advantages, a clean and regular life without great responsibility, an attraction in the very discipline and order which appeals to some men and offends others very greatly. The Navy always has a waiting list because they pay their men more adequately to try to make their service attractive. The Army should be just as attractive today. We already have 650,000 men available under existing law. We will have no difficulty in getting 750,000 or 950,000 or 1,200,000 under the volunteer system, if the Army is made as attractive to the average man as many other jobs furnished by industry.

As for the Reserve, we have never tried getting men for military training camps. No such camps are in existence except for Reserve officers. Of the 1,200,000 boys who graduate from high school or college every year, a large proportion could be persuaded to take a year in the military training camps at the Government's expense before starting on their life work. Within a very few years we would build up all the Reserve we could possibly need. An attempt to raise whatever Army is necessary by a volunteer appeal will unquestionably meet with success if that attempt has the wholehearted cooperation of the administration and of the Army; that it will furnish 400,000 men if that many are needed, before the complicated draft is working.

There are some who have felt that the emergency is so immediate that only the draft will meet it. Obviously that is not today the official view. The President has just transferred 50 destroyers to England in exchange for bases which will not be ready for a year. If Hitler were about to overwhelm England and attack the United States, the President obviously could not weaken our Navy by depriving it of 50 destroyers now in active service. The alleged need immediately for a huge Army is based on the theory that our Navy is inadequate. The President has just determined that the Navy is completely adequate and can even afford to surrender 50 of its fighting craft. What has happened to the emergency supposed to justify this drafting of men, so complete a departure from American tradition and so long a step toward dictatorship? No; we obviously have a reasonable time before Mr. Hitler can possibly organize an attack on the United States. It is no easy task to transport an army across 3,000 miles of water while our Navy is in existence. We have time to do our job in the right way. We have time to get the kind of voluntary expert mechanized Army that we really need. We have time to do the job without upsetting and perhaps wrecking hundreds of thousands of lives. We can do it without excitement and hysteria, without breaking down the fundamental principles of the American Republic. We can do it without overestimating the emergency, and sinking all the principles we love in the slough of total defense.

Free men, free enterprise, free speech are the cornerstones of the American Republic. If the Burke-Wadsworth bill should become law, we will have to accept that limitation of freedom. But we should be all the more vigilant to oppose the further limitations on freedom which are bound to follow. For the more we yield to the demand for arbitrary power, the more power will be demanded, until individual freedom will be as nonexistent in America as it is in Germany today. In fact we may even be turning over these destroyers to Germany to be used against us, for the British may have to surrender their fleet, according to the William Allen White Committee. Of course, in case of British defeat any pledge of the present British Government would be worthless, for the Government would not be there. Obviously the President must consider our fleet more than adequate for defense.

Address of President Woodrow Wilson at St. Louis, Mo.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALFRED L. BULWINKLE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 6, 1940

SPEECH DELIVERED SEPTEMBER 5, 1919

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, 21 years ago yesterday President Wilson made a memorable address in St. Louis. I wish that every person would read this great speech.

The speech follows:

Mr. Johnson, Your Honor Mr. Mayor, ladies and gentlemen, it is with great pleasure that I find myself in St. Louis again, because I have always found it possible in St. Louis to discuss serious questions in a way that gets mind in contact with mind, instead of that other less desirable thing, passion in contact with passion. I am glad to hear the mayor say, and I believe that it is true, that politics is adjourned. Party politics has no place, my fellow citizens, in the subject we are now obliged to discuss and to decide. Politics in the wider sense has a great deal to do with it. The politics of the world, the policy of mankind, the concert of the methods by which the world is to be bettered, that concert of will and of action which will make every nation a nobler instrument of Divine Providence—that is world politics.

I have sometimes heard gentlemen discussing the questions that are now before us with a distinction drawn between nationalism and internationalism in these matters. It is very difficult for me to follow their distinction. The greatest nationalist is the man who wants his nation to be the greatest nation, and the greatest nation is the nation which penetrates to the heart of its duty and mission among the nations of the world. With every flash of insight into the great politics of mankind, the nation that has that vision is elevated to a place of influence and power which it cannot get by arms, which it cannot get by commercial rivalry, which it can get by no other way than by that spiritual leadership which comes from a profound understanding of the problems of humanity. It is in the light of ideas of this sort that I conceive it a privilege to discuss the matters that I have come away from Washington to discuss.

I have come away from Washington to discuss them because apparently it is difficult to discuss them in Washington. The whole subject is surrounded with a mist which it is difficult to penetrate. I brought home with me from the other side of the water a great document, a great human document, but after you hear it talked about in Washington for a while you think that it has just about three or four clauses in it. You fancy that it has a certain article X in it, that it has something about Shantung in it, that it has something about the Monroe Doctrine in it, that it has something about quitting, withdrawing from the League, showing that you do not want to play the game. I do not hear about anything else in it. Why, my fellow citizens, these are mere details and incidents of a great human enterprise, and I have sought the privilege of telling you what I conceive that human enterprise to be.

The war that has just been finished was no accident. Any man who had followed the politics of the world up to that critical break must have known that that was the logical outcome of the processes that had preceded it, must have known that the nations of the world were preparing for that very thing and were expecting it. One of the most interesting things that I realized after I got to the other side of the water was that the mental attitude of the French people with regard to the settlement of this war was largely determined by the fact that for nearly 50 years they had expected it, that for nearly 50 years they had dreaded, by the exercise of German force, the very thing that has happened and their constant theme was, "We must devise means by which this intolerable fear will be lifted from our hearts. We cannot, we will not, live another 50 years under the cloud of that terror." The terror had been there all the time and the war was its flame and consummation.

It had been expected, because the politics of Europe were based upon a definite conception. That conception was that the strong had all the rights and that all that the weak could enjoy was what the strong permitted them to enjoy; that no nation had any right that could not be asserted by the exercise of force, and that the real politics of Europe consisted in determining how many of the weak elements in the European combination of families and of nations should be under the influence and control of one set of nations and how many of those elements should be under the influence and control of another set of nations.

One of the centers of all the bad business was in that town of Constantinople. I do not suppose that intrigue was ever anywhere else reduced to such a consummate art or practiced with such ardor and subtlety as in Constantinople. That was because Constantinople was the key to the weak part of Europe. That was where the pawns were, not the kings and the queens and the castles and the bishops and the rest of the chess game of politics, but the little pawns. They made the openings for the heavier pieces. Their maneuvers determined the arrangement of the board, and those who controlled the pawns controlled the outcome of the whole effort to checkmate and to match and to capture and to take advantage. The shrewdest politicians in the diplomatic service of the several nations were put at Constantinople to run the game, which consisted in maneuvering the weak for the advantage of the strong, and every international conference that preceded the conference at Paris, which is still in process, was intended to complete and consummate the arrangements for that game. For the first time in the history of mankind, the recent conference at Paris was convened to destroy that system and substitute another.

I take it, my fellow citizens, that when you look at that volume, for it is a thick volume, that contains the treaty of peace with Germany, in the light of what I have been saying to you, you will read it with greater interest than you have hitherto attached to it. It is the chart and constitution of a new system for the world, and that new system is based upon an absolute reversal of the principles of the old system. The central object of that treaty is to establish the independence and protect the integrity of the weak peoples of the world. I hear some gentlemen, who are themselves incapable of altruistic purposes, say, "Ah, but that is altruistic. It is not our business to take care of the weak nations of the world." No, but it is our business to prevent war, and if we do not take care of the weak nations of the world there will be war. These gentlemen assume the role of being very practical men, and they say, "We do not want to get into war to protect every little nation in the world." Very well, then. Let them show me how they will keep out of war by not protecting them, and let them show me how they will prove that, having gone into an enterprise, they are not absolute, contemptible quitters if they do not see the game through. They joined with the rest of us in the profession of fine purpose when we went into the war, and what was the fine purpose that they professed? It was not merely to defeat Germany. It is not a handsome enterprise for any great nation to go into a war merely to reduce another nation to obedience. They went in, and they professed to go in, to see to it that nobody after Germany's defeat should repeat the experiment which Germany had tried. And how do they propose to do that? To leave the material that Germany was going to make her dominating empire out of helpless and at her mercy.

What was the old formula of pan-Germanism? From Bremen to Bagdad, wasn't it? Well, look at the map. What lies between Bremen and Bagdad? After you get past the German territory, there is Poland. There is Bohemia, which we have made into Czechoslovakia. There is Hungary, which is divided from Austria, and does not share Austria's strength. There is Rumania. There is Yugoslavia. There is broken Turkey; and then Persia and Bagdad. The route is open. The route is wide open, and we have undertaken to say, "This route is closed." If you do not close it you have no choice but some day or other to enter into exactly the same sort of war that we have just gone through. Those gentlemen are dreaming. They are living in a past age which is gone and all but forgotten when they say that we can mind our own business.

What is our own business? Is there any merchant present here or any manufacturer or any banker who can say that our interests are separate from the interests of the rest of the world—commercially, industrially, financially? There is not a man in any one of these professions who does not admit that our industrial fortunes are tied up with the industrial fortunes of the rest of the world. He knows that, and when he draws a picture to himself, if he is frank, of what some gentlemen propose, this is what he sees: America minding her own business and having no other—despised, suspected, distrusted, and on the other side of the water the treaty and its operation—interrupted? Not at all. We are a great nation, my fellow citizens, but the treaty is going to be applied just the same whether we take part in it or not, and part of its application, at the center of its application, stands that great problem of the rehabilitation of Germany industrially. I say the problem of her rehabilitation because unless she is rehabilitated she cannot pay the reparation. The reparation commission created by the treaty is created for the purpose of seeing that Germany pays the reparation, and it was admitted in all our conferences that in order to do that steps must be taken to enable Germany to pay the reparation, which means her industrial and commercial rehabilitation. Not only that, but some of you gentlemen know we used to have a trade with Germany. All of that trade is going to be in the hands and under the control of the reparation commission. I humbly asked leave to appoint a member to look after our interests, and I was rebuked for it. I am looking after the industrial interest of the United States. I would like to see the other men who are. They are forgetting the industrial interests of the United States, and they are doing things that will cut us off, and our trade off, from the normal channels, because the reparation commission can determine where Germany buys, what Germany buys, how much Germany buys; the reparation commission can determine in what instruments of credit she temporarily expresses her debt. It can determine how those instruments of credit shall be used for the basis of the credit which must underlie international exchanges. It is going to stand at the center of the financial operations of the world. Now, is it minding our business to keep out of that? On the contrary, it is handing our business over to people who are not particularly interested in seeing that it prospers. These are facts which I can appropriately address to a chamber of commerce because they are facts which nobody can controvert and which yet seem often to be forgotten. The broad aspects of this subject are seldom brought to your attention. It is the little picayune details here and there.

That brings me, my fellow citizens, to the guaranty of this whole thing. We said that we were going to fight this war for the purpose of seeing to it that the mothers and sisters and fathers of this land, and the sweethearts and wives, did not have to send their lads over on the other side of the sea to fight any more, and so we took part in an arrangement by which justice was to be secured throughout the world. The rest of the world, partly at our suggestion, said "Yes" and said it gladly; said "Yes, we will go into the partnership to see that justice is maintained," and then I came home and heard some gentlemen say, "But will we?" Are we interested in justice? The treaty of peace, as I have just said to you, is based upon the protection of the weak against the strong, and there is only one force that can protect the weak against the strong, and that is the universal concert of the strength of mankind. That is the League of Nations.

But I beg that you will not conceive of the League of Nations as a combination of the world for war, for that is exactly what it is not. It is a combination of the world for arbitration and discussion. I was taking the pains the other day to make a sort of table of contents of the covenant of the League of Nations, and I found that two-thirds of its provisions were devoted to setting up a system of arbitration and discussion in the world. Why, these are the facts, my fellow citizens: the members of the league agree that no one of them will ever go to war about anything without first doing one or another of two things—without either submitting the question to arbitration, in which case they agree to abide by the decision of the arbitrators absolutely, or submitting it to discussion by the council of the League of Nations, in which case they agree that, no matter what the opinion expressed by the council may be, they will allow 6 months for the discussion, and whether they are satisfied with the conclusion or not, will not go to war in less than 3 months after the rendering of the opinion. I think we can take it for granted that the preliminaries would take 2 or 3 months, in which case you have a whole year of discussion even when you do not get arbitration; and I want to call you to witness that in almost every international controversy which has been submitted to thorough canvass by the opinion of the world it has become impossible for the result to be war. War is a process of heat. Exposure is a process of cooling, and what is proposed in this is that every hot thing shall be spread out in the cooling air of the opinion of the world and after it is thoroughly cooled off, then let the nations concerned determine whether they are going to fight about it or not.

And notice the sanction. Any member of the League which breaks these promises with regard to arbitration or discussion is to be deemed thereby to have committed an act of war against the other members of the League; not merely to have done an immoral thing, but by refusing to obey those processes to have committed an act of war and put itself out of court. You know what then happens. You say, "Yes; we form an army and go and fight them." Not at all. We shut their doors and lock them in. We boycott them. Just as soon as that is done they cannot ship cargoes out or receive them shipped in. They cannot send a telegraphic message. They cannot send or receive a letter. Nobody can leave their territory and nobody can enter their territory. They are absolutely boycotted by the rest of mankind. I do not think that after that remedy it will be necessary to do any fighting at all. What brought Germany to her knees was, not only the splendid fighting of the incomparable men who met her armies, but that her doors were locked and she could not get supplies from any part of the world. There were a few doors open, doors to some Swedish ore, for example, that she needed for making munitions, and that kept her going for a time; but the Swedish door would be shut this time. There would not be any door open, and that brings a nation to its senses just as suffocation removes from the individual all inclination to fight.

That is the League of Nations, an agreement to arbitrate or discuss, and an agreement that if you do not arbitrate or discuss, you shall be absolutely boycotted and starved out. There is hardly a European nation, my fellow citizens, that is of a fighting inclination, which has enough food to eat without importing food, and it will be a very persuasive argument that it has nothing to eat, because you cannot fight on an empty stomach any more than you can worship God on an empty stomach.

When we add to that some other very interesting particulars I think the League of Nations becomes a very interesting thing, indeed. You have heard of article X, and I am going to speak about that in a minute, but read article XI, because, really, there are other articles in the Covenant. Article XI says—I am not quoting its language, but its substance—that anything that is likely to affect the peace of the world or the good understanding upon which the peace of the world depends shall be everybody's business; that any nation, the littlest nation at the table, can stand up and challenge the right of the strongest nation there to keep on in a course of action or policy which is likely to disturb the peace of the world, and that it shall be its friendly right to do so. These are the words. It cannot be regarded as a hostile or unfriendly act. It is its friendly right to do that, and if you will not give the secret away, I wrote those words myself. I wanted it to be our friendly right and everybody's friendly right to discuss everything that was likely to affect the peace of the world, because that is everybody's business. It is everybody's business to see that nothing happens that does disturb the peace of the world.

And there is added to this particular this very interesting thing: There can hereafter be no secret treaties. There were nations represented around that board—I mean the board at which the commission on the League of Nations sat, where 14 nations were represented—there were nations represented around that board who had entered into many a secret treaty and understanding, and they made not the least objection to promising that hereafter no secret treaty should have any validity whatever. The provision of the Covenant is that every treaty or international understanding shall be "registered," I believe the word is, with the general secretary of the League, that the general secretary shall publish it in full just as soon as it is possible for him to publish it, and that no treaty shall be valid which is not thus registered. It is like our arrangements with regard to mortgages on real estate, that until they are registered nobody else need pay any attention to them. So with the treaties. Until they are registered in this office of the League nobody, not even the parties themselves, can insist upon their execution. You have cleared the deck thereby of the most dangerous thing and the most embarrassing thing that has hitherto existed in international politics.

It is very embarrassing, my fellow citizens, when you thought you were approaching an ideal solution of a particular question, to find that some of your colleagues had given the whole thing away. And that leads me to speak just in passing of what has given a great many people natural distress. I mean the Shantung settlement, the settlement with regard to a portion of the Province of Shantung in China. Great Britain and, subsequently, France, as everybody now knows, in order to make it more certain that Japan would come into the war and so assist to clear the Pacific of the German fleets, had promised that any rights that Germany had in China should, in the case of the victory of the Allies, pass to Japan. There was no qualification in the promise. She was to get exactly what Germany had, and so the only thing that was possible was to induce Japan to promise—and I want to say in fairness, for it would not be fair if I did not say it, that Japan did very handsomely make the promise which was requested of her—that she would retain in Shantung none of the sovereign rights which Germany had enjoyed there, but would return the sovereignty without qualification to China and retain in Shantung Province only what other nationalities had already had elsewhere, economic rights with regard to the development and administration of the railway and of certain mines which had become attached to the railway. That is her promise, and personally I have not the slightest doubt that she will fulfill that promise. She cannot fulfill it right now because the thing does not go into operation until 3 months after the treaty is ratified, so that we must not be too impatient about it. But she will fulfill that promise.

Suppose that we said that we would not assent. England and France must assent, and if we are going to get Shantung Province back for China and these gentlemen do not want to engage in foreign wars, how are they going to get it back? Their idea of not getting into trouble seems to be to stand for the largest possible number of unworkable propositions. It is all very well to talk about standing by China, but how are you standing by China when you withdraw from the only arrangement by which China can be assisted? If you are China's friend, then do not go into the council where you can act as China's friend. If you are China's friend then put her in a position where even the concessions which have been made need not be carried out. If you are China's friend, scuttle and run. That is not the kind of American I am.

Now, just a word about article X. Permit me, if you will, to recur to what I said at the opening of these somewhat disjointed remarks. I said that the treaty was intended to destroy one system and substitute another. That other system was based upon the principle that no strong power need respect the territorial integrity or the political independence of any weak power. I need not confine the phraseology to that. It was based upon the principle that no power is obliged to respect the territorial integrity or the political independence of any other power if it has the force necessary to disregard it. So that article X cuts at the very heart, and is the only instrument that will cut to the very heart, of the old system. Remember that if this covenant is adopted by the number of nations which it probably will be adopted by, it means that every nation except Germany and Turkey, because we have already said we would let Austria come in (Germany has to undergo a certain period of probation to see whether she has really experienced a change of heart and effected a genuine change of constitutional provision)—it means that all the nations of the world, except one strong and one negligible one, agree that they will respect and preserve against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of the other nations of the world. You would think from some of the discussions that the emphasis is on the word "preserve."

We are partners with the rest of the world in respecting the territorial integrity and political independence of others. They are all under solemn bonds themselves to respect and to preserve these things, and if they do not preserve them, if they do not respect them, or preserve them, what happens? The Council of the League then advises the several members of the League what it is necessary to do. I can testify from having sat at the board where the instrument was drawn that advice means advice. I suppose it did before I returned home, but I found some gentlemen doubted it. Advice means advice, and the advice cannot be given without the concurrent vote of the representative of the United States. Ah, but somebody says, "Suppose we are a party to the quarrel." I cannot suppose that, because I know that the United States is not going to disregard the territorial integrity or the political independence of any other nation, but for the sake of the argument suppose that we are a party. Very well then, the scrap is ours anyway. For what these gentlemen are afraid of is that we are going to get into trouble. If we are a party, we are in trouble already, and if we are not a party, we can control the advice of the Council by our vote. To my mind, that is a little like an open and shut game. I am not afraid of advice which we give ourselves; and yet that is the whole of the bugaboo which these gentlemen have been parading before you.

The solemn thing about article X is the first sentence, not the second sentence. The first sentence says that we will respect and preserve against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of other nations; and let me stop a moment on the words "external aggression." Why were they put in? Because every man who sat at that board held that the right of revolution was sacred and must not be interfered with. Any kind of a row can happen inside and it is nobody's right to interfere. The only thing that there is any right to object to or interfere with is external aggression, by some outside power undertaking to take a piece of territory or to interfere with the internal political arrangements of the country which is suffering from the aggression; because territorial integrity does not mean that you cannot invade another country, it means that you cannot invade it and stay there. I have not impaired the territorial integrity of your back yard if I walk into it, but I very much impair it if I insist upon staying there and will not get out, and the impairment of integrity contemplated in this article is the kind of impairment as the seizure of territory, as an attempt at annexation, as an attempt at continuing domination either of the territory itself or of the methods of government inside that territory.

When you read article X, therefore, you will see that it is nothing but the inevitable logical center of the whole system of the Covenant of the League of Nations, and I stand for it absolutely. If it should ever in any important respect be impaired, I would feel like asking the Secretary of War to get the boys who went across the water to fight together on some field where I could go and see them, and I would stand up before them and say, "Boys, I told you before you went across the sea that this was a war against wars, and I did my best to fulfill the promise, but I am obliged to come to you in mortification and shame and say I have not been able to fulfill the promise. You are betrayed. You fought for something that you did not get." And the glory of the armies and the navies of the United States is gone like a dream in the night, and there ensues upon it, in the suitable darkness of the night, the nightmare of dread which lay upon the nations before this war came; and there will come sometime, in the vengeful providence of God, another struggle in which, not a few hundred thousand fine men from America will have to die, but as many millions as are necessary to accomplish the final freedom of the peoples of the world.

Columbus University Junior College, Washington, D. C.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH E. CASEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

Friday, September 6, 1940

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure to pay public tribute to the Columbus University Junior College, Washington, D. C., on its recent accreditation by the District of Columbia Board of Education. The Columbus University Junior College, only 2 years old, was the first junior college in the District of Columbia to be accredited by the local board of education which acted under powers granted by Congress several month ago.

Under terms of this power the Board of Education approval carries the same force and effect as accreditation of junior colleges by the State boards of education in the various States. It is therefore a singular honor that has been bestowed on the local institution.

The rapid growth of the Columbus University Junior College and its early recognition by an accrediting agency was not an accident. It was the result of a 10-year dream of John R. Fitzpatrick, dean of Columbus University Law School and provost of the university. His tireless efforts and incessant labors in behalf of the university have brought it to the forefront in the field of adult education, or education for hundreds and hundreds of young men and women who otherwise would be denied the right to attend academic institutions of higher learning. Courses in Columbus University, including the departments of law, accounting, and junior college, are conducted at evening sessions, thus affording opportunities for education to men and women employed during the day.

Under the aegis of Dean Fitzpatrick, the law school today ranks third in the country in the point of enrollment, being topped only by Harvard Law School and St. John's College in Brooklyn, according to official statistics compiled by a recent law journal.

Having erected the law-school structure to its present eminent position, Dean Fitzpatrick turned his attention to the establishment of a junior college, one which meets the ever-growing demands of a local community to which thousands of men and women poured in during the last 8 years. Hundreds of these newcomers desired higher education at evening sessions since most of them were employed in the daytime. It was this opportunity for further public service in the District of Columbia that prompted Dean Fitzpatrick to direct his energies toward the establishment of the junior college.

It was no easy task that Dean Fitzpatrick set before himself. There was the question of funds, of selecting an adequate staff of competent professors and scores of other details concomitant with the achievement of such an ambitious program. But success, while moderate, has finally been achieved as is evidenced by the recognition of the Board of Education. Dean Fitzpatrick himelf knows only too well that there still lies much work ahead and I am sure the Board of Education approval will give added incentive to his zealous labors.

The Columbus University Junior College, while rounding out only its second year, already is equipped as well as any junior college of its size and age in the country. I am glad to see the junior college branching off into the fields of secretarial sciences which will equip the student for the struggle of life immediately upon graduation. These courses, in addition to the regular so-called cultural courses, supply a fitting background for the student desirous of later entering an accredited law school or of further higher education.

I am sure my colleagues join with me in wishing the Columbus University Junior College the great future of public service it is so well equipped to contribute to the school-going public of Washington. I am sure, too, they join with me in congratulating Dean Fitzpatrick on his splendid accomplishment and in wishing him the health and the strength to attain the goal he has set before himself.

American, Not European, Teachers for American Youth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILL M. WHITTINGTON

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 6, 1940

TIMELY AND CONSTRUCTIVE ARTICLE BY MRS. FLORENCE S. OGDEN, WRITER AND COLUMNIST, OF ROSEDALE, MISS., IN OPPOSITION TO EUROPEAN SCHOLARS AND PROFESSORS TEACHING IN AMERICAN SCHOOLS, COLLEGES, AND UNIVERSITIES

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, my gifted friend and patriotic constituent, Mrs. Florence S. Ogden, of Rosedale, Miss., edits a column in the Sunday Delta-Democrat Times, of Greenville, Miss., one of the best edited and most progressive daily newspapers in Mississippi, entitled "Dis an' Dat." The contributions of Mrs. Ogden are often unique and quite original, and are always entertaining and instructive. This accomplished daughter of Mississippi is fast making a name for herself among the leading writers of the South.

Many new and complex issues and problems during the existing second European war are confronting the American people. These problems often bring dangers. They will be followed by other issues after the war. One of the present dangers arises from the teachings of European and refugee scholars and professors in American institutions. I am not an alarmist, but this danger was recently brought forcibly to my attention by the account of a dinner in the home of an acquaintance of mine. One of the guests was a German scholar, now teaching in one of the leading universities of the United States. This professor had been highly commended to the hostess by a friend of hers who had met him in Germany. The German scholar monopolized the conversation of the dinner, very much to the chagrin of the hostess, by brazenly proclaiming and advocating nazi-ism, criticizing Americanism, and praising Hitler and Hitlerism. I was astounded that an American university would not only tolerate but invite professors who advocated such un-American and subversive doctrines. It is time for America and Americans to be on guard.

In the Delta Democrat-Times of Sunday, September 1, 1940, Mrs. Ogden contributed a most helpful and thought-provoking article in opposition to European scholars and European professors in American schools and universities. Under leave to revise and extend my remarks I include this article, to wit:

DIS AN' DAT

(By Florence S. Ogden)

I am worried about my country—about America. Not by the fear of Hitler; not by the cry of battle; not by the drone of airplanes, nor the crash of bombs, but by the philosophies of other lands, other peoples, being brought to our colleges.

For what profit it us if we gain every victory, win every battle, and lose our own country?

Why drill our youth for combat, see them die in the battle line, and then give our country away—make a Europe out of America?

For that is what we will do if we bring the philosophers and scholars of Europe here to teach the youth of America. Misguided American college presidents and educators are opening the doors of our colleges to the refugee scholars of Europe, offering them our most precious gift, the charge of molding the minds of American youth.

According to Time, 200 are already here. There are 3,800 on the waiting list. College officials are being urged to create special professorships for them. Says Time, "Not since the fall of Constantinople in 1453 drove eastern scholars into western Europe has there been such a wholesale migration of culture." Says Dr. Alvin Johnson, of the emergency committee in aid of displaced foreign scholars, "for the next generation the natural home of scholarship and science must be America."

But with Dr. Johnson, I, a plain country woman, beg to disagree.

According to Time, among those who have sought or are seeking United States citizenship are ex-German Albert Einstein and Thomas Mann. At Harvard are ex-Chancellor Heinrich Bruning; famed architects Walter Grapius and Marcel Breuer; eminent classical scholar Werner Jaeger. The University of Chicago has Nobel-prize winner James Franck; Eduard Benes; Italy's famed physicist Bruno Rossi, and novelist Guiseppe Borgese; art teacher Ulrich A. Mideldorf. Score, five for Chicago. At California Tech, German-born Dr. Spiro Kyropoulos. At University of California, Los Angeles, famed composer Arnold Schonberg. At Columbia, renowned Viennese neurologist Otto Marbur. And on and on, ad infinitum.

The teachers in our schools and colleges hold in their hands the future of America. They mold the thought of the youth who will in their time become our leaders. Shall it be American or European?

Now is the time to decide. Not next year, next month, next week. Not tomorrow, but today.

No matter what a teacher teaches his students, be it architecture, science, art, music, or civics, if he be a good teacher he leaves with them his philosophy of life. That is a known truth.

European philosophy of government has nothing to offer us. It has been a failure, as witness the Europe of today. Though they have boasted the broadest culture, the deepest scholars, their world, their very civilization, lies in chaos.

If the 3,800 scholars waiting to come to America are worth their salt, they will stay in their own country and try to rebuild it. They will be needed there. If the best brains of the South had fled the country after the Civil War it would have taken a longer, harder travel to have restored her to her own sunny self.

We do not need Europe's scholars here. We produced an Edison without them, a Robert E. Lee, an Abraham Lincoln. We have many more in the making if we do not allow them to be marred by alien thinking. We already have here in America a large European-born citizenship. But we still have our American philosophy of life. Are we to chuck this, too?

To those of us "horse and buggy" people, old fashioned enough to cling to the precepts of our fathers and to the old America in which we grew up, American America belongs to the American people. We believe in the ideals and traditions bequeathed to us by the men and women who marched ahead of us, carving from the wilderness a peaceful, happy home—a great country.

You know and I know that 10 years ago, 5 years ago, 2 years ago, it was not popular to be proud of your American descent. It was the smart thing to scoff at patriotism, if American. But it was all right for the German-born American to prate about "the fatherland"; for the Italian-born American to sentimentalize over "the mother country"; for the Chinese-born American to hoard his dollars and send them back to China; for the Polish-born American to continue to speak his native tongue, to print his newspapers in his native language; for the Russian-born American to crusade for his isms.

Yet the American-born American did not dare lift his voice to proclaim a pride in the race of men who gave him birth, endured hardships, and made sacrifices to create a magnificent Nation. Those who did so dare had hurled at them such epithets as "ancestor worshipers," "snob," and so forth. Yet it was these early American men and women who gave us our way of life—the American way, if you please.

It was not given to use by the pedagogs of Europe. It was not given to us by the millions who have come battering at our shores since 1890. No; it is the other way around. To them we have given freedom, home, peace, opportunity.

In return they have contributed their share of art, music, science, literature, labor. But to our philosophy of life, our freedom of government, they have contributed not one iota. It was here before they came: our heritage, born of an English-speaking people, nurtured and developed by those home-loving, liberty-seeking men and women, the early Americans.

If we are to keep our country to ourselves, for our children and our children's children, we must guard our principles of government with a jealous eye. We must hold high the ideals upon which this democracy was founded. We must revere its traditions, review its history, uphold its religion, and remember that it was not founded upon European philosophy, but upon a philosophy conceived by Americans, born of a spirit of freedom and a hope of happiness.

No Nietzsche, no Marx, no Francois Villon, no Anatole France, no Zola, no Tolstoy, no Lenin, no Trotzky, no Hitler laid out the principles of American democracy.

It was made by men who rode horses, fought Indians, hewed forests, tilled land, and marched to battle that America might be free. It was founded by red-blooded men of action, not by scholars, shrouded in caps and gowns; not by theoretical geniuses; not by scientists lost in thought and in the search of new truths; not by poets who would steal from the rich and give to the poor; not by writers who ended their lives in the madhouse.

No, America was founded by men who dared to give their lives that liberty and justice might not perish from the earth.

Such a country does not need the European philosophers, the refugee scholars of a war-torn continent to teach the youth of the land.

We have thousands, millions, of European-born citizens, European-born youths. What we need in our schools and our colleges are American-born teachers, Americans who love our country, understand our background, revere our history, respect our ideals and philosophies. Yes, more than ever we need good old red-blooded American teachers for the youth of our land. European democracy is not American democracy and never will be.

We have a trust, a great responsibility. It is to teach the millions of youths coming to this land, and our own youth who seem to be forgetting, American precepts. We cannot do it through colleges manned by European scholars and philosophers, no matter how brilliant.

I would rather leave as a heritage to my children the free, happy American way of life than all of the art of Italy, all of the music of Germany, all of the culture of France, all of the architecture of Greece, all of the isms of Russia, Poland, and Czechoslovakia rolled into one.

The Parting of the Ways

OF

HON. EVERETT M. DIRKSEN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 6, 1940

ADDRESS OF HON. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by the gentleman from Massachusetts, Hon. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, Jr., delivered at a Republican mass meeting on the evening of August 24, 1940, at Peoria, Ill.:

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, it is a pleasure to be here tonight to speak to you on a question which I believe presents the gravest problem ever faced by this Nation since its beginning except, perhaps, during the Civil War.

America is at the parting of the ways.

Two roads lie before us.

There is the right road. It is the way to responsible liberalism. There is the wrong road. It is the way of irresponsible radicalism.

The right road is a continuation of our historic Government by laws. The left road leads to a government by men.

The Nation next November will make its choice. It will go forward with "Right Way" Willkie, or it will go astray with "Wrong Way" Roosevelt. After 8 years of the kind of administration Mr. Roosevelt has given us, I think there is no doubt in your mind—and I am sure there is none in mine—as to which choice America will make at the ballot boxes next November.

Our American system of government has for 150 years been the marvel of mankind. The American way has brought to our people, as a whole, the broadest spiritual and cultural values; the highest living levels; the richest material resources; the finest churches, and schools, and railroads, and highways; the most automobiles, and the greatest scientific achievements ever attained by any people. To keep on in that American way of government, we must, next November, part company with Mr. Roosevelt and the New Deal.

If we are going to return to thrift and frugality in government; if we are to reawaken the pioneer spirit which originally created this Nation out of the primeval forests and the unwatered plains; if we are to renew the faith of our forefathers who, with ax, squirrel rifle, and their self-reliance, made homes and a living for themselves and their loved ones, then we are, next November, going to part company with the wasters and the spenders and the bureaucrats, and the defeatists of the New Deal.

If we are to return to integrity in government, to that kind of government which the people support, instead of a government which pretends to support the people, then we are going to part company next November with Mr. Roosevelt and his motley crew of anonymous advisers and experimenters.

If we are going to build an adequate national defense without being made bankrupt, without being rendered so weak and impotent financially we will not be able to use the defense after it is created, then we are going to part company with Mr. Roosevelt and his New Deal alarmists next November.

If we are ever to repeal the oppressive taxes which have proved so harassing and dangerous to private initiative, if we are to relieve the American people, especially the poor people, of the crushing burden of hidden taxes concealed in the prices of all necessities and luxuries they buy—then we are going to part company with the New Deal tax wasters next November.

If we are ever to repeal the dangerous and deadening discretionary powers the President now holds over the Nation's monetary system, over agriculture, and over business, we must part company with the New Deal next November.

If we are ever to amend the National Labor Relations Act to clarify the mutual obligations of workers and employers, and the duties of both toward the public, in order to end irresponsible and paralyzing discord, then we must part company with the New Deal next November.

If we are going to define the area of governmental competition with private enterprise, and clarify Federal rules and regulations so industry and business may know what to expect, and may be able to create jobs with some certainty as to the future, then we must part company with the New Deal next November.

If we are to be able to reject all experimental legislation which is not clearly helpful in promoting national defense and recovery, or which would subject agriculture, labor, or industry to compulsory decrees of a Federal bureaucracy, then we are going to part company with the New Deal and with Mr. Roosevelt next November.

If the American people want to restore sanity, morality, economy, efficiency, and high integrity in Government, then they will with Willkie, but they won't with Roosevelt.

If America should by some incredible chance, decide to turn down the other fork of the road, we would then part company with our historic and traditional government of laws, and turn to a government of men. We would continue with Mr. Roosevelt and his New Dealers.

We can expect to see the national debt continue to rise from $45,000,000,000 to sixty-five or seventy-five billion dollars, if we take the left-hand fork of the road next November with Mr. Roosevelt and his jolly spenders.

We may expect more regimentation, a continuation of an economy of scarcity, recurring deficits, mounting taxes, broken promises, contradictions of policy, and brazen inconsistencies, if we go down the leftward road next November with Mr. Roosevelt and his army of political bureaucrats.

Now, my fellow citizens, the New Dealers say these are generalities; they claim we blueprint no details of how we Republicans are going to achieve recovery and a return to these necessary and desirable objectives in government and in the industry of this Nation.

Well, after there has been a hurricane, the first constructive job is to clean up the debris, to clear the ground of the wreckage and rubbish, so we may get ready intelligently to rebuild.

The first step the Republicans must take will be to survey the damage that has been done by the New Deal and determine what action is necessary to remedy the situation.

Let me now state a proposition and leave the answer to your own common sense and fair judgment.

The New Deal administration has been in full and complete command of the destinies of this Nation for practically 8 years. Mr. Roosevelt has been vested with more discretionary power than was ever given any President in the history of the United States. He has been given vastly greater sums of money to spend at his personal discretion than were ever given to any other President of the United States.

For nearly 8 years Mr. Roosevelt has controlled a majority of both Houses of the Congress. For at least 4 years of his administration he had the hopeful and overwhelming support of the citizens of this country. When Mr. Roosevelt came to power in 1933 he was faced with certain fundamental problems. What one of these problems has he solved? His administration has doubled the national debt, and we now do not know how much higher the $45,000,000,000 debt will go before we shall have built an adequate national defense.

The New Deal administration has had an alarming deficit every year it has been in power. Taxes have gone up constantly and will have to continue to rise for some time to come because of the mistakes of the New Deal administration in these last 8 years. It has cost the Nation all this to achieve—failure.

I want to give full credit to Mr. Roosevelt for everything he has accomplished in his administration.

When he came to power there was a panic in this country. That panic was the culmination of forces and effects which had been building up for several years as a result of the first World War and because of conditions in other parts of the globe. Mr. Roosevelt, by brave words and glowing promises, did lull the panic. He did reassure the people. He did prevent a disastrous stampede into the depths of fear.

But now let's call the roll on the other issues and see what the New Deal administration has accomplished in these 8 years of its complete power over the public purse, the Congress, and business.

There was serious unemployment in this Nation when Mr. Roosevelt took office. There has scarcely been a time since, in spite of the billions piled upon billions the New Deal bureaucrats have poured out in wasteful and extravagant experiments, when we have not had at least 10,000,000 wage earners out of work. That is the case now.

When Mr. Roosevelt took over in 1933 American agriculture was in distress. Prices of farm products were below parity. Mr. Roosevelt promised that without regimenting the farmers he would raise prices to parity. He has not solved that problem.

Mr. Roosevelt promised to reduce the expense of the National Government 25 percent. Did he do it?

When the New Dealers assumed the reins of government, they promised to balance the Budget—indeed, Mr. Roosevelt promised 11 different times to balance the Budget. But he didn't.

Mr. Roosevelt in 1932 went up and down this country preaching that taxes were too high; he said they "are paid in the sweat of every man who labors because they are a burden on production and are paid through production." He solemnly promised the American people to lower them. What did he do? From 1933 to 1939 Federal tax collections increased 195 percent.

Mr. Roosevelt insisted in 1932 that an excessive share of the tax burden was falling upon the poor people as consumers' taxes, which are hidden in the prices of necessities and luxuries. He promised to reduce consumer taxes. Has he kept that promise? In 1932 the percentage of taxes falling primarily but not exclusively upon the low-income groups was 39.4 percent. By Christmas of 1939 the same taxes had gone up 60 percent. They are now about 52.4 percent.

Mr. Roosevelt declared again and again that relief money must not be used for political purposes or to influence elections. The New Deal administration has had a black record of increasing the relief rolls from June through October of every election year. Let me give you a few figures on the W. P. A. situation and let you decide if this chain of circumstances is mere coincidence.

In 1933, a nonelection year, the number on Federal relief declined 15.4 percent from June through October, although the index of industrial production, reflecting employment, also declined 16.5 percent in the same period.

Yet in the election year of 1934 the Federal relief rolls increased 11.6 percent from June through October.

In 1935, a nonelection year, the Federal relief rolls showed a decline of 9.6 percent from June through October.

But in 1936, an election year, they increased 14.4 percent, although unemployment declined 13 percent.

In 1937, when there was no election, the Federal relief rolls showed a decline of 16.9 percent from June through October, although the index of industrial production declined 10.5 percent in that period.

In 1938, an election year, the Federal relief rolls showed an increase of 19.2 percent, although unemployment was reduced 9 percent from June through October.

In 1939, when there was no election, the number on relief declined 25.5 percent for the months preceding November.

Now, in this election year of 1940 we again hear that W. P. A. jobs are to increase. This in the face of a rise already under way in industrial activity due to the building of the national defense. This spending for work relief will go hand in hand with the spending of vast sums for armament.

Congress appropriated $975,000,000 to support W. P. A. this year, with the provision that this sum may be spent in 8 months instead of 12. The indications are it will be so spent. There are at present working on W. P. A. jobs 1,700,000 persons. The monthly bill for this work is $100,000,000. Beginning in September, these costs will rise to $140,000,000 a month. A peak of 2,300,000 jobs may be reached.

This juggling of relief money by New Deal bureaucrats for election purposes has shocked the conscience of the Nation. No one for a moment believes that any man, woman, or child in need of relief should be deprived of it or should be permitted to suffer. But the use of money for relief purposes—the very figures which I have quoted to you—tend to discredit relief and to make more difficult the extension of relief to those who really merit it. What we need and what we must have with relief is the most rigid economy and the highest possible efficiency, in order that every relief dollar shall go the furthest toward easing the situation of those who are still unable to find employment by which to maintain themselves.

When the New Deal administration came to power in 1933, Mr. Roosevelt promised the country that by devaluing the content of the gold dollar and by raising the price which we were willing to pay for gold from $20.67 an ounce to $35 an ounce he was going to rescue the world from most of its troubles, and he was surely going to help the United States exports. We now have a gold bear by the tail and can't let loose.

Mr. Roosevelt in 1932 argued that the country had been thrown into a panic by synthetic fears manufactured by those who generated those fears for their own selfish purposes. Mr. Roosevelt's administration has been filled with more alarms and more fears than any administration this Nation has ever known. In less than 8 years we have had 67 or 68 crises and emergencies declared by the administration. Every emergency and every crisis was put forward as an argument for more and more power to be vested in the Chief Executive.

I shall not go on detailing the failures of the New Deal, but I want to put this proposition:

"What can the New Deal do in the next 4 years to solve any of these grave fundamental problems, domestic and foreign, that it has not done in the last 8 years?"

If the New Deal in power for 8 years with all of these tremendous controls at its command has failed to do something that it can do in the next 4 years, then it has been criminally negligent. If, on the other hand, the New Deal has done everything it could do in the past 8 years to solve these problems then, I ask you, What claim has it to another 4 years of power on the ground it can solve some of these problems? How can we judge what to expect under 4 more years of the New Deal?

We cannot judge by the 1932 Democratic platform; because Mr. Roosevelt, after declaring that platform to be a sacred covenant with the people, proceeded to disregard it completely as soon as he was elected. The same thing happened again with the 1936 platform. Therefore, we may expect the same thing to happen so far as the 1940 platform is concerned.

Now, we Americans judge each other by the way we keep our promises. We judge a man by the validity of his pledged word. We judge a business by the way it keeps its promises to its customers. That is the only way we can judge an individual or a business or a public official. On that basis, what is to be said of a President who has made and broken 57 major promises in 8 years?

Now, a word as to our national defense. A good many of the New Deal spokesmen have attempted to charge the sad state of our national defense to the Republican administration preceding the New Deal's accession to power. Let's see about that.

The threat to the security of America arose, if there is any such a threat, in 1933. Every need for a national defense for the United States of America on the scale proposed now by Mr. Roosevelt, has arisen within his own administration. He has been in complete control of Government during that time. He has known, or has claimed to know, world conditions during that time. If these are facts, then to the administration and to none other is chargeable the blame for the dangerous state of our national defense today. To the New Deal administration and to none other is chargeable the waste and the superexpense now necessary to create in haste a defense that should have been in the making for the last 6 years. If Mr. Roosevelt knew that these conditions existed in Europe, then why did he not begin years ago to tell us about it and to advocate the building of a national defense? Instead of that, he and Mr. Hull urged reciprocal-trade treaties which they said would benefit American agriculture and American wage earners and which have not done so. They were entering into these trade treaties with all the nations of the world except Germany at a time when, if they knew what the situation was, they must have known we should be building a defense, and tightening our domestic economy to get ready for a situation which they now say they knew was inevitable.

America is at the parting of the ways.

If, next November, America should decide at the ballot boxes to continue on down the road to the left with Mr. Roosevelt and his New Deal administration, then we face the grave danger of the loss of our personal liberties, the extinction of the Bill of Rights, the paralysis of the Constitution, and a change in our whole form of government, with a probable end to our free constitutional republic as such.

As I said a while ago, the first thing the Republican Party must do when it returns to power will be to clean up the wreckage left by this hurricane of New Deal waste and spending and experimentation.

That means repeal and reverse such acts and policies as have produced that wreckage. Such a program does not include any intent whatsoever to permit one man, woman, or child in this Nation to suffer from lack of merited relief.

Labor will not be deprived of one single advance it has gained in the last decade.

This program will mean, however, relief conducted on the most efficient, practical, and economical basis possible.

It will mean to build our national defense on the most efficient, practical, and economical basis possible.

It will mean to weed out of every governmental department unnecessary and political expenditures which have been instituted and carried on for these several years by the vast New Deal bureaucracy.

It will mean a return to State's rights.

It will mean a return to the kind of government which was instituted with the writing of the Constitution at Philadelphia.

We must no longer continue to have this Nation divided by sectional and class prejudices, hatreds, and suspicions. We must unify our people for their own common defense and prosperity.

It is true we face the probability of completely altered conditions in other countries, which will require adjustment of policy on our part.

The business of administering our Government is the biggest business in the world. The last 8 years have demonstrated the utter, absolute, and inescapable necessity for a business administration.

We have had 8 years of groping.

We have had 8 years of spending.

We have had 8 years of boondoggling. They must have been a boon to the doggiers but they certainly haven't been to the taxpayers.

America must have a business administration if we are to avoid national bankruptcy; if we are to escape inflation or repudiation which would ruin every man, woman, and child in this Nation.

We must put America back to work in private industry at decent wages. This means a business administration that knows what is necessary to encourage the proper expansion of business; it means an economy of plenty instead of scarcity.

We must have an administration that will speak softly and carry a big stick, rather than talk big, and carry a swagger stick.

We must have a business administration which will take the American people into the confidence of its Executive; whose diplomacy will be a part of the people's business, and not the private affair of the little White House clique of schemers.

We must have a business administration which will recognize that the foreign policy of the United States does begin right here in our own land.

We must have a business administration that will actually turn to the task of finding a sound solution for agricultural problems and not mere temporary expedients and palliatives.

It is vitally important for us to regain control of the House of Representatives, and to elect as many Republican Senators as possible. Obviously, Mr. Willkie, as President, will have to have a sympathetic House, and help in the Senate, to translate his business policies into effective measures of government.

I assure you we will take control of the next House of Representatives, and we will increase our membership in the United States Senate.

We have a hard fight ahead of us. We are assured of victory if we will continue to fight right up to the day of the election. But we Republicans must not for a single instant forget that the administration has the patronage. It has the spending of the money. It has a tremendous bureaucracy which reaches its tentacles into every precinct in the United States. We must offset those advantages by hard work

Let me say, my friends, that America has not reached the limit of her development. America has not reached her maturity and started down the hill toward decay. America is not hopeless. Unemployment has not come to stay. The specter of poverty and want and hardship does not hover over this country, permanently to darken the skies of our future. America is a young Nation, a vigorous Nation, a courageous Nation.

The Republican Party has given to the Nation a man whose outstanding—I may say remarkable—ability will assure this Nation of the kind of a business administration in Government we must have. That man was chosen in an unparalleled political action by the national convention of the Republican Party at Philadelphia. He was chosen in the typical American fashion, by a convention of unbossed delegates, who heard the call of millions of Americans, "We Want Willkie!"

Those of you who listened to Wendell Willkie's acceptance speech at Elwood, Ind., and those of you who have since read it, can begin to understand the remarkable character of the man who has risen with the necessity of his Nation. It is said that "the times always produce the man." This certainly is true in the case of the Presidential nominee, Wendell L. Willkie.

Mr. Willkie is not glib. He is not a professional spellbinder. He is a plain, common man of the plain people. He is an amateur in politics. But he is a veteran in business and he is a veteran in his knowledge of what the plain people want, of what the plain people need, and of what the plain people must have.

He reached the top the hard way. He harvested wheat in Minnesota. In his young days he dressed tools in the Texas oil fields. He operated a cement block machine in Wyoming. He puddled steel outside of Chicago. He shucked corn in Iowa. He milked cows in Wisconsin. He picked vegetables in California. He operated a tent hotel in Colorado. He taught school in Kansas. He has lived in Ohio and Indiana and New York. He has traveled over practically the whole of these United States and he knows at first hand the agricultural problems as well as the industrial problems which confront this Nation.

Wendell Willkie himself owns several farms, but he is perfectly honest in saying that he is a talking farmer instead of a working farmer. Nevertheless he does know agriculture from the practical side.

This vastly diversified experience, and his intense temperament, his geniality, his freedom from what is called side, and his deep friendliness for his fellow men make Wendell Willkie the ideal man to take over the White House next January and to clean up the wreckage that has been caused by the New Deal.

Wendell Willkie has called the Nation to sacrifice and achievement, to struggle and accomplishment.

He has given us no glowing promises of livelihood without work, or of fortunes with leisure. Instead he has said plainly and bluntly there is no successful substitute for perseverance and perspiration. The call is to the courage of America. It is the call to the spirit of America. It is the call to the Nation's will to dare and to do.

America is at the parting of the ways.

It is a grave decision we must make. It is a decision which will affect not only the future of our Nation and our own children, and our children's children; it is a decision which will unequestionably have a great effect upon the destiny of the whole civilized world.

There is no doubt in my mind but that America next November will choose to go down the right road with Willkie.

Compulsory Military Training

OF

HON. C. ARTHUR ANDERSON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

LETTER FROM THE MISSOURI UNITS OF THE STEUBEN SOCIETY OF AMERICA

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, one of the most patriotic groups I know of is the Steuben Society. This great organization, taking for its guiding beacon the life and acts of General von Steuben, one of the great heroes of the American Revolution, has sent me a letter on the subject of compulsory military training which I commend to the attention of all my colleagues. I ask unanimous consent to conclude my remarks by including at this point the aforementioned letter.

The letter follows:

ST. LOUIS, MO., August 27, 1940.

HONORED AND RESPECTED SIR: In a spirit of love for country and its ideals and institutions we petition you, as there are proposals afoot that may become the turning point in the destiny of our land and its people.

After sober deliberation as a result of experiences of the World War, Congress passed a law forbidding direct or indirect transfer to any power or powers at war of any of our implements or munitions of war, this being to assure our people peace at home and freedom from entanglement in foreign squabbles.

There are those in Washington who seriously advance a proposal to violate this law, and even believe that we, a nation of 130,000,000 souls, should heel into the miserable mess over in Europe, due, as heretofore, to jealous lies, hatred, and greed, and the conduct of petty tyrants of all cocky nations, who, as Antony stated in his oration, good may be buried with their bones but the evil they do lives after them.

Lack of vision of European statesmen during the past 30 years belies the statements we have heard often that European diplomacy is far superior to that of our diplomats, and up to this time we do not agree in principle with those statements. Should the question of transfer of ships, planes, or other military creations be requested, we ask, please, that your influence and vote be offered against. When our forbears from all points of Europe set up a new order and conception to govern America they definitely turned their backs on the old order. Any visit to the old birthplace was friendly and any kind of intervention never occurred to them. We feel that still is very good politics. Our interests are best served by minding our business and setting a good-neighbor policy that pleases, most of all, the American people.

Statements are freely made that we have no friends. Position and ownership of wealth rarely begets real, sincere friendships, and arbitrary interference and superior attitudes do not better our already bad situation; and, further, violation of American ideals which served well through long years of practice is not helping our cause, for which it seems our Creator ordained the American Republic into existence, to the end that we help humanity by example.

If by negation of good law and sound American horse sense, we persist in a dangerous practice and sneak into the house of carnage by a side or rear window, compelling the dictators to join up against us, we have only our lack of good sense to blame if our exposed and highly respected carcass be thoroughly riddled, and probably a bill for unlawful entry presented for immediate payment, or else. And they would be absolutely within their rights if we do not get away with what we tried to do; and as conditions now are, may come to pass.

To arm to protect our people is proper, and aids in a measure to replace lost market conditions; but we feel that forced draft of young men just getting started in life after years of hard study is unwise, and will breed contempt for our conception of law and liberty, as did the prohibition law until it was rescinded. It will demoralize their futures and family life.

We are advised that 3 of 5 white, and 7 of 10 colored applicants are rejected by Army and Navy rulings, largely due to malnutrition and causes that in most cases could be corrected.

It seems advisable to place willing applicants in separate divisions, build them to fitness for service, rather than let them leave with an inferiority complex and depressed spirit. In any event, all yearly men will greatly profit by serving and return benefited by their training. The backflow will become an asset to our country and should have a better influence for greater good.

From the heart of our beloved country comes this plea to you for your support for measures that really are short of war, and in this we know we express the thoughts of citizens who never flinch responsibilities and who feel as we do.

Please keep their and our faith in you. Keep America at peace and Americans at peace with each other.

Yours respectfully,

THE MISSOURI UNITS OF THE STEUBEN SOCIETY OF AMERICA.

Chairman of the Committees.

TELEGRAM FROM A CONSTITUENT

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I insert in the RECORD a wire from organizations in California opposing the draft.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., September 6, 1940.

Representative LEE GEYER,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Please insert following in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and show to California Congressmen: We cannot defend democracy by sacrificing democracy. Conscription would bring to America the very type of regimentation, militarism, and destruction of freedom that we are trying to avoid. We urge you to stop the un-American Burke-Wadsworth bill. We, your constituents, are united in opposing its passage.

One Hundred and Nineteenth Annual Conference of the A. M. E. Zion Church

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
HON. JOSEPH A. GAVAGAN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 6, 1940

ADDRESS OF MOST REVEREND BISHOP LYNNWOOD WESTINGHOUSE KYLES

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following Episcopal address delivered by Bishop Lynnwood Westinghouse Kyles at the one hundred and nineteenth annual session of the New York annual conference, A. M. E. Zion Church, Yonkers, N. Y., on June 26, 1940:

Colleagues, general officers, presiding elders, pastors, and Christian workers of the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, and friends, the First Epistle to the Thessalonian Christians begins with this salutation: "Grace be unto you and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ." These words are followed immediately by an expression of a deep sense of gatitude to God for their Christian conduct in the following words: "We give thanks to God always for you all, making mention of you in our prayers; remembering without ceasing your work of faith and labors of love."

In these words, addressed originally to the Thessalonian Christians, I greet you, my colleagues, presiding elders, pastors, and Christian workers of the New York annual conference, who are assembled here as witnesses of the same power of the gospel of Christ. In addressing you on this occasion, I am conscious of the fact that but for the blessings of the Almighty we would not be enjoying the rare privilege which is ours today.

This conference marks not only the closing of the one hundred and nineteenth annual session of the New York conference, but the beginning of a new year and a new quadrennium. As we look back upon the quadrennium which closed a few days ago in the city of Washington, D. C., we have many things to be grateful for, among them are the fine fellowship and the splendid cooperation of the members of the New York conference, to say nothing of what we have been able to accomplish through such fellowship and cooperation in a material and spiritual way. For all of this we are profoundly grateful to God.

As we assemble here today in the one hundred and nineteenth annual session of the New York conference my heart is filled with a feeling of dreadful foreboding and hopeful expectancy. This is a time for deep concern for those who are still privileged to be of the family of the church of Jesus Christ. When we realize that there are now millions on the earth who are positively helpless and unable to live a life of freedom and peaceful procedure, there is a serious foreboding. There is a feeling of hopeful expectancy in the hearts of those who still possess faith and who, like the believers of old, maintain a trustful waiting on the Lord, believing that if we keep the faith all things can be done through Jesus Christ who strengtheneth us, and that all things will "work together for the good of them that love the Lord."

The theme of our conference, The Call of the Christian Church, should touch and awaken to consciousness every person who is here today. Never has the Christian church faced such a period of conflicting ideologies and such apparent success of extraneous, paganistic doctrines in lands formerly called Christian.

Today a godless generation is growing up in Germany which actively and relentlessly seeks to destroy religion. All Christians should see the evil inherent in the philosophy taught by the Nazi leaders, but we must recognize that the Christian church, whose leadership we represent, is charged with the responsibility of salvaging not only the youth of America and closely guarding their spiritual development, but those adults whom we have neglected. Indeed it is the time of which the ancient prophet spoke, "Watchman, what of the night?"

Rosenberg, one of the chief lieutenants of Hitler, portrays Christianity as the cause of a deep-laid plot to overrun the world, and by race degeneration to completely enslave a people. German blood and Christian baptismal waters are completely irreconcilable. Contrary to Christianity in Germany, race is to the ordinary man the most holy thing. There can be no compromise here, but a decisive break with Christianity. This time the break must be at the expense of Christianity, not at the expense of our race.

It is a life and death contest. The issues are too sharply drawn, the spiritual stakes too high, for any lasting compromise. Either Christianity will reconquer its independence in matters of human spirit, or it will be effectively wiped out.

The Christian cross and the Nazi swastika are locked in a combat which when the history of this epoch is written will probably be its most important event.

The great question before the church is, Can Christianity survive? The issues are moral and religious. A neopaganism is being substituted for the Christian way of life. There is a definite effort to establish a standard of human conduct and a system of human relationships which involve a complete repudiation of the New Testament and make a deliberate mockery of Christ.

The paganism with which Hitler would supplant Christianity is not to be confined to Germany. He aims to paganize the western world. His missionaries are in every section of the world and they are disbursing their propaganda like violent disease germs until they are able to render their victims helpless and dependent. The Christian church has never had a more direct challenge. The answer that the church gives is likely to determine the status of the Christian religion through the next period of world history.

One cannot but see the logical, scholarly, practical, workable declarations included in this faith movement of the Nazi regime. As church leaders we have refrained from careful study of reading the publications and documents sent forth by the leaders and propagandists of his movement. It calls your attention to Mein Kampf, which one cannot read without feeling the power of master minds, scholarly and direct behind this philosophy. I have been amazed recently by a publication by Stanley High, which is a compilation of original German documents, which the leaders of this paganistic movement are teaching their own people and with which they are destroying the other people.

The Christian church leaders have laughed at Hitler as though he were a bad boy, but I am willing to believe with Carl Billinger, a young German writer, who has written a book entitled "Hitler Is No Fool."

I repeat, my heart is filled with foreboding, for I realize that the representatives of the Christian church have been guilty of many things that this philosophy accuses the Christian church of propagating. If we would only review the history of the world for the last 20 years, we will find that such a crisis as this had to come because of our own failure to take advantage of opportunities to be Christian and represent the Christ whom we declare to follow. We have to a large extent betrayed the Christ.

Let me take you back to the halls of Versailles in 1918, where England, America, and France, the three great democracies, the greatest representatives of the Christian church, sat in judgment upon a defeated nation. We do not dare to go into the questions of the rights of the victor and vanquished! But, we do call your attention to this one thing, first, we missed our opportunity to be Christian when the representatives of these three great Christian democracies, not only recognized their own colonial system of government but disbursed the colonies of the vanquished nation among themselves to be ruled and governed for their own economic benefit. How then would one judge a Christian nation except as a force which imposes over the weak.

Look at the next 10 years following the Versailles Treaty and watch the history of India and the movements of Ghandi. Great Britain, a Christian democracy, instead of sending Christian missionaries to preach the gospel of liberation, if her intentions were only for the development and good of India, sent military Governors and strengthened her control of home rule for her own imperial control.

Again we will notice the history during the last 20 years of the Negro. The black man returned from Europe where he had fought and bled to make the world safe for democracy, and where he had gone to defend his country. This he did in spite of the fact that the following condition as set forth by the French military commission stationed with the American Army, existed. I quote from a document which was sent to all the Governors and mayors of France and reprinted in the May issue of the Crisis magazine for 1919, which issue was barred from the mails:

"The French public has become accustomed to treating the Negro with familiarity and indulgence. * * * This indulgence and this familiarity are matters of grievous concern to the Americans.

"Although citizens of the United States, the black man is regarded by the white Americans as inferior beings with whom relations of business or service only are possible."

There were three recommendations: "First, that there should be no undue familiarity between French and Negro officers; second, that the American Negro troops should not be praised too highly by the French military officials; third, that the French population * * * should be warned against the 'spoiling' of the Negro soldiers."

And, again in this crisis when a national-defense program is being launched, the Negro is being enlisted in the United States Army in segregated units only.

Again, America in her program of Christian brotherhood has much to explain to paganistic people who deny the unity of races when one reads the report of Senators WAGNER and CAPPER and Representatives GAVAGAN and FISH, entitled "Lynching Goes Underground." In spite of the opinion expressed in the Collier's magazine of February 10, 1940, that since there had only been three lynchings in the whole Nation in 1939, there was probably no need for antilynching legislation, and goes on to state that this had been accomplished by education of public opinion. But the Collier's magazine did not go deep enough into the situation and did not realize that we have reached the point only where lynchings are "done quietly" so as not to attract attention or draw publicity. In some lonely swamp a small body of men do the job that was formerly done by a howling, bloodthirsty mob of men, women, and children.

Then one has only to read the recent novel, entitled "The Native Son," and study the Social Action magazine for 1940 on Negro housing in Chicago, or peruse a cheap little magazine called Look, for May 21, 1940, showing the situation here in New York, to realize what this part of the Christian family has been forced to endure on the question of brotherhood in a Christian nation today.

Again, while Germany, Russia, and Italy, the great representatives of the paganistic movement of the world under their totalitarian governments, have been commandeering every man, woman, and child, supplying them with work, keeping them busy, feeding them with a purposeful program each day, consolidating their economic life for the good of the whole, according to their philosophy, until today they stand ready internally as a solid group, fed, clothed, and armed to carry forward their war of conquest, our Christian democracies have been concerned only about money. We have permitted capitalists to dictate the policies of our procedure and while some grew rich, others grew poorer; while some have more houses than they can ever live in, others have no place to live. While some have been urged to plow under their cotton in order that the prices might go up, others have no garments to wear. While wheat has been burned that some may profit, others have had no bread. While some were fighting and struggling for larger wages and fewer hours, we have here in our own country, according to reports of the National Industries Board of February 1940, after billions have been spent for employment, 9,436,000 still unemployed and the masses have been demoralized by the dole and relief.

While church leaders have preached peace, they winked at the fact that our institutions of learning and our charitable institutions were being supported by revenue derived from the manufacture and sale of war implements to belligerent nations who needed only to be armed to declare war.

While the doctors of learning and the great mental forces of the totalitarian states have been educating and corralling their youth into a solid phalanx against the Christian religion and building them up on the paganistic philosophies by word and deed, carefully guarding against any interference by those who would upset their teaching, we have welcomed into our halls of learning, not only in our State but in many private institutions of learning supported by our churches, the "fifth column" ideas. These ideas of totalitarianism and these paganistic philosophies have found a fertile ground, because beginning with the first grade, up through college, there is no inclusion of the principles of the teachings of Jesus Christ nor the use of the Bible as a part of our school curriculum.

Dr. Luther A. Weigle, dean of the divinity school of Yale University, in an address delivered before the annual meeting of the National Council of Religious Education in February 1940 said:

"Yet when all is granted that may be affirmed of the influences making for sound character and religious faith in the best of our public-school systems, the fact remains that religion and education are rather sharply divorced in most American communities, and that we have departed far from the early conception that religion should be an integral part of public education."

In the nineteenth century this "secularization" of public education, as it has come to be called, was incidental rather than purposed. It was a byproduct of the working out under the preservation of our liberties. These are the principles of religious freedom and the principle of public responsibility for education and for citizenship in a democracy.

One result of this religious freedom has been the perpetuation of distinct religious groups and the multiplication and growth of separately organized religious denominations. Another result has been to make easy withdrawal from church affiliation or the refusal to ally one's self with any organized religious group. Yet the great majority of American citizens support the churches and synagogues of the communities in which they live; and the total number of those who are church members in their own right, is more than one-half the population of the country.

The principle of public responsibility for education for citizenship in a democracy was conceived in New England and became the general policy of the country toward the middle of the nineteenth century. The main arguments then used in behalf of free public schools, supported by taxation, were the necessity for education as a qualification for the rights and duties of citizenship in a democracy; the need of public schools as a means of Americanization, transmitting a common heritage and begetting a common loyalty within the children of different racial and lingual groups; the need of public provision for education as a means of equalization of opportunities for rich and poor. Education, as contrasted with propaganda or mere conditioning by training, is of essential importance to a democracy. The precise form in which the state may best fulfill its responsibilities for the education of its citizens may vary, but the responsibility is inescapable.

The separation of religion and education into which we have drifted in America was not a necessary or logical result of either of these two basic principles, or of the two taken together. It has occurred because of certain conditions, certain factors of circumstances and trends of events, which characterized our life in the nineteenth century.

The most important of these factors of circumstance, is the sectarianism of our religious organizations, and the fact that we have held our diverse religious beliefs in so jealous and diverse a fashion. It is not infidels or atheists or free thinkers who have come most to take religious elements out of the life and curriculum of the public schools. It is the people who have spoken in the name of religion.

Quoting further from Dean Weigle we continue:

"To omit religion from the public schools is to convey to children a negative suggestion. Such a policy is bound to discredit religion in their minds. It would lead them to conclude that religion is negligible, or unimportant, or irrelevant to the real business of life."

The whole of the religious education of American children obviously cannot be undertaken in the public schools. That is the responsibility of the family, and of the churches and synagogues. We need more, not less, emphasis upon the sound home training of children and upon the well-organized, effective service of the Sunday school, vacation church school, and week-day school of religion.

But the public schools can and should include in their life that basic, elemental faith, which is deeper and more fundamental than any of religion's institutional or sectarian forms, the faith that relates human life to God. Let the public school exclude sectarianism but make explicit its belief in God; let it leave to the family and to the church or synagogues the responsibility for education in the whole range of religion, but let it keep in its own life provision for the education of children in due reverence for God and faith in God.

In the outset I stated that my heart was filled with expectancy and that is the only position for a true Christian to have at a time like this.

We are faced with a responsibility and a challenge which afford a great opportunity for the church. This situation demands a vigorous faith and a buoyant hope. A great expectancy.

If we would but listen today, O men of God, we would hear the Psalmist saying as of old—Psalm 37: 3:

"Trust in the Lord and do good; so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily, thou shalt be fed."

It is not too late but it is the time for Christian demonstration. We can only have faith in the future and trust in the Lord when we have clean hands and a pure heart. * * * When we do good.

In the recent study conference on the churches and the international situation which met in Philadelphia sponsored by the Department of International Justice and Good Will of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, the following declarations represent to a large degree the answer of the church today which gives us faith that we can hope:

"Many hold that the time has come for the churches to declare their commitment to the principle of freedom for subject peoples which involves the ultimate freeing of colonies and the drastic modification of the whole colonial system. The abolition of chattel slavery was one of the great steps forward in human society. Should not this same principle be applied to groups of men?

"We believe that the principle of eventual freedom for all peoples is not only the recognition of an essential right but is also a prerequisite to the creation of that sense of justice and good will without which we cannot hope to rid the world of war.

"Again, domestic policy is related to foreign policy and world peace. This fact is often overlooked. Social and economic justice; tariff and trade relations; Army and Navy appropriations; racial and religious attitudes; these are among the interests of a domestic character which bear upon the peace and war problem.

"It is impossible wholly to divorce foreign policy from domestic policy and any comprehensive program for peace must contain a synthesis of both.

"A constructive, creative policy can stem only from a domestic policy which is firmly rooted in democracy and which provides for adequate social security."

As church leaders we have as our task the challenge to use every opportunity to do good to the souls and bodies of our fellow men, not only to pray but to work that His will be done on earth, in the same trust.

Let the church be militant about the affairs of government and society. Liberty and justice for all, means every human person. Even black Africa, brown India, the American Negro, and the underprivileged everywhere.

"Trust in the Lord and do good and there will be an opportunity for all to live abundantly."

Again, we hear the Psalmist say: "Wait on the Lord and He shall exalt thee to inherit the land; When the wicked are cut off, thou shalt see it" (37: 34).

As members of the Methodist Church and professors of the doctrines of John Wesley, we have a great heritage. Methodism has stood for free church—never under any state control but always free to make the citizens and policies of a state Christian. It has been the mission of the Methodist to spread scriptural holiness through the lands.

It has been well said in a recent book on Methodism, The Highroads of Methodism, that one of the greatest glories of Methodism has been its attitude toward all races and colors of mankind. Its activities in all its history have not been restricted to people of one color or tongue.

The individual gospel that has been stressed by Methodism necessarily has a social implication. There can be no completely individual gospel that does not become social in its functioning. Those Methodists whose hearts were "strangely warmed" ever since the days of John Wesley have industriously ministered to the physical, intellectual, and spiritual needs of the people in joyous expectation, that His kingdom may come on earth.

In conclusion, we turn again to the psalmist as he gave the triumphant example of our attitude and position at this time: Psalms 37: 37, "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace."

The answer is the enthronement of Jesus Christ as Lord and Saviour—the perfect man * * * the great example.

As Christians and particularly as Methodists, it has been our mission from the beginning to lead men to Christ—to enthrone Christ: "That in all things He might have the preeminence." Col. 1: 18.

Where have we been in recent years? If Methodism alone would gird on its armor now, and suffer, strive, and endure for the great cause, there would be created even yet enough tension to stop the world catastrophe in many places.

The World Council of Churches making Christ supreme Lord over race, creed, nation, and tongue today there would be peace.

My appeal to you as members of the Methodist Annual Conference is to remember that we face disaster and defeat only because we do not realize that this day and generation demand of any form of religion or civilization a program that comprises the whole life. We have been lukewarm and compromising, and the result is threatened destruction. Therefore, we must go forth insisting that there be a complete surrender to the totalitarian claims of Christ into the way of peace.

Compulsory Military Service in Massachusetts

OF

HON. JOSEPH E. CASEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SECTIONS OF THE ANNOTATED LAWS OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following sections of the Annotated Laws of Massachusetts, indicating that for many years the Governor of the Commonwealth has had the power to draft men in times of threatened invasion of the imminency of war:

ANNOTATED LAWS OF MASSACHUSETTS

Chapter 33, section 5. Organized and unorganized militia: The militia shall consist of two classes, namely, the organized militia, to be known as the Massachusetts volunteer militia, composed and organized as provided in this chapter; and the remainder, to be known as the unorganized militia. The unorganized militia shall be subject to no active duty except in case of war, actual or threatened, invasion, the prevention of invasion, the suppression of riots, and the assisting of civil officers in the execution of the laws. (P. S. 14, sec. 6; 1887, 411, sec. 6; 1893, 367, sec. 6; R. L. 16, sec. 7; 1905, 465, sec. 7; 1908, 604, sec. 7; 1917, 327, sec. 5; 1924, 465.)

Chapter 33, section 8. Calling out of unorganized militia: When necessary to call out any part of the unorganized militia for active duty, the commander in chief shall direct his order to the aldermen or to the selectmen, who shall forthwith, by written order or oral notice to each individual, or by proclamation, appoint a time and place for the assembling of the unorganized militia in their town, and shall then and there draft as many thereof, or accept as many volunteers, as are required by the order of the commander in chief, and shall forthwith forward to him a list of the persons so drafted or accepted as volunteers. (P. S. 14, sec. 9; 1887, 411, sec. 9; 1893, 367, sec. 9; R. L. 16, sec. 10; 1905, 465, sec. 10; 1908, 604, sec. 10; 1917, 327, sec. 8; 1924, 465.)

Chapter 33, section 9. Muster of same, etc.; deserter, who deemed: The part of the unorganized militia so drafted or accepted shall immediately be mustered under the orders of the commander in chief into the service of the Commonwealth for 3 years, or for such less period as he may direct, and shall be organized into new units, or assigned to organizations of the volunteer militia then existing. Such new organizations shall be officered, equipped, trained, and governed according to the laws for the government of the volunteer militia. In such new organizations, the commander in chief may detail officers to train and command them until their officers shall have qualified. Every member of the unorganized militia who volunteers or is detached or drafted, who does not appear to be mustered in as required by the orders of the commander in chief, or does not produce a sworn certificate, from a physician in good standing, of physical disability so to appear, shall be taken to be a deserter. (P. S. 14, sec. 10; 1887, 411, sec. 10; 1893, 367, sec. 10; R. L. 16, sec. 11; 1905, 465, sec. 11; 1908, 604, sec. 11; 1917, 327, sec. 9; 1920, 127, sec. 1; 1924, 465.)

Conscription in Peacetime

OF

HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE

OF KANSAS

Friday, September 6, 1940

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I have given the present legislation and the entire question of peacetime conscription as much time and consideration as I have any legislation that has come up since I have been a Member of Congress. I realize that there are sincere differences of opinion on the matter. My thought is that conscription at any time, either in war or peace, should be used only as the last resort. We have never before found it necessary to use conscription in peacetime. We have not always found it necessary in time of war. To enact conscription legislation at this time would be to depart from a tradition which has been maintained since the beginning of the Republic. If we adopt it now in peacetime there certainly is some question as to whether we will ever get rid of it. I do not like to think of the America of the future as a country where men are conscripted in time of peace.

Furthermore, the conscription of men for military service is only one phase of the matter. When this measure was before the Senate an amendment was adopted, providing for conscription of industry in such broad terms as to bring about the establishment of a dictatorship. Whether this legislation in its final form will contain this provision is not so material. The chances are that it will be retained, but whether or not it is a part of this particular bill, we are in the end going to conscript industry and labor and bring about a complete military dictatorship in this country. We might accept something of this kind in time of war as a matter of necessity, but certainly it should not even be considered in time of peace, unless considerations affecting our national safety make it imperative.

Just what is there in our present situation which makes it necessary for us to enact this legislation? What is it that requires us to build up a conscripted army of 1,000,000 men or more in addition to the more than 900,000 men who are now serving in the United States Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, either actively or in reserve? Up to now, at least, the theory of all military experts has been that our main line of defense is our fleet. We are a naval power separated from our potential enemies by 3,000 to 7,000 miles of water. We already have a more powerful Navy than any country other than England, a friendly nation. We have authorized and have under construction additional Navy units which will more than double the strength of our forces. We have just acquired sites for naval and air bases far out into the Atlantic, thus tremendously increasing the effectiveness of our defense. We have authorized and are now building the greatest air fleet in the world. It is true it will take time to complete our naval preparations. It will take time to build our air force, but both arms are growing stronger every day and within the next 2 years we should have the greatest air force in the world and our Navy will be vastly strengthened. Likewise, within that time, we will have developed our newly acquired naval and air bases.

To supplement these great defensive forces we need a comparatively small mobile Army. One which is equipped with the most modern type of weapons, strong coast defenses, and anti-aircraft guns, and thoroughly mechanized. We can easily recruit such an Army by voluntary methods and conscription is most certainly not necessary. Conscription is only necessary if we are going to raise an Army of from 2,000,000 to 4,000,000 men.

The only reason for even considering the creation of such a tremendous army is that there are fears that Hitler may conquer England, capture the English fleet, and attack this country within the next few months. In that event it is argued that we will not be able to prevent the landing of an army on this hemisphere and we must, therefore, be prepared to fight it out with land forces.

Such an argument might much better have been made 3 months ago, or even 2 months ago, than today. The victorious march of Hitler had not been interrupted up to that time and the confused and perplexed military experts of the world were in more or less of a state of panic. They envisioned the conquest of Britain as the next inevitable step and the capture and the destruction of the British fleet as a logical consequence. Granting that there was some justification for such a belief 2 or 3 months ago, there is no justification for it today. The likelihood of invasion is growing less every day, and if there is to be an invasion this fall—or ever, it must come within the next 3 weeks. Hitler is now talking about a 5-year war instead of being in England by August 15, as he promised his people a few weeks ago.

Furthermore, if England should be defeated and invaded, we have the assurance of Winston Churchill that the British Navy will not be surrendered or otherwise be permitted to fall in the hands of Germany. Therefore, at this moment it seems extremely improbable that a German attack can be expected any time soon. The same thing applies to the other totalitarian powers, for all of whom our Navy is a match under present conditions.

Even assuming that we should lose entirely the protection of the English Navy and the very improbable situation should develop whereby we might lose control of the sea, it requires a tremendous stretch of the imagination to envision the landing of any troops in this hemisphere. As the well-known military writer, Hanson W. Baldwin, has recently stated in Harper's magazine, the maximum force that could be transported, even if we lost control of the sea, would be 50,000 men and that the transportation of even this small number of men would require 375,000 tons of shipping, and that, once they landed, half of the tonnage of the German merchant marine would be needed to supply them. Mr. Baldwin further states that to supply 1,000,000 men on this hemisphere from Europe would require at least 13,000,000 tons of shipping. An impossible quantity even if there were a combination of Germany and Britain against us. Certainly no combination of nations could transport and supply 1,000,000 men on this continent any time short of 2 or 3 years, even assuming the war in Europe ended tomorrow, and that we had no naval protection whatever.

A recent article by Walter Trohan in the Chicago Tribune of August 26 contains a further discussion of what would be required for an invasion of this country. This article, which was written after consulting many military and naval experts, states in effect that any attempt of invasion with a force of less than 1,000,000 men would be suicidal, and that to equip such an army would require 1,500 tanks, 1,800 scout cars, 200,000 other types of motor vehicles, and 7,500 planes. At sea such an army would need 1,000 transports of an average of 10,000 tons, 200 freighters of an average of 5,000 tons, 500 supply ships of an average of 7,500 tons, and 250 oil tanks of an average of 8,000 tons. No country or group of countries in the world could within a reasonable period of time furnish such an amount of supplies or shipping. In addition, any country or combination of countries attempting such an invasion would have to have a fleet sufficiently prepared to drive our Navy from the seas.

No, it is not necessary for us to have conscription for self-defense, or for the defense of the Western Hemisphere. The only possible excuse for building up a large conscripted army is for offensive use elsewhere. In other words, it means that we contemplate getting into the war. There can be no other possible justification. The American people are willing to spend whatever may be necessary and to make whatever other sacrifices that may be necessary to defend this country. I do not believe, however, that they are willing to have peacetime conscription and dictatorship foisted upon them, perhaps forever. I, therefore, expect to vote against the bill.

OF
HON. THOMAS A. FLAHERTY
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 6, 1940

Mr. FLAHERTY. Mr. Speaker, I am greatly concerned with the discrimination by certain departments of the Government against graduates of certain schools. This practice is so general and so unfair that a bill is now pending in Congress to eliminate the condition. The bill I refer to is S. 1610, which has passed the Senate and is now pending on the Union Calendar of the House of Representatives. I hope that the legislation proposed in this measure will become law before the present Congress adjourns.

I have been disturbed by the latest evidence of the prejudice of department officials, which was brought to my notice in a letter which I have received from President Gleason L. Archer, of Suffolk University, Boston, Mass.

The letter is as follows:

SUFFOLK UNIVERSITY,
Boston, Mass., September 4, 1940.

Hon. THOMAS A. FLAHERTY,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN FLAHERTY: An unfortunate situation has arisen in the first naval district due to departmental regulations barring applicants for officers' training except graduates or undergraduates of accredited colleges and universities.

I think you are familiar with the fact that the college department of Suffolk University is too young to seek accreditation. Its faculty, however, is composed of experienced day university teachers drawn from the faculties of Harvard University, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Tufts, and other colleges.

It seems to me manifestly unjust both to our men and to the Nation itself that naval "red tape" should bar able and patriotic young men from service in this emergency. Trained lawyers and men academically trained under veteran teachers should not, in my judgment, be humiliated by rejection simply because their institution is too young to be on the accredited list.

Recently I went to Washington and consulted the Department. I have since written a complete statement of the case. Today I am in receipt of a letter from Rear Admiral C. W. Mintz, Chief of the Bureau, who writes as follows:

"The Navy Department would be glad to consider applicants from Suffolk University as soon as it is listed by one of the recognized accrediting agencies."

As you are perhaps aware accrediting is a lengthy process which we could not hope to complete within 3 years. Please see if you can't do something to overcome this intolerable situation. Incidentally, we have about 3,500 graduates, most of them lawyers.

Many of them are already holding important Federal positions—as for example, James J. Caffrey, 1923, regional director of the Securities and Exchange Commission in New York City. Men of this type should not be required to wait until conscripted as privates.

Why not take up and pass S. 1610 that prevents discrimination of this nature in other fields?

Cordially yours,

GLEASON L. ARCHER, President.

Mr. Speaker, the custom now in vogue is most undemocratic in that it excludes the attorney or physician who acquired his training the hard way from consideration for appointment in the several administrative agencies of the Government. Furthermore, this type of professional man cannot be selected for appointment in the commissioned service of the Army and Navy of this country. I do not share the views of these departments that only the sons of the rich, the graduates of Harvard, Yale, and Columbia are capable of leadership, or qualified for these honorable positions in the service of our country.

I urge upon this Congress to put an end to this policy of special privilege once and for all, and in my honest judgment, we will find ourselves better equipped to meet the serious days that appear to lie ahead.

The 5-Day Week in the Federal Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 6, 1940

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, there is now pending in the Congress the McCormack-Mead 5-day week bill (H. R. 9655) which would authorize the President to establish the 5-day week for all or any agency in Washington for all or any part of the year, providing no extra costs to the Government are entailed.

It is my position that if this bill is enacted into law that such a work-week could be installed without added cost to the Government.

According to a statement by the Civil Service Commission, it was estimated in 1937 that the installation of the 5-day week would cost $56,700,000 or 6.6 percent of the aggregate pay of the employees affected. Apparently this was computed in a purely mathematical way. Though it may be true that figures do not lie, there are times when they do not tell the truth and this is an instance of it.

There are certain intangible but nevertheless very important factors which the Commission did not take into consideration. The Commission itself states that—

> An uncalculated but substantial amount that would be saved in the cost of heating, cooling, and general maintenance of buildings and equipment should be deducted from the $56,000,000 estimate.

It admits, too, that "an uncalculated but substantial amount" should be deducted from this figure for such savings as improved management and administration would make.

But it makes no allowance whatever for stepped-up production brought about because of heightened employee morale or the improved health and added vigor which an additional half-day's rest and vacation would mean. There should be a very heavy deduction for this factor. It may be uncalculated but it is not incalculable.

This proposal to institute the 5-day week in the public service is not a novel undertaking. As you know, the 5-day week is well established in private industry and in several governmental agencies, Federal, State, and municipal.

I have scanned the reports of those who have installed the 5-day week, the reports of men who are in a position to have been able to watch it operate and to note its results. Here are some of these findings and some of the results from a standpoint of cost and production, which after all should be the primary concern of any employer, be he private or public.

The Government Printing Office was the first major Government agency to be placed on a 5-day week. This was done on July 2, 1932. In his annual report of 1932 the Superintendent of Accounts states that installation of the 5-day week stimulated production to such an extent that output increased from 4 to 10 percent in the various departments. He also indicates that production for the 4-hour period on Saturday was low and did not compare with proportionate periods on full working days.

Though this same report shows an increase of 234 employees during the fiscal year of 1932, this cannot be attributed to the 5-day week. Prior to this there had been considerable overtime and there was an overload of work. At that time there were 2,133 printing and binding jobs that had been at the Printing Office for more than 60 days after order. But by November 28, 1932, there were only 30 such jobs pending.

If the Commission must use mathematics, let it compute this: The 4-hour half day is one-eleventh of the 5½-day week, or slightly more than 9 percent. Yet we have an increase of 10 percent in many G. P. O. departments, plus the "uncalculated but substantial" savings mentioned by the Commission for heating, cooling, maintenance, and so forth. Now, let them turn loose the slide rules and tell us how much the 5-day week in that agency cost the Government. And, mind you, the one-eleventh, which is the half day, has consistently been shown to be an unproductive period, and it would not be accurate to say that half as much work is turned out on this half day as is produced in a full day.

On October 17, 1939, the former budget commissioner and personnel director of the State of Minnesota, which has instituted the 5-day week for State employees, made this statement, based on his observations:

> There was no increase in the pay roll of the respective State departments to indicate that additional employees were added because of the 5-day week, and in recommending appropriations for salaries the departments in most instances did not increase their appropriations requests because of the installation of the 5-day week.

The commissioner pointed out that it did require—

> More accurate and detailed planning of the work of the office on the part of the executives, and that the employees worked more efficiently as a result of the shorter working week.

If this is possible in Minnesota, it ought to be possible in the Federal Government.

Charles J. Fox, city auditor of Boston, on December 6, 1939, wrote:

> Establishment of the 5-day week in the printing department has meant no additional expense to the city. So far as I can ascertain, neither has it resulted in any loss of efficiency.

This statement applied to only one group of employees who were on the 5-day week the year round. In Boston, which is a much cooler city than Washington, D. C., as every Member of this House knows only too well, virtually all city employees work the 5-day week during the summer months.

The following is Mr. Fox's experience on this score:

> By executive order, city departments have been manned by skeleton forces on Saturday mornings. In this way the bulk of employees have been excused from duty. There has been no extra expense involved in this procedure, and there certainly has been no loss in efficiency in the operation of city departments, since Saturday mornings in general throughout the summer are not busy days. * * * In fact, I feel this statement is correct for all Saturdays throughout the year, with the possible exception of the winter months.

Here is another person who ought to know, who emphasizes the unproductiveness of the Saturday half day, and emphasizes that the 5-day week entails no extra expense.

The 5-day week is in force in the navy yards, the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, the Post Office, the Tennessee Valley Authority, and certain other field establishments. New York City has adopted it, too, as have other State and municipal governments. I do not have the figures on these agencies.

Now, let me turn to some results and findings in private industry. Perhaps the most scientific study of the 5-day week was conducted in the Boots Pure Drug Co., Ltd., in England. The structure of the company—if it is still standing—is comparable to our Federal Government. It is engaged in the production and distribution of over 2,000 items in the drug and toiletry line. Because of its location, units had grown up "in patchwork rather than on any comprehensive scheme embracing the works as a whole," in the words of the production director of the company, although some years later coordinated units were built to house production activities.

This company is a very big concern. Except for raw materials, it is a self-contained business in that it manufactures as well as distributes its products. It is comparable in size to the A. & P. chain stores in this country, or, to make its structure even clearer, it is akin to a combination of Park & Tilford Drug Co. and the Whelan Drug Stores. In short, it is an organization of sufficient size and diversity to make its 5-day-week data significant.

In 1934 the company decided to experiment with the 5-day week from April 30 to September 22. The directors then asked the Ministry of Labor to appoint an investigator to determine the cost of the 5-day week to the company. Sir Richard A. S. Redmayne, of the Institution of Civil Engineers, was appointed to make the study on August 13, 1934. Although hours were not made standard for all departments, the total number of weekly hours declined in all departments. Redmayne termed the experiment a success.

He found that in general the number of employees did not change for the whole company despite the shorter week. To quote the office manager of the company:

> We employed one or two extra people in one or two sections in anticipation of the 5-day week, but experience showed us we did not need them.

It is clear therefore that costs did not increase.

Did production decrease? Redmayne found that production did not suffer materially. It was discovered that tardiness and absenteeism were greatly reduced and health much improved under the 5-day week. It was generally agreed that the improvement in attendance and promptness helped considerably in running the plant smoothly and in increasing efficiency of operation. It was noted that the production and efficiency of employees who were not wholly dependent on machines stepped up more than that of those who were—and it should be emphasized that very few Government workers are wholly dependent on machines in their jobs. There was a marked enthusiasm among workers when they reported for work Monday morning which was not notable before.

Redmayne came to the conclusion, too, that Saturday was an unproductive day. It is, he said, a short day and the cost of starting operations and the low morale of workers outweighs the output. Repairs to machinery and buildings was also speeded up and did not interfere so much with the work because it could be performed on Saturdays when the plants were clear.

It is very significant to note that there was complete agreement that no reduction in personnel would be possible if a return to the 5½-day week were made.

As to overtime, which had been prevalent prior to the experiment, it was virtually eliminated and management let it be known to supervisors that they would regard most overtime as maladministration.

Interestingly enough, Redmayne's report gives large credit to management also for making the 5-day week operative in that there was careful planning and streamlining prior to its establishment.

It should be clear from this study of the Boots Drug Co. that the 5-day week is beneficial to employer as well as employee, for no report can give weight on paper to increased loyalty and appreciation.

The Harvard School of Business Administration conducted an interesting study of the 5-day week at the Hawthorne plant of Western Electric, in which they observed groups at work. A group of 5 girls was observed and their output continually increased, which gave rise to the conclusion that, having a feeling of obligation and usefulness, they put more effort in their work.

In 1929, the National Industrial Conference Board, Inc., of New York City, made a thoroughgoing study of the 5-day week. One hundred and twenty-seven concerns replied to queries sent them.

Conclusions from this undertaking indicate that Saturday is recognized as economically unsatisfactory and the Board learned that "companies operating on the 5-day week did not, as a rule, find overtime work necessary."

In general it was discovered also that "the fewer the days into which production can be compressed the smaller will be the proportion of nonproductive work," or wasted time.

The conference board concluded that the 5-day week makes for efficient operation because—

First. Overhead is cut;

Second. Inspection and repair of machinery on Saturday cuts down on the number of break-downs during the week;

Third. Punctuality and attendance of the workers improve.

Note the third item. Where in the Civil Service Commission's report is an "uncalculated but substantial" allowance made for this very important item?

Samuel Crowther, in his interview with Henry Ford, which was written up in World's Work for October 1926, says:

> Now we know from experience in changing from 6 days to 5 and back again that we can get at least as great production in 5 days as we can in 6, and we shall probably get a greater, for the pressure will bring better methods. A full week's wage for a short week's work will pay.

Mr. Crowther makes out a case from a switch from the 6-day week to 5 days. I am speaking only of a reduction from 5½ days to 5 days.

To get back to the Commission's report, they appear to be not only misinformed as to the effects of the 5-day week but in unwarranted opposition to such a proposal for some reason or other.

A provision of the bill calls for time and one-half for overtime, and this the Commission feels will run up the costs. This provision is placed in the bill so that the Congress may, very much like the directors of Boots Drugs, Ltd., indicate that they frown upon overtime, and it is meant to be a penalty for maladministration.

Under date of July 11, 1940, in a letter to the President of the United States, Col. Philip B. Fleming, Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division, Department of Labor, made these germane observations:

> As a soldier, the Nation's defense is my primary interest. Were there any defense need in certain industries for abrogation of the time and one-half rule (referring to overtime) nothing could keep me from so reporting. In my contacts with industry no such need has yet been demonstrated to me.

Colonel Fleming goes on to cite the wartime report of the British Munitions Commission which covered observations over a 13½-month period. That document, gentlemen, shows that a reduction of working hours of munition workers was associated with an increase in production.

Quoted also in the Fleming letter is General Order No. 13, issued by the Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, on November 15, 1917, which, as Colonel Fleming states, was "7 months after the declaration of war when the United States was at the height of its procurement effort." The order stated:

> In view of the urgent necessity for a prompt increase in the volume of production of practically every article required for the conduct of the war, vigilance is demanded of all those in any way associated with industry lest the safeguards with which the people of this country have sought to protect labor should be unwisely and unnecessarily broken down. It is a fair assumption that for the most part these safeguards are the mechanisms of efficiency. Industrial history proves that reasonable hours, fair working conditions, and a proper wage scale are essential to high production. During the war every attempt should be made to conserve in every way possible all of our achievements in the way of social betterment. But the pressing argument for maintaining industrial safeguards in the present emergency is that they actually contribute to efficiency. To waive them would be a shortsighted policy, leading gradually but inevitably toward lowered production.

In another statement the Commission makes the point that it would be unfair to give one group of Government workers a 35-hour week when others are working 40 hours. Is the Commission making a plea for uniform hours? If so, why is it that thousands of Government workers are now working more than 40 hours a week and in many instances more than 50 hours a week? Why has not the Commission done something or asked that something be done to bring them down to 40 hours?

It states further that in recent legislation Congress has favored the 40-hour week. I am forced to point out that 40 hours is the maximum number that Congress will permit all industries over which they have jurisdiction to work most of their employees. It has not stipulated that they cannot work less. Because Congress has passed legislation involving the 40-hour week, it is not for the Commission to make the interpretation that Congress is opposed to less hours when such will not involve further costs.

The 35-hour week is in effect in many private industries and there is no reason why the Government should lag behind as an employer. We want the Federal employee to have a sense of loyalty, to feel that this Government is a fair and considerate employer. I am not implying that we shall purchase loyalty through the gift of a shorter workweek. But we can win appreciation, understanding, and gratitude, something that is important indeed in these days of betrayal and disloyalty. With unity and national defense now topics of household discussion and of the utmost importance, there is a duty imposed upon this body to go behind the lines—to see that morale in the Federal service is brought to the highest level and kept there. It cannot be a one-sided proposition. The management of Government administration must give crystal-clear indication that it is cooperative and not abusive—that it is not acting in bad faith—that the Government of these United States is not a bad employer.

I have here pledge petitions initiated by the United Federal Workers of America, a Government employees' union, which bear the signatures of nearly 30,000 Government workers employed in the District of Columbia. These employees pledge the fullest cooperation in making the 5-day week operative. They pledge their unconditional loyalty to the Government. They want to be useful to their country, but they want their country to give them standard working conditions. Every single one of them is an American citizen. I maintain that this Congress ought to enact this measure and by so doing generate a spirit in the public service which will make the Government impregnable against the stabs of America's enemies.

Conscription

OF

HON. FRANK O. HORTON

OF WYOMING

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 6, 1940

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Chairman, I am going to vote for H. R. 10132, not because I believe in peacetime conscription but rather because the adoption of this bill will serve notice on Hitler that our entire resources are pledged to stop him dead in his tracks if he dare start anything on our side of the Atlantic.

I must confess that my support is given with fear and trembling because of the President's insistence for a third term, with all it implies, as well as his dictatorial and war-provoking action in disposing of 50 destroyers. These actions show his utter disregard of precedence and the law, as well as his willingness to willfully violate the sacred treaty of The Hague and flaunt and defy the right and will of Congress.

No wonder that the Congress is fearful of delegating additional authority when authority already given is so grossly abused.

I am not a bit sure but what the instrument that we think we are welding for our defense may not well be the instrument that will be used for our destruction.

I realize as fully as anyone that the threat from within, brought about by the failure of this administration to solve domestic problems and willingness to permit all kinds of reds and various shades of pink to honeycomb this Government, is even greater than the threat from without.

But just because we have a dangerous wild bull running amuck in our herd is no reason why we should not protect our herd from a pack of wolves.

We must protect ourselves against both threats, and I believe that the instrument offered in this bill is the best instrument that is available at this time.

We are not building our Army, Navy, and air force for war, but rather to prevent war. I want our armed forces to be so infinitely superior to any other combination of powers that when we say "stop," they stop. You do not see anyone pushing Joe Louis around, nor do you see Joe Louis bullying anyone.

None of us like conscription. I have three boys, all in their twenties. They do not like conscription. This thing comes as close home to me as it does to any man in this House. As a kid, 10 years younger than the youngest man in this House, I volunteered and served in the Spanish-American War. I do not like conscription.

But even less do I like the shadow of Hitler, with all of its implications.

The cost is stupendous, the discomfort tremendous, the break in our daily lives pretty awful, but not comparable in misery to what might happen if we fail to get the big club ready in time.

War will not come because of preparedness.

If war comes, it will come through some such fool stunt as was the routing of the American Legion through a known German-mined sea. Had that boat, bent on its voyage of mercy, been sunk through any cause, the indignation and blind fury of the people of this country would have forced us into war.

Despite all sane arguments as to why this bill should not pass—and there are many—I am still voting "yes."

I do not care to retard preparedness, and in my opinion failure to pass this bill will do just that.

Labor Day Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MICHAEL J. KIRWAN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 6, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. MICHAEL J. KIRWAN, OF OHIO

Mr. KIRWAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address, which I delivered at a Democratic gathering in Youngstown, Ohio, on Labor Day, September 2, 1940:

Ladies and gentlemen, in the Archives Building in Washington, where all of the records and history of the United States is housed, two of the cornerstones are inscribed: "What Is Past Is Prologue" and "Study the Past."

I am asking all of you gathered here this evening in the interest of democracy, to take a stroll with me down Memory Lane, while we reminisce and study the past history of the United States during the last 21 years.

Twenty-one years ago, the last group of soldiers to march up Broadway on their return from the battlefields of France, were greeted by the cheers of millions of people who were shouting "President Woodrow Wilson and a third term." On that day, everywhere in America, civic organizations were naming parks and boulevards in honor of this greatly honored and beloved President of the United States. America was being proclaimed the greatest nation in the entire world, and the people wanted Woodrow Wilson to carry on. Alas, however, a tradition that the President of the United States could not run for a third term stood in his way. As we all remember, despite his ill health, President Wilson traveled across the country, carrying the message to the people stressing the importance of America taking its proper place around the table in the League of Nations. He very definitely felt that the United States of America should have a voice in the affairs of the entire world in order to make certain that those gallant men that we had sent abroad to preserve democracy had not made the supreme sacrifice in vain. He wanted to make certain that the ideals for which they gave up their lives would be carried on. Today, historians and practically every other person in America admit that President Wilson was correct in his demand that we join the League of Nations.

In 1920, the Democrats nominated the Honorable James Cox of Ohio and Franklin D. Roosevelt to carry on the ideals and the policies that the beloved Woodrow Wilson advocated and for which men gave up their lives in Flanders fields. The Republicans nominated Warren G. Harding, also of Ohio. As we recall, the people of the Republican ranks wanted Leonard Wood to be nominated as their standard-bearer, as he went into the convention with 388 delegates pledged to him, while Harding had but 52.

History as recorded tells us that a group of men met in a back room. On that day oil was king, and the men in that back room who drove over the nomination of Warren Harding, despite the voice of the people back home who wanted Leonard Wood, were to be paid for their efforts in the Government holdings of Teapot Dome and the naval oil reserve.

The America of that day was the most prosperous we had ever known. Every person was working and labor was receiving time and a half for all time over 8 hours. Prosperity was in abundance and happiness was in every home. However, the press and billboards, instigated by the Republican Party, were screaming, "Back to normalcy." We remember all too well what happened—the people went off to the polls in November of that year and swept Warren G. Harding into office as President of the United States.

Many here in this gathering tonight well remember the morning after that election. The news of the election results was slow, because radio had not been developed as it is today. At the change of mill turns men rushed to the bulletin boards set up around the downtown section of the city to announce the returns. When the results of the landslide were known many jeeringly wended their way to the office of the late Ed Moore, who had nominated James Cox at San Francisco to be the standard bearer of the Democratic Party. Ed had been in his office all through the night awaiting news of the election. He put his head out of the window of his office, raised his hand to silence those gathered on the outside and said: "I can see the soot and sweat of the steel mill on your brows—dinner pails on your arms, indicating that you are workingmen. I can see and hear you jeering me. All the message I have for you, my friends, is—if you can stand Warren Harding to serve as President of the United States for the next 4 years, surely to God I can."

The archives tell us that one of the first appointments made by President Harding was that of George Harvey, of Harpers Weekly fame, to the Court of St. James. When he was presented to the court he wore knee breeches, and from that time on he wore them so much around London that when pictures of him came back home we couldn't distinguish whether he was the town crier or a lamp lighter. Unfortunately for us, he stayed there long enough to help negotiate the destroying of the fine new Navy that this country had under construction.

Can we forget Forbes, who robbed and looted the Veterans' Administration even to the extent of selling the sheets and bandages that were badly needed in the veterans' hospitals throughout the country? Can we for a minute forget the Alien Custodian of the Harding administration who sold back to the German Government ships worth hundreds of millions of dollars for the paltry sum of three million? The retention of these ships by the United States could have started us well on the way to being the best merchant marine in the entire world. Can we forget the mail contracts and the scandals they created, and how the general policy of that day seemed to be to rob and loot like pirates? Everyone seemed to have his own department and his own part of the country to loot.

Can we forget that one of the first things that was done to the laboring man under the Harding regime was to give him two drastic cuts in wages and the time and a half for overtime was done away with? It seemed that America ran wild without a leader.

The pay-off came, however, in 1929—and what a cruel paymaster America had during the years 1929 to 1933. What untold suffering the people of this great Nation, with its stock of fine resources, endured during that period we all know only too well. Do you remember what the best-paying industries were? I'll tell you: Jigsaw puzzles and apples. Remember how people sat up all night and worked jigsaw puzzles and then swapped them with their neighbors? Putting jigsaw puzzles together kept the mind away from the empty stomach and cupboard. Don't you remember how President Hoover urged the people to buy apples from the man selling them on the street corner in order to bring back prosperity? Just imagine how low America, the richest Nation in the world, had fallen and how awfully good God was to us. Just supposing that a heavy frost in the spring of 1932 had hit the apple blossoms.

Yes, the archives tell us about the soldiers at Valley Forge leaving their footprints on the snow. They were trained, as soldiers, to endure that kind of suffering and hardship. But how about the women and children that not only left their footprints on the snow for 4 years—from 1929 to 1933—but also on the burning sands? Remember the testimony that went on before the Dewey investigating committee in New York in 1935? A hundred good mothers, representing thousands of mothers from all over America, testified that they had sold their body and soul to hell in prostitution during those lean years in order that their children might have a little food.

I am not one who believes that Paul Revere's ride saved the Nation. It is much easier for me to believe that it was that group of noble Americans attending the World Series game in Philadelphia, in 1931, saved America. Remember how they booed President Hoover? They booed him out of the ball park. But this booing gave him something to think about, because when he returned to Washington he asked for the release of one of his so-called stars on his own ball team—the Cabinet—Andrew Mellon. He not only waived Mellon out of the Cabinet, but out of the country—to the Court of St. James.

It is my hope that when the Mellon Art Gallery, now under construction in Washington is completed, that the Art Board judges will not overlook giving some of our own American art pictures the most conspicuous locations. They say that art is judged by its age and the money that is spent for it. Surely then, the pictures "Old Overholt" and "Green River" should receive first recognition, because they both realized more money from 1921 to 1933 than any other paintings in the history of the world. They were able to turn back to this Government $40 000,000 to build the beautiful new art gallery to house the Mellon art possessions. Too, I would like to see in another prominent location a painting of the "Battle of Anacostia" depicting those brave soldiers who went to France and fought to preserve democracy, coming to Washington to ask and plead for bread, but instead, were showered with bullets and gas bombs.

Then came November, 1932: The banks were practically all closed, homes were being foreclosed, people were being set out on the street because they could not pay the landlord. Chaos, despair, fear, and discouragement filled the heart of every man, woman, and child in America. If they were not in immediate need themselves, they witnessed what their relatives, neighbors, and friends were enduring. The people felt certain that their savior had come at last, and they overwhelmingly placed their confidence in Franklin D. Roosevelt at the polls. From the day that he took office, people began to have confidence in America—in their leader and in themselves.

Then came November 1936. The people's spirits had risen—they were on the way back to normalcy indeed. What did they do—thousands that had never cast a vote in their lifetime went to the polls and paid Franklin D. Roosevelt the greatest respect that had ever been showered on an individual. In 1937 we enjoyed the biggest business volume that America has ever known. The people had confidence in their leader.

Now comes 1940. Because of the unsettled conditions abroad and our own domestic problems, which are nil beside those of 1932, the people of this Nation are eager to retain the leadership of that same person in whom they placed their confidence in 1932 and 1936 and who did not fail them. Practically every one of the 48 States sent delegates to the National Democratic Convention at Chicago pledged to Franklin D. Roosevelt, despite a third-term tradition. The voice of the people was adhered to by the delegates, and the nomination of Franklin D. Roosevelt was overwhelming. If ever America needed a great leader it is now, and we are fortunate indeed to have confidence in the fact that for the next 4 years we will have the same fearless, courageous, and qualified captain at the helm of that good and sturdy ship, America.

Twenty years ago, as I said earlier, the rank and file of Republicans sent delegates to their convention at Chicago with a majority pledged to support their choice, Leonard Wood for the Presidency. In June of this year, the rank and file of Republicans sent the majority of their delegates to Philadelphia pledged to Thomas Dewey. They were again denied their privilege.

Twenty years ago oil was king, but today it is electricity. Twenty years ago the Government had billions of dollars in oil reserves at the Teapot Dome and naval oil reserves. Today the Government has billions of dollars in T. V. A., Boulder Dam, and Bonneville. Instead of the oil crowd, it was a power crowd that met in the back room in Philadelphia. They printed 5,000 extra tickets for the convention gallery and hired people on the street corner to go in and shout "We want Willkie."

It is true that Indiana has produced some great sons. The whole world loved one of them, Paul Dresser, who shared his dream about the Moonlight On the Wabash and the Candlelight was gleaming bright through the sycamores" with every one who wished to sing or play it. One of her other sons is also interested in light, but he wants to share it only with those who can pay plenty for the privilege of "receiving the light."

I thank you most sincerely for the stroll which you have taken with me down Memory Lane. You have listened most attentively to the history that the archives has housed for the past 21 years and to the inscriptions that are chiseled into this most beautiful building without a single window in it, which read: "What is past is prologue—Study the past." It behooves each and every one of us, then, to take this warning and to heed the message they give us.

Thank you.

Compulsory Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM S. JACOBSEN

OF IOWA

Friday, September 6, 1940

Mr. JACOBSEN. Mr. Speaker, while the question of compulsory training and the recruiting of our manpower for the national defense is under consideration, I believe it appropriate to call attention of this body to the appalling percentage of rejections in both arms of the service who have volunteered. These rejections are due almost entirely to a lack of physical fitness which disqualifies these men.

The experience of the last war demonstrated very definitely the need for a program of development of physical well-being in our Nation, and apparently we have not profited well by that experience. Because a large part of the defense of any nation is dependent upon healthy personnel, I should like to suggest that it is now time we ought to give consideration to some well-planned program of providing physical and health training for our young people.

I realize that our schools have long advocated programs of physical training in connection with their regular curriculum. However, there has been no program of this kind sponsored by our Federal Government. It seems to me that there is an obligation upon our Government to be vitally interested and concerned with the health and physical well-being of our people as a consideration for our national welfare. I do not advocate such a program of training primarily for the purpose of national defense. However, its part in this is important and not entirely incidental.

It is true that totalitarian governments have long emphasized such programs and have thereby provided for their armies physically fit manpower. In a democracy such as ours necessarily such an extravagant program could not be put into operation, yet a program could be sponsored and fostered which would pay dividends in better health and a more virile manhood and womanhood in our country. I believe the old principle of a sound mind in a sound body is as necessary and true today as it was centuries ago when practically all emphasis was placed upon physical well-being.

I should like to suggest for your consideration a program sponsored by our Federal Government in cooperation with our schools throughout this Nation by which such training in health and physical development should begin in the earliest stages of education and continue in a progressive manner throughout the school life of every child. We have the machinery already set up in our schools for such a program. Unfortunately, in its present use this machinery, because it has emphasized sports such as baseball, football, basketball, and so forth, has failed to reach the larger percentage of our young people and for that reason has not attained the ends for which it was theoretically designed.

I believe a system of physical education can be designed and carried out so that it will produce the desired results and be a genuine contributing factor to the welfare of our Nation, if such a program is sponsored and aided by our Government. Certainly the result of such sponsorship in vocational education in schools and health programs of various kinds through other local organizations has met with splendid success. I see no reason why a program such as this could not be established and carried out so that we shall have as a result young manhood physically fit to contribute to the needs of our Nation in a time of emergency.

Opportunity it seems to me should be offered every boy and girl in our Nation wherever he or she lives to learn thoroughly, appreciate, and be enthusiastic about whatever makes for physical fitness. Whether or not military training as such should be a part of this training is a question which could at any time be determined by the needs of our Nation. If necessary it could be worked in easily and appropriately without disturbing in any degree the primary objectives sought.

While I am not proposing any specific or particular manner of accomplishing these purposes, nevertheless I feel that some thought and consideration on the part of the Congress should be given to these suggestions and, if it is found desirable, that such a program should be inaugurated and appropriate legislation be prepared to carry it out.

Thanks, Friends

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK E. HOOK

OF MICHIGAN

Friday, September 6, 1940

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this occasion to thank hundreds of Members of Congress, both Republicans and Democrats, which includes practically every Member of this body. You good gentlemen have come to me personally and assured me of your confidence in me. I thank all of you from the depth of my heart for your kind offers of assistance to help me fight this cheap attempt at political blackmail that has recently been made upon me.

I am pleased beyond words for your sincere assurance and faith in my character and integrity. Your offers to testify and give testimonial to my good character and integrity at any time will be long and happily remembered by me. Mr. Speaker, I am duly grateful for the thoughtfulness of Rev. J. Frederic Wenchel, of Christ Lutheran Church here at Washington, and under leave to extend my remarks I include his letter to me:

CHRIST LUTHERAN CHURCH,
Washington, D. C., September 4, 1940.

Hon. FRANK E. HOOK,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Mrs. Wenchel and I have just returned from a vacation in Canada and were shocked at the effort being made to besmirch your good name. Coming just at this time the despicable purpose is only too evident. We do not believe it. You and Mrs. Hook have our sincere sympathy, as well as our prayers that God may sustain you in this terrible ordeal. If I can be of any help I shall be only too glad to be able to give it. With kindest regards from house to house.

Yours very sincerely,

J. FREDERIC WENCHEL.

Improved Rural Mail Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY
OF VERMONT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 6, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE BURLINGTON (VT.) FREE PRESS

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to include a very worth while and appreciative editorial with respect to improvements which have been made along the line of service to rural communities.

The editorial, which appeared in a recent issue of the Burlington Free Press, Burlington, Vt., follows:

[From the Burlington (Vt.) Free Press]

R. F. D. IMPROVEMENTS

Thirty towns in the Alleghanies, without airports, are the beneficiaries of an air-mail experiment outlined in the current Business Week. With an experimental appropriation of $200,000, Uncle Sam is demonstrating the dropping and pick-up of mail by plane in rural regions.

The first year's handling of 75,000 pounds of nonstop pick-up air mail in all weathers with 91.6 percent performance shows that our Air Mail System will soon have many healthy tributaries. The next air mail R. F. D.'s should be in Vermont, where the original R. F. D. got its start.

Vermont, too, sees continued improvements in rural mail with the use of speedy truck facilities. When the Rutland Railroad dropped train 50, some years ago, a star-route truck gave speedier, more flexible, more economical service for about 80 miles between Burlington and Rutland.

The discontinuance of Central Vermont trains 305 and 306 this coming week has long been foreshadowed by dwindling traffic. Day mails from St. Albans to White River Junction and return will shortly be handled by star-route trucks. A speedy and more flexible service will result, with probable Post Office Department economy. R. F. D. patrons in the Winooski, Dog River, and White River Valleys will get their important mail earlier under new arrangements in most instances.

While we lament the necessity of losing trains which for two generations or more have meant much to several dozen Vermont communities and their business life, motor transport can and will replace their functions to the satisfaction of rural postal patrons. Important long-haul mails for an indefinite time to come will be tied to night trains like the Montrealer, Washingtonian, and New Englander, it would appear. This latest rail change may make it necessary to tie the Mad River Valley and Hancock and Rochester postal services to Montpelier as have been long discussed. Such a 12-trip star route would bring modern mail service to these valleys comparable to that achieved by Stowe and Morrisville in the past 2 years.

Montpelier is apt to become the most important mail distributing center in the State, since it receives such superb night train service and has so many tributary valley highways. Only lethargy of patrons has prevented a good early morning and late evening Montpelier, West Danville, and St. Johnsbury star route with return trips. Here a 12-trip star route would brighten the lives of many communities, especially in the upper Winooski, Lamoille, and Passumpsic Valleys.

The New European Explosion

OF
HON. JOHN LESINSKI
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 6, 1940

EDITORIAL BY MARTIN HIMLER FOR THE ASSOCIATED HUNGARIAN WEEKLIES

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial written by Mr. Martin Himler for the Associated Hungarian Weeklies, composed of the following newspapers, by request of Dr. A. S. Gondos:

Hungarian Miners Journal; Martin Himler Weekly; Detroit Hungarian Journal; Flint Hungarian News; American Magyar Journal; Bethlehem Herald; Buffalo Herald, western New York; Cleveland Hungarian News, Ohio; Hungarian Herald, southern Ohio; Independence, Trenton, N. J.

THE NEW EUROPEAN EXPLOSION

There cannot be any controversy between Rumania and Hungary as to logic and justice, as far as Transylvania is concerned.

It is simply a question of disgorging one more piece of the Versailles (Trianon) spoils, and no matter how painful it may be for Rumania, eastern Europe will be a healthier place when Transylvania will be regained by Hungary.

Transylvania was part of Hungary (some time with some political autonomy, but always in economic unity) for over 1,000 years.

The population of Transylvania is mixed, solely because Rumanians were escaping into Hungary (Transylvania) during centuries of Turkish subjugation, in great numbers, and Hungary permitted them to develop their own language and culture unmolested throughout these same centuries.

As a reward for this tolerance, Rumanians suddenly discovered, about 50 years ago, that they were "oppressed," and have succeeded in "sudating" Transylvania. At the end of the World War, Clemenceau's imperialism was running amuck, and Hungary was dismembered to build the artificial Little Entente.

Were it otherwise, logic and sanity would still compel that Transylvania should be regained by Hungary, it is geographically a part of Hungary, and completely separated from Rumania proper by the steep Carpathian Mountains.

Hungary needs her wood, salt, and other minerals; Rumania does not. Transylvania needs the Hungarian market for these products, while they cannot stand the expensive haulage to Rumania over the Carpathian Mountains.

Hungary is culturally centuries ahead of Rumania, on a par with western Europe, and it was a monstrosity to subjugate over 2,000,000 Magyars to backward and 35-percent-illiterate Rumanians.

The origin of the present war may be found in the insane Versailles treaties, and the sooner the illogical, arbitrary boundaries will be adjusted, the nearer Europe will be to peace.

Reenact Provision of 1918 for Draftees Regarding Mining Claim Assessment Work

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK
OF ARIZONA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 6, 1940

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, when we reach section 9 in reading H. R. 10132 for amendments under the 5-minute rule, I propose to offer an amendment in line 4, on page 27, as follows: After the last semicolon, insert "section 500 of" before the words "article 5."

Mr. Speaker, the effect of this amendment will be to reenact into law by including in this bill a part of Public, No. 103, Sixty-fifth Congress, namely, section 501 of article V of the Soldiers and Sailors' Civil Relief Act, approved March 8, 1918.

I have taken this question up with the chairman and several of the ranking members of the committee and believe that the committee will probably accept it as a committee amendment. The Small Mine Operators Association of Arizona has suggested this amendment as a protection for any young men who may be called into the service under this measure for 1 year or more and who may have unpatented mining claims on which they would be otherwise required to do $100 worth of work.

It seems only fair to men called into training or service, since the bill aims to protect the draftees from certain other financial obligations, that the Government should make this provision when it costs the Government nothing and yet is a requirement of Federal law which does not deprive any creditor of anything of value. I trust that the amendment will be adopted and that the conferees will insist on its inclusion in the final enactment.

We Are in the War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW C. SCHIFFLER
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 6, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WHEELING (W. VA.) INTELLIGENCER

Mr. SCHIFFLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Wheeling Intelligencer, Wheeling, W. Va., of September 5:

[From the Wheeling (W. Va.) Intelligencer of September 5, 1940]

WE ARE IN THE WAR

To all intents and purposes the United States is at war with Germany. The exchange of destroyers with England for naval bases takes care of that. Only the refusal of Germany to recognize us as an enemy can stand in the way of our physical participation.

No thinking person can doubt that Germany now has ample cause to declare war or wage war on this country. Whether she does or not will depend solely upon whether or not Hitler thinks it would be wise to do so. But the provocation is there, and such consequences as flow from it will be upon our own heads.

This momentous step has been taken on the responsibility of a single man—President Franklin D. Roosevelt. It was taken without even the knowledge, much less the consent of Congress. It was taken in violation, not alone of the spirit of international law, but, in the judgment of this newspaper, in violation of the very letter of our own law.

No other President in the history of the Republic ever even remotely approached this tremendous assumption of authority. It climaxes a career chiefly notable for this quality. It is the culminating step in a campaign which, if not deliberately intended to involve us in foreign war, has at least been most effective in heading us that way. From the time of the intemperate quarantine speech at Chicago right down to the present moment, virtually every word and action of Mr. Roosevelt dealing with foreign wars has been provocative and disposed to establish this country as the definite foe of certain nations.

The cumulative result of all of this has been to bring us to the point where the decision as to the actual shedding of American blood has been taken out of the hands of Americans.

There are those who hold that we ought to be in the war; that England's fight is our fight; that if England loses we will have Hitler to fight alone. Very well. If this be true, then we should openly declare war in the regular way provided by the Constitution, and go into the thing wholeheartedly. Instead of that, we have officially proclaimed our neutrality, we have enacted legislation implementing this neutrality, we have declared our peaceable intentions, and have repeatedly rejected proposals which seemed to endanger our peace. Yet all the time, the President individually has been carrying us closer to the brink of war, while professing his own devotion to the cause of peace.

The whole thing has been a shocking manifestation of deceit and usurpation of authority. Even the legal opinion relied upon as justification for the exchange was arrived at by a trick interpretation of language. In 1917, Congress enacted a law which provided this among other things:

"During a war in which the United States is a neutral Nation, it shall be unlawful to send out of the jurisdiction of the United States any vessel built, armed, or equipped as a vessel of war, or converted from a private vessel into a vessel of war, with any intent or under any agreement or contract, written or oral, that such vessel shall be delivered to a belligerent nation."

What that language says to the normal reader is that it shall be unlawful to turn over any war vessel to a belligerent nation when this country is at peace. What Mr. Jackson says it means is that we shall not turn over to a belligerent any war vessel built for the purpose of being thus turned over. And so, he says, inasmuch as the destroyers in question were built for the use of this country many years before the present war broke out, it cannot be that they were built with the intent of having them delivered to England.

This is, we repeat, a far-fetched interpretation, one rendered for the sole purpose of giving the color of legality to an act that common sense dictates is illegal.

What the ultimate result will be, nobody can foresee. It seems clear, however, that the rejoicing in England over conclusion of the agreement is based more upon its implications than upon acquisition of half a hundred over-age destroyers. After all these vessels, which are classed as obsolete, will not mean the difference between victory and defeat for England. They will, as a matter of fact, exert relatively little influence in the war. But the implications of our release of these destroyers, and perhaps other weapons, are of tremendous importance. The British consider us now their ally. They naturally will look to us for more definite assistance than this. To them this is but the opening act, the first step in our active participation in the war at their side.

Maybe it is right and proper that we do go to war at England's side. Maybe Hitler is our common enemy. But in this country, Congress is supposed to decide such things.

Congress didn't deside this time. Mr. Roosevelt did.

Is that what we want in the United States?

Our National Government—What Is it? How Does It Function?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WRIGHT PATMAN
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 12, 1940

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, permission having been granted, I am inserting herewith 138 questions and answers on the National Government, and especially Congress, which I have prepared during the past 12 months by compiling 2 or 3 each week. They have been carefully checked and I believe that you will find them to be accurate. They are as follows:

1. Question. What is the National Government?

Answer. The National Government is divided into three branches—the legislative, executive, and judicial. It is headed by the President, who is the chief of the executive branch. Congress forms the legislative branch. The judicial branch, controlled by the Supreme Court, is the third branch. The preamble of the Constitution states its purpose:

We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

2. Question. What is the Congress?

Answer. The Congress of the United States is the legislative branch of the National Government, in effect the National Legislature, and consists of two branches—the Senate and the House of Representatives. Its existence, authority, and limitations are provided by the Constitution, article I, which begins as follows:

All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

3. Question. How long have we had a Congress?

Answer. The first Congress dated from March 4, 1789, to March 3, 1791. It had no practical existence, however, until April 30, 1789, when the presence of quorums in both Houses permitted complete organization. Travel was not as easy and fast then as now.

4. Question. What is a Congressman?

Answer. A Congressman is a Member of either the Senate or the House of Representatives. However, a Member of the Senate is usually referred to as a Senator and a Member of the House as a Congressman. The official title of a Member of the House is "Representative."

5. Question. How many Members constitute a Congress?

Answer. There are 96 Senators and 435 Representatives. Each State is entitled to elect two Senators and the number of Representatives depends upon the population of the State, with at least 1 to each State regardless of population. The apportionment is made after each decennial census.

6. Question. What oath is taken by Members of Congress?

Answer. The oath taken by both Senators and Representatives is as follows:

I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion, and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God.

This same oath is taken by all persons elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit, either in the civil, military, or naval service, except the President of the United States.

7. Question. What oath is taken by the President of the United States?

Answer. The President, before he enters on the execution of his office, shall take the following oath or affirmation:

I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will to the best of my ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States.

8. Question. How are Senators and Representatives elected?

Answer. By popular vote, on the day provided by law.

9. Question. What is the length of a Congress?

Answer. A Congress is elected for 2 years. It commences January 3, every odd-numbered year, and continues for 2 years. It has two regular sessions, the second one commencing January 3 of every even-numbered year and as many special sessions as are called by the President. The next Congress, the Seventy-seventh, will convene January 3, 1941.

10. Question. What is the length of the term of office of Senators and Representatives?

Answer. The Senators are elected for a term of 6 years and the Representatives for a term of 2 years. With only one-third of the Senators subject to reelection every 2 years, it is assured that there will always be a quorum in the Senate and at least 64 Senators will be experienced in national legislation in every Congress.

11. Question. What are the qualifications of a Member of the Senate?

Answer. A Member of the United States Senate must be at least 30 years of age, must have been a citizen of the United States for 9 years, and must be a resident of the State from which he is sent to Congress.

12. Question. What are the qualifications of a Representative in Congress?

Answer. A Member of the House of Representatives must be at least 25 years of age, must have been a United States citizen for at least 7 years, and must reside in the State—and usually, though not necessarily in the district—from which he is sent to Congress. (A President must be 35 years of age.)

13. Question. When does Congress meet?

Answer. Until the twentieth amendment was ratified the Congress met on the first Monday in December each year. This amendment is known as the "lame duck" amendment. It provides that Congress will meet the 3d day of January unless another date is provided by law.

14. Question. What is the twentieth amendment?

Answer. This is the so-called "lame duck" amendment, which changes the time for the beginning of the terms of the President, Vice President, and the Members of Congress. The term of the President and Vice President begins on January 20, and that of Members of Congress on January 3. It was adopted upon the ratification of the thirty-sixth State, January 23, 1933, and certified in effect on February 6, 1933.

15. Question. Why was a constitutional amendment necessary to change the date of the beginning of the terms of President, Vice President, and Members of Congress?

Answer. The Constitution fixes the terms of President and Vice President at 4 years, of Senators at 6 years, and of Representatives at 2 years. Any change of date would affect the terms of the incumbents. It was, therefore, necessary to amend the Constitution to make the change. This shortened the terms of President Franklin D. Roosevelt and Vice President John N. Garner and all Senators and Representatives.

16. Question. What about special, or extra, sessions of Congress?

Answer. Congress can be called into special session by the President at any time he thinks the interests of the country justify it. A session of Congress usually means that both the House and Senate are in session; however, the Senate may be called in extra session without the House to consider treaties, try impeachments, and confirm appointments, all of which are considered exclusively by the Senate. The impeachment must first be made by the House of Representatives before the Senate may act.

17. Question. How are the activities of Congress controlled?

Answer. The activities of Congress are largely controlled by political parties. The principal ones are the Democrats and Republicans. The party in power controls the Houses, and their committees by means of conferences and caucuses, which are private. The Democrats have a majority in both Houses at this time. Preceding the meeting of Congress, the Democratic Members of the House had a caucus and agreed on their candidates for all of the different offices of the House. When the House met to organize at the beginning of the present Congress, the names of the candidates were presented. The same thing was done by the Republicans. A vote was taken and the Democrats, all voting together, elected their ticket.

Democrats have a party caucus and may bind the Members to vote a certain way on a bill, if two-thirds vote in favor of being bound. However, a Member may recuse himself if he has a good and sufficient reason, such as having committed himself to a contrary position when seeking election or on constitutional questions.

The Republicans have a party conference instead of a caucus, and their Members cannot be bound except pertaining to matters of party organization.

18. Question. How are the rules of procedure determined?

Answer. The Constitution provides each House may determine the rules of its proceedings.

The parliamentary practice of the House of Representatives emanates from four sources: First, the Constitution of the United States; second, from Jefferson's Manual; third, from the rules adopted by the House itself from the beginning of its existence; and, fourth, from the decisions of the Speakers of the House and from decisions of the Chairmen of the Committee of the Whole.

Hinds' and Cannon's Precedents are used.

19. Question. Who presides in the Senate?

Answer. The Vice President of the United States presides in the Senate. He is referred to in that body as "Mr. President," because his other title is President of the Senate.

20. Question. Who presides in the House?

Answer. The Speaker of the House presides in the House. He is nominated at the party caucus. He is chosen in the manner described in answer to question No. 17.

21. Question. Does the President appear personally before Congress?

Answer. Only to deliver a message, usually at the beginning of each session of Congress, and such other messages as the President believes to be of sufficient importance to justify his personal appearances. Many messages are delivered in writing, and they are read to each House by the reading clerk. The President's office is in the White House, 1 mile away from the Capitol.

22. Question. Do the Members of the House have individual seats?

Answer. No. Formerly they did, but now any Member may sit any place he chooses. Those who are in charge of a bill on the Democratic side and on the Republican side have special places provided for them at tables, which are accessible to a public-address system. The Speaker of the House occupies a rostrum on the south side of the Hall and faces north. In the Hall to his right and on the east side the Democrats sit, and the Republicans occupy the side of the Hall to his left.

23. Question. Do the United States Senators have individual seats?

Answer. Yes. The Vice President, the Presiding Officer of the Senate, occupies a seat on the north side of the Senate Chamber and faces south. To his left the Republicans, Progressives, and Independents sit; and to his right the Democrats sit. Each Senator has an individual desk and chair.

24. Question. Has the House of Representatives always been composed of 435 Members?

Answer. No. Under the first apportionment in 1789, there were only 65 Members of the House. The number was increased each decade along with the increased population until, in 1840, the number of Members totaled 232; whereas, in 1880, the House increased to 332, and in 1910 increased to the present Membership of 435.

25. Question. Does the Federal Government or Congress determine a district line of a congressional district?

Answer. No. Congress apportions to each State the number of Representatives that may be elected from that State to the House of Representatives. If the legislature desires, it can divide the State up into the number of congressional districts equal to the number of Congressmen that may be elected from that State. After each decennial census, the legislature of a State, which is given an increase in representation, usually redistricts the State. However, if the State is not redistricted and there is an increase in representation, the increase will be made up from the State at large. In other words, Texas has 21 Congressmen at this time. If the census that has been taken this year discloses that Texas is entitled to another Member of Congress and is given the increased apportionment, the Texas Legislature will likely change the congressional district lines in Texas, but if for any reason it does not, the additional Member will run at large from the entire State, and will be known as a Congressman at large.

26. Question. What is the population of the average congressional district?

Answer. Under the census of 1910, each Congressman represented an average of 194,182 people, as compared with 279,712 for the census of 1930. Under the recent census, in view of a law which will keep the House membership at 435, each Member of the House will represent approximately 304,000 people.

27. Question. Do all congressional districts have approximately the same population?

Answer. Theoretically, they should have, but in practice they do not. It is due, in part, to the fact that congressional districts usually follow county lines, town lines, or ward lines in cities, so that the population cannot, therefore, be divided with exactness.

28. Question. What is "gerrymandering"?

Answer. The practice was named for Vice President Elbridge Gerry, its inventor. If the Republicans happen to control the legislature of a State when a redistricting bill is pending, they crowd as many of the Republican voters into one district as they can and vice versa. This results in what are termed "shoe-string districts," this term having been applied first to certain districts in Mississippi following the Reconstruction Period. At one time, a district in Missouri extended in a narrow line through the State from one border to the other. Today a study of the map showing congressional district lines reveals some peculiar formations representing the exigencies of politics. In one district in North Carolina, "gerrymandering" resulted in an odd formation resembling the salamander of Gerry's time, from which was derived in the Old Bay State the paraphrase "gerrymander." The Federal reapportionment law requires districts to be compact and composed of contiguous territory, but as to the compactness, the law is honored in some States more in the breach than in the observance. For instance, Congressman SAMUEL DICKSTEIN of the twelfth district in New York City, only has 90,671 people in his district, whereas Congressman DONALD O'TOOLE, of the eighth district of New York, has 799,407 people in his district.

29. Question. How many Members has each State in the House and Senate?

Answer. Each State has two Senators and the following number of Representatives (the figures in parentheses represent the number of Democrats from each State, the other figures, or the first ones, represent the total number of Representatives in each State): State—Alabama, 9 (9); Arizona, 1 (1); Arkansas, 7 (7); California, 20 (12); Colorado, 4 (3); Connecticut, 6 (2); Delaware, 1 (0); Florida, 5 (5); Georgia, 10 (10); Idaho, 2 (1); Illinois, 27 (17); Indiana, 12 (5); Iowa, 9 (2); Kansas, 7 (1); Kentucky, 9 (8); Louisiana, 8 (8); Maine, 3 (0); Maryland, 6 (6); Massachusetts, 15 (5); Michigan, 17 (5); Minnesota, 9 (1); Mississippi, 7 (7); Missouri, 13 (12); Montana, 2 (1); Nebraska, 5 (2); Nevada, 1 (1); New Hampshire, 2 (0); New Jersey, 14 (3); New Mexico, 1 (1); New York, 45 (25); North Carolina, 11 (11); North Dakota, 2 (0); Ohio, 24 (8); Oklahoma, 9 (9); Oregon, 3 (1); Pennsylvania, 34 (15); Rhode Island, 2 (0); South Carolina, 6 (6); South Dakota, 2 (0); Tennessee, 9 (7); Texas, 21 (21); Utah, 2 (2); Vermont, 1 (0); Virginia, 9 (9); Washington, 6 (6); West Virginia, 6 (5); Wisconsin, 10 (0); Wyoming, 1 (0); total, 435.

Classification by political parties in House in 1940: Democrats, 262; Republicans, 168; Progressives, 2; Farm Labor, 1; American Labor, 1; vacant, 1; total, 435.

Classification by political parties in Senate in 1940: Democrats, 69; Republicans, 23; Progressive, 1; Farm Labor, 2; Independent, 1; total, 96.

Senators whose present terms of service expire in 1941—32 Senators in this group: Democrats, 23; Republicans, 7; Progressive, 1; Farmer-Labor, 1.

30. Question. When Congress passes a reapportionment act, are the States compelled to divide themselves into representative districts?

Answer. No. They are not compelled, although nearly all do so. In the early years of the Republic most States elected all their Representatives at large. In the 1932 election, Virginia, Kentucky, Missouri, and Minnesota having suffered losses in Members in the apportionment, elected their Members en bloc, which resulted in solid delegations of one party being chosen, except in the case of Minnesota, and in effecting the defeat of many a Member who had long been in Congress from a district strongly attached to its party. Some States, rather than redistrict, in the event of being allotted larger memberships, elect the additional Member or Members at large—New York electing two that way in 1932. Of course, where a loss has occurred, there must be a redistricting or the Members be elected at large.

31. Question. When Congress is in session what time of the day does the House meet?

Answer. The House meets every day at 12 noon when it is in session. It usually remains in session until 5 or 6 o'clock in the afternoon. The Senate also meets at noon—12—each day it is in session.

32. Question. How is a bill presented to the House for consideration?

Answer. It is presented by the committee that has conducted hearings on the bill. If, however, a committee does not give consideration to a bill, the Member can, by obtaining the signatures of 218 Members, or a majority of the Members of the House, force consideration of a bill in the House of Representatives. This is a very rare proceeding, but it has been resorted to in a few cases.

33. Question. How many standing committees of the House, and name them?

Answer. There are 47 standing committees of the House. Each committee has a chairman and is composed of Democrats and Republicans. If the House is divided by a ratio of twice as many Democrats as there are Republicans, the committees will have twice as many Democrats on them as Republicans. In other words, the number of members, Republicans or Democrats, on a committee bears a direct ratio to the number of Democrats and Republicans in the House. The names of the committees are (the figures in parentheses indicate the number of members on each committee): Accounts (11); Agriculture (26); Appropriations (40); Banking and Currency (25); Census (21); Civil Service (21); Claims (21); Coinage, Weights, and Measures (21); Disposition of Executive Papers (2); District of Columbia (21); Education (21); Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress (13); Elections No. 1, No. 2, and No. 3 (9 each); Enrolled Bills (7); Expenditures in the Executive Departments (21); Flood Control (21); Foreign Affairs (25); Immigration and Naturalization (22); Indian Affairs (22); Insular Affairs (22); Interstate and Foreign Commerce (25); Invalid Pensions (21); Irrigation and Reclamation (21); Judiciary (26); Labor (21); Library (5); Memorials (3); Merchant Marine and Fisheries (23); Military Affairs (27); Mines and Mining (22); Naval Affairs (27); Patents (21); Pensions (21); Post Office and Post Roads (25); Printing (3); Public Buildings and Grounds (21); Public Lands (22); Revision of the Laws (13); Rivers and Harbors (27); Roads (22); Rules (14); Territories (23); War Claims (21); Ways and Means (25); World War Veterans' Legislation (21).

34. Question. What are the names of the standing committees of the Senate?

Answer. (The number in parentheses immediately following indicates the number of members on that committee): Agriculture and Forestry (20); Appropriations (24); Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate (4); Banking and Currency (20); Civil Service (10); Claims (12); Commerce (20); District of Columbia (15); Education and Labor (13); Enrolled Bills (3); Expenditures in the Executive Departments (7); Finance (21); Foreign Relations (23); Immigration (14); Indian Affairs (14); Interoceanic Canals (8); Interstate Commerce (21); Irrigation and Reclamation (17); Judiciary (18); Library (10); Manufactures (13); Military Affairs (18); Mines and Mining (13); Naval Affairs (17); Patents (7); Pensions (11); Post Offices and Post Roads (19); Printing (7); Privileges and Elections (17); Public Buildings and Grounds (14); Public Lands and Surveys (15); Rules (13); Territories and Insular Affairs (17).

35. Question. Who are the officers of the House?

Answer: The present officers of the House are: William B. Bankhead, Speaker; Lewis Deschler, Parliamentarian; Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., chaplain; Sam Rayburn, majority floor leader; Joseph W. Martin, Jr., minority floor leader; South Trimble, Clerk; Kenneth Romney, Sergeant at Arms; Joseph J. Sinnott, doorkeeper; and Finis E. Scott, postmaster. Majority and minority leaders are not officially officers of the House or Senate, but they have been recognized as officers of the House through appropriations made by Congress to provide for their extra office expense. Neither House can perform properly and efficiently without a good parliamentarian, and each House has the best.

36. Question. Who are the officers of the Senate?

Answer. The present officers of the Senate are: John N. Garner, President of the Senate; Charles L. Watkins, Parliamentarian; Rev. ZeBarney Thorne Phillips, D. D., LL. D., S. T. D., chaplain; Alben W. Barkley, majority leader; Charles L. McNary, minority leader; Edwin Alexander Halsey, Secretary; Chesley W. Jurney, Sergeant at Arms; and Jack W. Gates, postmaster.

37. Question. What are the most important committees of the House?

Answer. All committees of the House are important, but the "big six" may be listed as Appropriations, Banking and Currency, Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Judiciary, Rules, and Ways and Means.

There are 11 exclusive and major committees of the House, including these 6, and Agriculture, Foreign Affairs, Military Affairs, Naval Affairs, and Post Office and Post Roads. An exclusive committee takes up all the time that a Member has at his disposal after attending the sessions of the House and conducting his office.

38. Question. How are the Members of the standing committees of the House selected?

Answer. The Democrats at a caucus preceding the meeting of Congress nominate their Members for the vacancies that they are entitled to fill on the Ways and Means Committee. These recommendations are then presented to the House and adopted. The Democratic Members of the Ways and Means Committee act as a Committee on Committees for the purpose of nominating the Democratic Members to fill the vacancies on the other standing committees of the House. The recommendations of this committee are presented to and adopted by the House.

The Republicans in the House have a Committee on Committees to make recommendations, which are adopted by the House, to fill vacancies that they are entitled to fill.

39. Question. What arrangements are made for a meeting of a standing committee of the House?

Answer. Each committee has a large committee room, its size and accommodations depending upon the importance of the committee. Each of the major committees of the House has a large meeting room that is equal to the size of the average United States district courtroom. The members of the committee have individual seats in a semicircle behind individual desks. A witness appearing before this committee in support of or in opposition to a bill is usually given time to make his own statement and then the committee members are privileged to cross-examine him. The usual time of meeting is 10 o'clock in the morning and sometimes in the afternoon and night when the House is not in session. The power and influence of a Member depends partly upon his committee assignment. The seniority rule generally obtains, that is, Members of long service work up to chairmanship and ranking positions, while the new Member must start at the foot of a committee.

40. Question. Why are congressional standing committees necessary?

Answer. Congress has so many Members it is necessary for each House to organize committees to study and act upon bills before they are considered on the floor of the House or Senate. Each committee has a chairman as presiding officer and a clerk to keep the records. Committees have often been called small models of the House and Senate. Committees hear witnesses for and against bills, which neither the House nor the Senate can do.

41. Question. How does a bill reach the proper committee for consideration?

Answer. The Member drops the bill "in the hopper," which is a box on the Speaker's desk, when the House is in session. The Parliamentarian examines the bill and determines which committee it should be referred to and so indicates. The bill is then numbered and sent to the Government Printing Office for printing. All bills are printed and a copy of any pending bill may be obtained upon request. The committee receives the printed copies of the bill the next morning after it is introduced, as the bills and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD are printed at night.

42. Question. How can any citizen get his views considered by Congress?

Answer. The Constitution of the United States provides that "Congress shall make no law respecting * * * the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government of a redress of grievances." A special place is set aside in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD each day for petitions which may be filed by a Member and referred to the appropriate committee for consideration. The notation in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD recites the name of the Member offering the petition, the name of the one sending it to him, and a brief summary of what the petition contains.

43. Question. Are all bills heard by the committees?

Answer. No. It is the view of many chairman of committees that any Member who insists on a hearing on any bill should have it, but all chairman of committees do not entertain this view.

44. Question. What are the stages of a bill of the House?

Answer. 1. Introduction.

By a Member by placing the bill "in the hopper," a small brown box on the Speaker's chair. A Member sometimes introduces a petition only, leaving to the committee the drawing of a bill, such a petition referred to a committee having jurisdiction of the subject giving authority to originate a bill. Sometimes communications addressed to the House from the executive departments or from other sources are referred to committees by the Speaker and give authority for the committees to originate bills. Messages from the President also are referred by the Speaker or the House and give jurisdiction to the committees receiving them to originate bills.

2. Reference to a standing or select committee.

Public bills are referred under direction of the Speaker; private bills are indorsed with the names of the committees to which they go under the rule by the Members introducing them. Senate bills are referred under direction of the Speaker. A bill is numbered and printed when referred.

The average bill dies in the committee. Only those bills of importance are considered; hundreds die in committee to every bill considered and reported. The committee invites witnesses to testify on the bill, including the outstanding experts on the subject covered by the bill. This testimony, often taking weeks and amounting to several volumes when published, is necessary to work out the fine points in the proposed legislation. After completing committee hearings a vote is taken, and the bill, if approved, is reported to the House of Representatives with the recommendation that it "do pass." The House usually abides by the committee decision, but reserves the right to amend, approve, or reject the bill as reported.

3. Reported from the committee.

Committees having leave to report at any time make their reports from the floor; other committees make their reports by laying them on the Clerk's table informally. The bill and the report are printed when reported. A written report is made to the House and it often occurs that a few of the Members will file minority views against the bill in which their objections are stated.

4. Placed on the calendar.

Occasionally a privileged bill is considered when reported, but usually it is placed with the unprivileged bills on the calendar where it belongs under the rule by direction of the Speaker.

5. Consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Public bills which do not raise revenue or make or authorize appropriations of money or property do not go through this stage. All other bills are considered in Committee of the Whole. The stages of consideration in Committee of the Whole are: General debate; reading for amendment under the 5-minute rule; order to lay aside with a favorable recommendation, or to rise and report; reporting of to the House.

One hundred Members constitute a quorum in the Committee of the Whole. No record vote can be taken in the Committee of the Whole. The presiding officer is a chairman selected by the Speaker.

When a bill is taken up in the House for consideration, every Member of the House is furnished a printed copy of the committee hearings which disclose all the testimony and other information that the committee considered in its deliberations. A record very much like a court record is made by the committee.

The first standing committees were adopted in 1803. Before 1803 every bill was discussed in the Committee of the Whole House and then referred to a select committee for the bill agreed upon to be drafted.

6. Reading a second time in the House.

Bills not requiring consideration in Committee of the Whole are read a second time in full, after which they are open to debate and amendment in any part. Bills considered in Committee of the Whole are read a second time in full in that Committee and when reported out, with or without amendments, are not read in full again, but are subject to further debate or amendment in the House unless the previous question is ordered at once.

7. What is the previous question?

If a motion for the previous question is made and it is ordered by a majority of the Members voting, if a quorum be present, it has the effect of cutting off all debate and bringing the House to a direct vote upon the immediate question or questions on which it has been asked and ordered.

8. Engrossment and third reading.

The question on House bills is taken on ordering the engrossment and third reading at one vote. If decided in the affirmative, the reading a third time usually takes place at once, by title. But any Member may demand the reading in full of the engrossed copy, in which case the bill is laid aside until it can be engrossed. Senate bills come to the House in engrossed form, and the question is put on third reading alone. When the question on engrossment and third reading of a House bill or third reading of a Senate bill is decided in the negative the bill is lost as much as if defeated on the final passage. The question on engrossment and third reading is not made from the floor, but is put by the Speaker as a matter of course.

9. Passage.

The question on the passage of a bill is put by the Speaker as a matter of course, without awaiting a motion from the floor.

10. Transmission to the Senate by message.

11. Consideration by the Senate.

In the Senate, House bills are usually referred to committees for consideration and report, after which they have their several readings, with opportunities for debate and amendment. The same procedure takes place in the House as to bills sent from the Senate. It often happens that the bill loses all resemblance to the House version of the bill before it emerges from the Senate. These variations between the House and Senate views of the bill must be compromised in the conference committee.

12. Return of, from the Senate without amendments.

If the Senate passes a House bill without amendment it returns it to the House, where it is at once enrolled on parchment for signature. A bill thus passed without amendment goes into possession of the Clerk, and is not laid before the House prior to enrollment. If the Senate rejects a House bill the House is informed. Similar procedure occurs when the House passes a Senate bill without amendment.

13. Return of, from the Senate with amendments.

House bills returned with Senate amendments go to the Speaker's table. If any Senate amendment requires consideration in Committee of the Whole the bill is referred by the Speaker informally to the standing committee having jurisdiction, and when that committee reports the bill with recommendations it is referred to Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, to be there considered and reported to the House itself. When no Senate amendment requires consideration in Committee of the Whole the bills come before the House directly from the Speaker's table.

14. Consideration of Senate amendments by the House.

When a bill with Senate amendments comes before the House, the House takes up each amendment by itself and may vote to agree to it, agree to it with an amendment, or disagree to it. If it disagrees it may ask a conference with the Senate or may send notice of its disagreement, leaving it to the Senate to recede or insist and ask the conference.

15. Settlement of differences by conference.

When disagreements are referred to conference, the managers embody their settlement in a report, which is acted on by each House as a whole. When this report is agreed to the bill is finally passed, and is at once enrolled for signature.

Every major law represents a compromise of view or sacrifice of opinion on the part of practically every Member of the two bodies. Members must give and take, they must compromise. Otherwise, such a large number could not legislate.

16. Enrollment on parchment.

The House in which a bill originates enrolls it.

17. Examination by the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

While the Committee on Enrolled Bills is described as a joint committee, each branch acts independently. The chairman of each branch affixes to the bills examined a certificate that the bill has been found truly enrolled.

18. Signing by the Speaker and President of the Senate.

The enrolled bill is first laid before the House of Representatives and signed by the Speaker, whether it be a House or Senate bill, after which it is transmitted to the Senate and signed by the president of that body.

19. Transmittal to the President of the United States.

The chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills for each House carries the bills from his House to the President. In the House of Representatives a report of the bills taken to the President each day is made to the House and entered on its Journal.

20. Approval by the President.

If the President approve, he does so with his signature.

21. Disapproval by the President.

When the President disapproves a bill he returns it to the House in which it originated, with a message stating that he disapproves, and giving his reasons therefor. The President, before he signs or disapproves a bill, refers it to the department affected for recommendation.

The President may veto the bill, sign it and thereby convert it into law, or may refuse to sign it. If he takes no action on the bill, it becomes law without his signature after 10 days have passed, excluding Sundays. If he does not sign it and the Congress has adjourned, the bill is pocket-vetoed after the expiration of 10 days. For many years some Members of Congress believed that the pocket veto did not kill a bill, but the Supreme Court decided in the famous Pocket Veto Case (279 U. S. 655) in 1929 that all such bills are dead.

22. Action on, when returned disapproved.

The House to which a disapproved bill is returned has the message read and spread on its Journal. It may then consider at once the question of passing the bill notwithstanding the President's objections, or may postpone to a day certain, or refer to a committee for examination. The vote on passing the bill notwithstanding the President's objections must be carried by two-thirds on a roll call vote. If the bill fails to pass in the House to which it is returned, it remains there; but if it passes, it is sent to the other House for action.

23. Filing with the Secretary of State.

When approved by the President, a bill is deposited in the office of the Secretary of State; and when the two Houses have passed a bill notwithstanding the President's objections, the presiding officer of the House which acts on it last transmits it to the Secretary of State.

45. Question. Are many bills introduced at each Congress?

Answer. During this, the Seventy-sixth Congress, which convened January 3, 1939, to date, 15,717 bills and resolutions have been introduced in the Senate and House. Committees of the House and Senate have favorably reported 2,934 of the bills and resolutions favorably. To date 1,432 of these bills and resolutions have become laws. Many of them, however, are private laws, which affect individuals. The others are public laws affecting the Nation at large. On September 7, 1940, there were pending on the House Calendar 210 bills and resolutions and on the Senate Calendar 189, making a total of 399.

The largest number of bills introduced during one Congress was 33,015, in the Sixty-first Congress, 1909–1911. Of that number 810 were passed and became law—public and private.

The largest number of laws passed during any Congress was 6,940, during the Fifty-ninth Congress, 1905–1907—25,897 bills were introduced.

46. Question. What is a veto?

Answer. The word "veto" was derived from the Latin and means "I forbid."

The President is authorized by the Constitution to refuse his assent to a bill presented by Congress, if for any reason he disapproves it. He writes a veto message and sends it with the bill back to the body from which it came.

47. Question. Are many bills vetoed?

Answer. Not very many. During the 8 years President Wilson was President he vetoed 33 bills; President Harding vetoed 5; President Coolidge, 20, and President Hoover, 20. President Cleveland vetoed more bills before President Franklin D. Roosevelt than any other President, but the bills were mostly private pension bills.

During President Cleveland's two terms, he vetoed 471 bills (128 of these were pocket vetoes). During President Franklin D. Roosevelt's terms of office, he has vetoed 473 bills (239 of them being pocket vetoes).

48. Question. Are bills often passed over the President's veto?

Answer. Not very often. Bills passed over Presidential vetoes are usually of interest to a great many people over all the United States and consequently brought prominently to the attention of many Members.

During President Wilson's administration three bills were passed over his veto. They were:

1. Repeal of the daylight saving law.
2. The Volstead Act.
3. To cease enlistments in the Army.

Four bills were passed over President Coolidge's veto. They were:

1. The so-called bonus or adjusted-compensation bill.
2. The emergency officers' retirement bill.
3. The bill to provide a differential in pay for night work in the postal service.
4. Granting allowances to fourth-class postmasters for light, rent, fuel, and equipment.

President Hoover had three bills passed over his veto:

1. Spanish-American War pension increase.
2. Philippine independence.
3. Increase of the loan basis of adjusted-service certificates.

49. Question. Has President Roosevelt's veto been overridden in many instances?

Answer. Comparatively few. During his 7 years as President, he has vetoed 473 bills. Seven bills have been passed over his veto, by the House and the Senate overriding his veto by a two-thirds majority in each House. They all relate to either veterans or farmers, except one bill involving bridges over navigable streams. The first involved the independent offices appropriation bill in 1933, wherein Congress thought that veterans and their dependents should not have their compensation so drastically reduced. The second was the so-called bonus bill, which he expected to be passed over his veto, but he could not consistently sign it. The third related to giving veterans 5 more years in which to apply for term insurance. The fourth and fifth reduced interest rates on Federal land bank loans to 3½ percent and commissioners' loans to 4 percent. The sixth granted subsistence allowance and travel pay to Spanish-American War veterans, and the seventh related to constructing railroad bridges over navigable streams.

50. Question. What are the salaries of the Representatives and Senators in Congress?

Answer. Representatives and Senators receive the same pay, $10,000 a year each.

51. Question. What allowances do they have to assist them in serving their constituents?

Answer. Each Representative is allowed $200 a year for stationery and office supplies and an allowance of $6,500 a year for a secretary and other clerical help, but no one person can receive more than $3,900 per year. The Senators are allowed a much greater allowance for all these purposes, but with the same limitation that no one person can receive more than $3,900 a year. Both Senators and Representatives are allowed 20 cents a mile for travel allowance.

52. Question. Do Representatives use all their $200 for supplies and stationery?

Answer. All of them use at least that much and many of them spend twice that much in 1 month. It depends upon how active a Member is.

53. Question. Why is 20 cents a mile allowed to Members for travel allowance instead of the 3 cents or 3½ cents per mile charged by the railroad companies?

Answer. Most Members have families. Congress is usually in session about 6 or 7 months during the year. They must leave their homes and move to Washington for the session and then move back. It is intended for the family as well as the Member and is paid only one time a year or for a session, whereas, the average Member makes several trips to and from Washington a year. This has especially been true during the recent years when local constituents called upon their Congressmen to help them with matters before the Department of Agriculture, Veterans' Administration, Public Works Administration, Work Projects Administration, Social Security Board, National Youth Administration, and many other boards and commissions. It pleases a Member very much to know that he is really doing something worth while for the people he has the honor to represent and very few of them spare any expense in doing it.

54. Question. Do Members of Congress become wealthy by reason of their service?

Answer. Members do not accumulate very much, if anything, by reason of their service. Representatives every 2 years and Senators every 6 years are usually called upon to spend quite sizable sums for campaign expenses. In addition, living expenses in Washington are high. Besides a home must be maintained in the District.

55. Question. What is the salary of the President of the United States?

Answer. The President is allowed $75,000 per year salary, which cannot under a constitutional provision be increased or decreased during his term of office. He is also allowed $25,000 a year for traveling and official entertainment expenses, which is invariably used for that purpose. The first President, George Washington, said that no conscientious, aggressive public official greatly increased his wealth by reason of his official office because the temptation to spend it in properly serving the people was too great.

56. Question. What is the salary of the Vice President and members of the Cabinet?

Answer. The Vice President and members of the Cabinet receive compensation of $15,000 a year.

57. Question. In the event of the death, resignation, or inability of both the President and the Vice President, what would be the order of succession to the Presidency?

Answer:

1. Secretary of State (Cordell Hull).
2. Secretary of the Treasury (Henry Morgenthau, Jr.).
3. Secretary of War (Henry L. Stimson, who succeeded Harry H. Woodring).
4. Attorney General (Robert H. Jackson, who succeeded Justice Frank Murphy).
5. Postmaster General (Frank C. Walker, who succeeded James A. Farley).
6. Secretary of the Navy (Frank Knox, who succeeded Charles Edison).
7. Secretary of the Interior (Harold L. Ickes).

The law of January 19, 1886, giving the order of succession, makes no mention of Agriculture (Claude R. Wickard, who succeeded Henry A. Wallace), Commerce (Jesse H. Jones, who succeeded Harry Hopkins), and Labor (Miss Frances Perkins). Therefore, neither could succeed to the Presidency.

58. Question. What are the duties of the Speaker of the House?

Answer. He presides over the House, appoints the Chairman to preside over the Committees of the Whole, appoints all special or select committees, appoints conference committees, has the power of recognition of Members, makes many important rulings and decisions in the House. The Speaker may vote, but usually does not except in case of tie. He may appoint a Speaker pro tempore but not for more than 3 days at a time without the consent of the House. The Speaker and the majority leader determine administration policies in the House, often confer with the President, and are regarded as spokesman for the administration in power.

59. Question. What are the duties of a Member of Congress?

Answer. They are many and manifold. He should study legislation and attend the meetings of his House. He should listen to a good deal of the debates, but not all of them by any means. Many Members are kept in committee meetings many hours of many days of every session. The average Member develops a large office business. This is particularly true of western Members. Their constituency is far away from Washington, so many problems are referred to the Congressman for assistance. The Members get a vast amount of mail. This requires much study, dictation of replies, and often visits to different executive departments downtown. The departments are far away and often far apart. Many ex-service men bring their problems to their Congressman, and he is always glad to help them out when and wherever he can, although he has not the power always to do as much as he would like.

A Member will get a thousand letters or maybe several thousand letters in a session from citizens advocating or opposing proposed legislation. Usually a Congressman answers every letter, though he cannot tell everybody what he thinks about every bill that has been introduced. He must await development through committee hearings and give thought to those measures that are being brought forward by favorable committee action.

60. Question. Is legislation much influenced by oratory?

Answer. Not much. The real work and the most effective work for or against a bill is in committee. The House is a forum for debate upon the merits of the many bills. Very few bills that are brought up in the House for action under general or special rules are defeated. I think more than 95 percent of bills thus brought up are passed, despite the forensic display of oratory that may be directed against them, and usually is by the minority or the opposition. Hardly one amendment in forty offered to bills on the floor is adopted unless offered or accepted by the committee reporting out the bill up for consideration.

Legislation enacted by any Congress is largely that originating with or sponsored by the majority party. Important measures brought up have had thorough scrutiny and a favorable report by a well-organized committee. They have probably had strong backing from the country. Some have had the approval of the steering committee and some have been reported out by the Rules Committee. Such measures are on the program for passage, and long debates and much oratory cannot defeat them. On the other hand, bills that are not slated for passage do not often get up for action in the House. There are exceptions when a cause is sold to the country and the people demand it; for example, so-called veterans' bonus bill.

Committee responsibility is great and committee action influential. On most amendments and on most bills a majority of the Members vote most of the time with the committee—and it is difficult to break into that influence even with fine, fervid oratory.

61. Question. What is meant by the "seniority rule"?

Answer. It is a rule whereby the member of a committee who has served longest on the majority side becomes chairman and otherwise acquires additional influence. Members are ranked from the chairmanship according to length of service. It takes time for one to become familiar with the rules of the House and to receive sufficient recognition to enable him to be effective.

Champ Clark, who served in the House from Missouri 26 years and was elected Speaker four times, once said:

> A man has to learn to be a Congressman just as he has to learn to be a blacksmith, a carpenter, a farmer, an engineer, a lawyer, or a doctor. A new Congressman must begin at the foot of the class and spell up. Of course, the more brains, tact, energy, courage, and industry he has, the quicker he will get up.

The seniority rule allows Members who have long service to hold positions of leadership and power in the House. The rules in Congress are as valuable to a Member as a carpenter's tools are to the carpenter, since they are the only tools he has to work with. Shrewd parliamentarians are often able to expedite or block the passage of legislation. Many rules and customs, including the seniority rule, seem unreasonable to many people, but they have grown up through the method of trial and error over a period of 150 years, and there is no likelihood of substantial changes being made during our lifetime.

The gentleman from Texas, Congressman MARVIN JONES, recently stated that—

> Under any system ability plus experience is better than ability without experience.

62. Question. What are the duties of the whip of the House?

Answer. The whip keeps track of all important political legislation and endeavors to have all members of his party present when important measures are to be voted upon. When the vote is likely to be close he checks up, finds out who is out of the city, and advises absentees by wire of the important measures coming up.

63. Question. What is a party leader?

Answer. There is a majority leader and a minority leader. In talks on the floor we do not refer to Democrats and Republicans usually. It is more dignified, it seems, to refer to the majority and the minority. The majority leader now, the Honorable SAM RAYBURN, of Texas, is a Democrat; and the minority leader, the Honorable JOE MARTIN, of Massachusetts, is a Republican. The majority leader has the more influence, of course, since he has the majority of the membership back of him.

The leader is all the title implies. He leads in party debate. In cooperation with the Speaker, he brings forward party programs and policies. His advocacy of or opposition to proposed legislation indicates the party preference. The majority leader has much control over what comes up and when, of the legislative program from week to week. When he makes a motion it is almost always carried. He usually makes the motion to adjourn, and it always carries. If someone else, not authorized to do so, makes a motion to adjourn it is nearly always defeated.

64. Question. How are votes taken?

Answer. Four different ways. Usually the Speaker puts the question in this form: "As many as are in favor [of the motion] say 'Aye,' " and then, "as many as are opposed say 'No.' " In most instances the vote taken is decisive enough to satisfy. But if the Speaker is in doubt, or if it sounds close, any Member may ask for a division. In this case the Speaker asks those in favor to stand up and be counted. Then those opposed to the proposition to stand up and be counted. The Speaker does the counting and announces the result. But if he is still in doubt, or if a demand is made by one-fifth of a quorum—that is, 20 in the Committee of the Whole or 44 in the House—tellers are ordered. The Speaker appoints 1 gentleman on each side of the question to make the count. The 2 tellers take their place at the head of the center aisle. All Members favoring the proposition walk through between the tellers and are counted. Then those opposed walk through and are counted. This vote settles most questions.

But a roll call may be demanded by any Member on any question in the House, and if supported by one-fifth of those present it is ordered. This privilege is guaranteed by the Constitution. The Clerk reads the names of the whole membership, and as his or her name is called the Member answers "aye" or "no." The names of those not voting the first time are read a second time, so that all Members in corridors, cloakrooms, committee rooms, or offices, who have been notified of a roll call by signal bells, may come in and vote.

Roll calls are ordered sometimes to get a full vote on a measure, because of a lack of a quorum, sometimes because Members want to be on record on a measure, and sometimes to put the other side on record against the measure for imaginary political advantage. The roll calls are published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and are sometimes quoted to a Member's advantage or disadvantage, as the case may be.

Many bills of lesser importance and some of greater importance are passed without a roll call. This can be done if a quorum is present when the vote is taken and as many as one-fifth of those present do not demand a roll call. This is often done to save time and sometimes to save Members the embarrassment of having to be recorded for or against a measure.

65. Question. What is a quorum?

Answer. Everybody who ever attended a literary society knows that it requires a quorum to do business. In the House of Representatives a quorum is a majority of the membership. When there are no vacancies in the membership a quorum is 218. There are usually a few vacancies—Members who have died or have resigned and their places yet unfilled. So an actual quorum is usually a little under that figure. Much business is transacted without a quorum. But no business of any character, except to adjourn, can be transacted without a quorum present if any Member objects. All any Member has to do to get a full House is to arise, address the Speaker, and make the point of order that "no quorum is present." The Speaker says, "The Chair will count." If he cannot count a quorum present, the doors are closed, the bells are rung in the corridors and House Office Buildings, and the roll is called. This usually produces a quorum and business proceeds.

66. Question. Were political parties contemplated under the Constitution?

Answer. The framers of the Constitution tried to avoid having political parties control the election of a President. They provided that each State should choose as many electors as it has Congressmen and Senators by whatever method the legislature might decide. These electors then were to select the President and the Vice President.

In the first election in 1789 there were no parties because everybody turned to Washington. He favored Adams for Vice President, so Adams was chosen. The second election in 1792 brought the same result.

67. Question. What was the result of the bitter fight between Adams and Jefferson?

Answer. When Washington retired, a bitter fight developed immediately between Adams and Jefferson. The Adams men called Jefferson a demagogue. The Jefferson followers denounced Adams as a kingly despot without sympathy for the people.

Adams won by 71 to 68, because two electors from Jefferson States voted for Adams. Virginia's vote was, Jefferson 20 and Adams 1. North Carolina's vote was, Jefferson 11 and Adams 1.

Both Virginia and North Carolina were strong for Jefferson, but there was only one set of electors in each State. Electors were not pledged, but they were expected to vote for the man who was most popular in their respective States.

68. Question. What caused the formation of political parties?

Answer. The independent action of these two electors in 1796 brought two lists of party candidates for electors in the next election. Thus that provision of the Constitution, which was intended to prevent political parties, actually caused the formation of political parties. Instead of the electors choosing our Presidents, the electors have been little more than puppets to register the vote of the people of their State.

Since then, all electors have been pledged to the Presidential candidate of their respective parties. The voters know the candidates. So in effect the people elect our Presidents, regardless of the constitutional provision that requires them to vote for electors.

69. Question. How did the congressional caucus originate?

Answer. In 1800 both the Adams men and the Jefferson men held meetings of Members of Congress to plan the campaign. This was called the congressional caucus. Adams and Pinckney were the Federalist candidates and Jefferson and Burr the Republican candidates. The Republican Party then became the Democratic Party in the days of Jackson. The present Republican Party was not created until 1856. At first the Jackson men called themselves Democratic Republicans, and after Jackson became President, they used the term "Democratic."

70. Question. How did President Andrew Jackson revolutionize the Presidency?

Answer. As President he revolutionized the method of administering the Government. It has been said that "To the victor belongs the spoils" as a slogan was not literally put into effect until Taylor became President. Jackson selected personal advisers in addition to his Cabinet. They were called the Kitchen Cabinet, because he was so familiar and informal with them.

Theodore Roosevelt 75 years later had a small crowd of advisers from certain departments in addition to his regular Cabinet. They were called the Tennis Cabinet, because most of them were tennis players. Under President Franklin D. Roosevelt they are referred to as the "brain trust."

71. Question. Who started national conventions and why?

Answer. In 1832 Jackson called the first national political convention at Baltimore to nominate candidates for President and Vice President on the Democratic ticket. For several years the congressional caucus had been unpopular. Jackson knew, too, that he could not control the Congressmen, so he called a national convention to be made up of delegates to this convention who were to come straight from the people. He said the people should choose the delegates to nominate their candidates for President. This made the President the nominee of the people instead of the nominee of the Congressmen. Ever since that convention, political parties have nominated all our Presidents by that method.

72. Question. When will the people pass on the nominee for President of the Democratic and Republican Parties this year?

Answer. The Republicans nominated as their candidate at the national convention in Philadelphia, Pa., in June 1940, the Honorable Wendell L. Willkie.

The Democrats nominated as their candidate at Chicago, Ill., in July 1940, the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The election (general) will be November 5, 1940.

The inauguration will be January 20, 1941.

73. Question. Was there anything unusual about the inauguration of Andrew Jackson?

Answer. When he was inaugurated President the plain people came to Washington by the thousands for hundreds of miles. After the inauguration the men rode their horses down Pennsylvania Avenue to the White House with Jackson on horseback leading the parade. They used hickory stirrups on their saddles, hickory-bark bridles on their horses, and carried large hickory clubs.

The women wore hickory-nut necklaces and hickory-nut shells for earrings. The eating places served hickory-nut cakes.

It was said 20,000 people passed through the White House at the President's reception. They said that at last the people have one of their own folks as President. They called him the people's President, and the day of his inauguration people's day, and the White House the people's house. Muddy boots ruined the White House furniture and particularly the fine chairs.

74. Question. When Greece was a pure democracy and all people voted, why was a halter put on one who proposed a new law?

Answer. The people of ancient Athens seem to have had the same idea. When all the people met together on certain days to pass laws, they had a requirement that any man who came to the platform to propose a new law must wear a halter around his neck. This requirement was to impress each would-be lawmaker how easy it would be to hang him if he proposed a new law that would be harmful to the people.

75. Question. What are the customary proceedings when the House meets?

Answer. The Speaker calls the Members to order and the Sergeant at Arms places the mace on the pedestal at the right of the Speaker's platform. It is the symbol of authority of the House. Then the Chaplain offers prayer. Next the Clerk reads the Journal of the preceding day's activities. Members of the committees make reports of bills and then the House is ready to consider the bill left unfinished the day before or take up a new bill on the calendar, if there be no unfinished business.

If the mace is on the pedestal, the Speaker is presiding and the House is in session. When the Committee of the Whole is in session, the mace is off the pedestal and a Chairman of the Committee of the Whole is presiding.

76. Question. Are the proceedings in Congress published and preserved?

Answer. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is the daily published report of all that Members of the House and Senate say on the floor. It contains also the roll calls on all questions. Expert shorthand reporters take down every word as Senators and Congressmen speak. Then it is typed and sent to the Government Printing Office where it is printed in the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and immediately distributed. During each session, the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is edited, revised, and then made up into volumes and printed, bound permanently and distributed to the Government Departments and many of the libraries throughout the country.

The daily RECORD has been printed since 1848. Before that the reports of speeches were short and incomplete, but they were printed in the Annals of Congress, Congressional Debates, and Congressional Globe.

77. Question. How may the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD be obtained?

Answer. Each Congressman and Senator receives a copy of the RECORD each morning following a meeting of the House or Senate. Each Member of Congress has a limited number of daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS, which may be distributed free; they are usually sent to libraries, schools, or other places where they will be accessible to the public. Anybody may subscribe for the RECORD by writing to the Congressional Record Clerk at Washington, D. C. The subscription rate is $1.50 per month.

78. Question. Why are the Capitol and the White House a mile apart?

Answer. Many visitors to Washington wonder why the Capitol is more than a mile from the White House. George Washington arranged them so.

He knew the King of England was always trying to control Parliament. He wanted to make it difficult for the President to do that, so he located the Capitol and the White House on two elevations with a large swamp between them.

This made it necessary to travel nearly 2 miles around by higher ground, and thus made daily contact and association of the President and Members of Congress quite difficult.

79. Question. How long has the White House had that name, officially, and how was it officially acquired?

Answer. The building was painted white to conceal smoke stains when it was burned by the British in 1814.

80. Question. Is it difficult, at the present time, for the President and Congress to confer?

Answer. No. Streets and pavements, the telephone, and the automobile have changed all that. Long ago Pennsylvania Avenue, the broad, open, direct thoroughfare from the Capitol to the White House, covered and overcame all traces of the swamp. The telephone has for years enabled the President and Members of Congress to talk as if under the same roof. The automobile travels so rapidly that the distance between the two buildings is no longer a hindrance to daily association between the President and Members of Congress.

81. Question. Have these changes destroyed the independence of Congress?

Answer. All of these changes, however, have not destroyed the independence of Congress. When Congress and the Presidency are controlled by the same political party, Congress generally passes the bills the President recommends, but not always. Sometimes so many Members of the majority party refuse, that Congress fails to pass the President's bills or passes bills to which he is opposed. If the President vetoes a bill, enough Members may disagree, to override his veto by a two-thirds vote.

Two-thirds of Congress so seldom vote to override a veto, that the President's signature to a bill is considered necessary to pass most legislation.

82. Question. What really makes the bill a law?

Answer. The President's signature makes a bill a law. Ordinarily he signs bills without any particular attention being given his action.

Sometimes when the President has a bill of special importance to sign, he arranges a ceremony for the occasion.

83. Question. What occurs at a ceremony when the President signs a bill?

Answer. Sometimes the President uses two or three different pens to sign a bill, using one pen for the first part of his name and another pen for the latter part. Then he gives these pens to those who have been most interested in the legislation.

In some instances organizations interested in the legislation have furnished the President with a gold pen and fancy penholder to be used in affixing his name. Afterward the organization frames the pen and keeps it as a souvenir.

84. Question. What becomes of the bill after it is signed?

Answer. After signing a bill, the President sends it to the office of the Secretary of State. That official gives it a number as a public law and publishes it as one of the laws of the land. It is then included in the lawbooks found in law libraries and the offices of lawyers throughout the country.

85. Question. Can the President of the United States veto a constitutional amendment?

Answer. The President of the United States has nothing to do with the adopting of constitutional amendments, and accordingly he has neither the power nor the opportunity to veto a resolution passed by Congress proposing such amendment. Such a resolution, however, must pass by a two-thirds vote of both Houses.

86. Question. Does the Constitution limit a President to two terms?

Answer. The Constitution of the United States does not limit the number of times a duly qualified citizen may be elected President, and no Federal law on the subject has ever been enacted.

87. Question. Does the President ever wear a uniform?

Answer. Although the President of the United States is Commander in Chief of both the Army and Navy, he is a civilian. American tradition does not permit him to wear a uniform representing any branch of the military or naval service.

88. Question. Can a President adjourn Congress?

Answer. In the case of a disagreement between the Senate and the House of Representatives with respect to time of adjournment, the President "may adjourn them at such time as he may think proper," according to section 3, article 2, of the Constitution. Thus far no President has ever exercised this power, and many claim it applies to extraordinary sessions only.

89. Question. Can a President veto a declaration of war?

Answer. Under the Constitution, the President has the power to veto an act declaring war, and Congress has the power to pass it over his veto.

90. Question. Why is our Government referred to as one to abolish classes?

Answer. For these reasons they created some entirely new provisions of government. Under the governments of the Old World at that period the people were divided into classes. One consisted of the nobility—that is, the class with power and wealth; another was the middle class—that is, the owners of small homes, small farms, and small business establishments; while still another class consisted of the laborers, the tenants, and the servants.

If a boy's parents were of the nobility, then he might become a lord, an earl, a duke, or a noble and own great tracts of land. If a girl's parents were of the nobility, she might marry a prince, a lord, a duke, an earl, or a noble.

If a boy's parents were laborers, servants, or tenants, then he must remain in the working class. If a girl's parents were laborers, servants, or tenants, she must not marry into the nobility.

The children of the middle class were supposed to remain within that class by marriage, occupation, and by their social connections. It was almost impossible for the children of parents in one class to become members of a class higher than their parents.

The colonists had already abolished this class system here in the New World before the Revolution began, except as to the representatives of the English King. After the Revolution the King had no representatives here. Then the colonists determined there should never be such a system in the United States. So they created a government under which every citizen has equal rights and equal opportunities under the laws.

91. Question. What has made this Nation great?

Answer. All boys and girls can do whatever they desire to do when they are grown. They are American citizens. They can enter any profession, engage in any kind of business, or hold any office they can persuade the people to elect them to fill.

It makes no difference under our Government whether a child's parents are rich or poor, wise or ignorant, famous or unknown, that child can succeed or fail, rise or fall, on his own merits. All through our history thousands of men and women in every activity of life have proved this by beginning life in most humble circumstances and rising to the highest positions.

Monopoly and special privilege interfere with these rights of American boys and girls. Therefore we should be on the alert as American citizens to prevent any one person or corporation from obtaining too much control either in business or in government.

92. Question. Who became known as the people's President?

Answer. Because of our kind of a government, Andrew Jackson, the son of a poor immigrant, could carve a career for himself in the backwoods of the Alleghenies, lead an army of Kentucky and Tennessee crack-shot riflemen at New Orleans to defeat the best British regiments on earth in 1815, then go to the United States Senate wearing his coonskin cap over his pigtail braided hair, and later be twice elected to the White House as the "people's President."

93. Question. Who was the most loved and most hated American man?

Answer. Jackson was the most loved and most hated man of his generation. His enemies claimed he was born on a ship at sea before his parents reached America and therefore was not eligible to be President. His admirers were so enthusiastic in both North Carolina and South Carolina that they erected a monument in each State to mark his birthplace, one north of the State boundary line and the other south of it.

The soldiers who fought under him in the Battle of New Orleans held annual reunions for years afterward. They were expert riflemen of Kentucky and Tennessee. All of them had his picture above their log-cabin fireplaces. They taught their children, "That's the picture of old General Jackson, the greatest general that ever led men into battle."

94. Question. Where did Andrew Jackson acquire the nickname, "Old Hickory," and by whom was it conferred?

Answer. Jackson, because of his indefatigable constitution on the march was considered by his soldiers as "tough as hickory," from which they drew the name "Old Hickory."

95. Question. What two ex-Presidents served in Congress?

Answer. Six years after President Andrew Johnson went out of office as President, he was elected to the United States Senate from Tennessee and served in that body. John Quincy Adams has been the only ex-President who served in the House of Representatives. He served in that body 17 years after he was President. Adams had never previously served in the House, but he had been a Senator from Massachusetts prior to his election.

96. Question. Who was the first woman elected to Congress?

Answer. The first woman to become a Member of Congress was Miss Jeannette Rankin, of Montana. She was elected in 1916. She was a Republican and served one term. Miss Alice M. Robertson, of Muskogee, Okla., was the second woman who served in Congress. She also was a Republican and served one term—1921 to 1923.

97. Question. How many women are Members of Congress at this time?

Answer. One in the Senate; seven in the House.

98. Question. What Presidents were born in log cabins?

Answer. Jefferson, Jackson, Buchanan, Lincoln, Fillmore, Garfield, and Arthur.

99. Question. How many Presidents' fathers were preachers?

Answer. Three. Wilson, Arthur, Cleveland.

100. Question. What two Presidents were bachelors when elected?

Answer. Two Presidents of the United States were bachelors when elected—James Buchanan and Grover Cleveland. During his first term, however, the latter was married to Frances Folsom, daughter of his former law partner at Buffalo. Therefore Buchanan, the only President who was never married, is known as the Bachelor President. He was the fifteenth President and was Lincoln's predecessor in the White House.

101. Question. How many of our Presidents were slave owners?

Answer. Ten men who have occupied the Presidency were owners of slaves at one time or another during their lives. They were Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Jackson, Tyler, Polk, Taylor, Johnson, and Grant.

102. Question. What President hanged two men?

Answer. Grover Cleveland, the twenty-second and twenty-fourth President of the United States, when he was sheriff of Erie County, N. Y., in 1872 hanged two men.

103. Question. What President was drafted for military service?

Answer. Grover Cleveland was drafted for service in the Federal Army during the Civil War, but he availed himself of his legal right of hiring a substitute to serve in his place.

104. Question. Is an Indian eligible to the Presidency?

Answer. In June 1924 Congress passed a law making all Indians citizens. This means that all Indians born in the United States after that date are natural-born citizens and hence eligible to the Presidency so far as citizenship is concerned.

105. Question. How do dictatorships govern?

Answer. A dictatorship is a government ruled by a dictator. A man who becomes the head of a government by force and rules the people according to his own will is a dictator. Sometimes a prime minister or a president will persuade or compel the parliament or congress to give him supreme power. By this method he attempts to make his dictatorship lawful.

Dictators sometime exercise the powers of government without removing the king. They permit the king to retain his title without any power. This is another method of attempting to make a dictatorship lawful.

106. Question. How do dictatorships end?

Answer. No dictator has ever been able to devise any plan for his heir to succeed him. A dictatorship generally dies with the dictator. If a new dictator seizes control of the government he rules as he desires regardless of what his predecessor may have done.

Sometimes the people overthrow a dictator by a revolution. Then they choose a new ruler to run the government in accordance with the constitution and the laws.

107. Question. Is it possible for a dictator to get control of our country under our Constitution?

Answer. Dictatorships are not new. Ambitious military leaders in one nation after another have established them all through history. Some nations have dictators today. Others will no doubt have dictators in the future.

The Roman Senate had power to elect a dictator whenever it became deadlocked and could not agree on a national policy. Electing a dictator, though, was such serious business that the senate always met secretly in the dead of night when it was to elect a dictator.

Napoleon proclaimed himself a dictator and emperor, but died an English prisoner on the island of St. Helena.

It was to make a dictatorship impossible in the United States that the people of the Thirteen Original States wrote into the Constitution so many guarantees of individual rights and personal liberties which no ruler can override without destroying that document.

108. Question. What is a totalitarian state?

Answer. During recent years we have been using a new word to describe countries with dictators. It is "totalitarian." It comes from the word "total." Countries with dictatorships are called totalitarian states.

In a totalitarian state the government acts for the total of the people, that is, for the whole nation instead of for separate individuals. This means that individuals in totalitarian states have no rights or liberties not allowed by the ruler of the country whether he be a dictator, king, or emperor.

In some countries this system of government is called communism, and in other countries, fascism or nazi-ism. Although different in some respects, all such governments override those rights and liberties of the people which are guaranteed to all of us as American citizens under our Constitution.

109. Question. How many times has Congress declared war?

Answer. Congress has passed and the President has approved only five acts formally declaring the existence of a state of war between the United States and a foreign nation. June 18, 1812, against the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and the dependencies thereof. Our Government never formally declared war against Mexico, but on May 12, 1846, the Senate passed and the President approved a House bill entitled "An act providing for the prosecution of the existing war between the United States and the Republic of Mexico." It was equivalent to a formal declaration of war. April 25, 1898, our country declared war on the Kingdom of Spain. April 6, 1917, Congress declared a state of war to exist between the United States and the Imperial German Government. December 7, 1917, our Government declared that a state of war existed between the United States of America and the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government. Our country has been engaged in numerous wars that were not formally declared or formally declared to exist. War was never formally declared against the Confederate States. There were, of course, numerous Indian wars within our boundaries.

110. Question. Can Members of Congress be impeached?

Answer. No; they are not subject to impeachment, but each House is judge of the qualifications of its own Members and can with concurrence of two-thirds expel a Member. Each Member, in fact, takes the oath of office at the beginning of his term with the consent of all the other Members elected. In other words, if any other Member-elect should challenge his right to take the oath for any reason in the world, the Member would have to step aside until the complaint or charges had been disposed of. It is the usual practice for a resolution to be adopted, authorizing the Speaker of the House to administer the oath to the Member-elect, who has been challenged, by referring the question of the final right of the Member to his seat to the proper committee for consideration and report.

111. Question. What was the first act of Congress?

Answer. The first law enacted was an act to regulate the time and manner of administering certain oaths and it was approved June 1, 1789, in President Washington's period. The second bill passed by both Houses was "An act for laying a duty on goods the merchandise of which was imported into the United States," and it was approved by Washington on July 4 of the same year. The first session of the first Congress opened in New York City. Therefore, the first law relating to the economic welfare of the people of the Nation was one in favor of a tariff duty.

112. Question. What President first had an automobile?

Answer. William Howard Taft was the first President to make regular use of an automobile while he was Chief Executive. It was purchased in 1909. Harding was the first man elected President who had driven a car himself.

113. Question. Has a President or a Vice President ever resigned?

Answer. No President of the United States thus far has resigned. Only one Vice President has resigned—John C. Calhoun.

114. Question. Which Presidents were related?

Answer. John Quincy Adams, the sixth President, was a son of John Adams, the second President. Benjamin Harrison, the twenty-third President, was a grandson of William Henry Harrison, the ninth President. Zachary Taylor, the twelfth President, was a second cousin of James Madison, the fourth President. Madison and Taylor were the great grandsons of James Taylor and Martha Thompson. Our present President, the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, is a fifth cousin of a former President, Theodore Roosevelt; Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, the First Lady, is a niece of former President Theodore Roosevelt.

115. Question. Why is the President's wife called the First Lady?

Answer. The President's wife is called the First Lady of the Land because the Presidency is regarded as the highest position any man can attain in this country, and his wife is given social precedence over all other women. When the President is not married, the woman who presides socially over the White House is called the First Lady of the Land.

116. Question. Why are most of the bills that become law in the name of a comparatively few Members of Congress?

Answer. When the committee has hearings on a bill, usually all of the bills introduced by the Members of the House on that subject are considered at the same time in the committee. In the House, a bill cannot bear the name of more than one Member as the author. Therefore, it often happens that the same or a similar bill is introduced by a large number of Members. When hearings have been completed and a bill has been agreed upon by the committee, a new bill is usually introduced, referred to as a "clean bill," in the name of the chairman of the committee and no reference is made to the other Members who have introduced similar bills. When the bill has finally passed, it only bears the name of the chairman. Furthermore, all administration bills are introduced by administration leaders and these bills usually take precedence over all others. In the Senate, any number of Members may join in the introduction of a bill. It has happened that the Member of Congress responsible for the passage of a bill does not have his name connected with it in any way when it becomes a law.

117. Question. What is "pairing" in Congress?

Answer. If a Member of the Senate or House of Representatives wishes to be absent during a meeting of Congress, he often asks a Member of the opposite party to refrain from voting on important measures. He is then said to be "paired" with so-and-so, or to have a "pair." Thus, the result is not affected and the relative strength of each party remains unchanged. On a particular question, the Member desiring to be absent will seek a "pair" from one who expects to vote contrary to the way that he would vote if present. It is, in effect, a Member casting an absentee vote. It is called a "live" pair.

118. Question. What business can be transacted by unanimous consent?

Answer. Practically anything can be done in either House by unanimous consent. Except where the rules specifically prohibit the presiding officer from entertaining such a request; for example, admission to the floor of persons not included in the rule on the subject; the introduction of persons in the galleries, and so forth. A famous Speaker of the House once said "You can drive an elephant through the House of Representatives by unanimous consent." A majority of the bills are passed by unanimous consent. Sometimes a leader will ask unanimous consent to bring up for immediate consideration a certain bill. If any Member objects it cannot be brought up in that way. However, the Rules Committee can immediately present a special rule for the immediate consideration of the bill and when a majority of the Members of the House vote for the rule the bill is considered under the terms of that rule, which can suspend all other rules.

Members are permitted to address the House and extend their remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by unanimous consent. If a Member abuses any privilege that is granted to him by unanimous consent, such as putting too much extraneous matter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, any Member can stop it in the future by objecting to his requests. However, the Member whose request is objected to can retaliate by objecting to all unanimous-consent requests until his request is granted; or if a Democrat objects to a request made by a Republican, the Republican will sometimes object to all requests made by the Democrats only until his request is granted, and vice versa.

119. Question. Why are Congressmen elected in the State of Maine in September instead of November?

Answer. The Constitution provides that unless Congress directs otherwise, the time of holding elections for Senators and Representatives "shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof." During the early days of the Federal Government no law on the subject was passed. In 1845 Congress fixed the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November as the day for choosing presidential electors and that day is still national or general election day. The same day was designated for the election of Representatives, but an exception was made in the case of those States in whose constitutions a different day was specified. Accordingly, for many years, three States, Arkansas, Oregon, and Maine, elected their congressional Representatives earlier than November. Arkansas and Oregon later changed their constitutions to conform with the act of 1845. Maine is the only State in the Union which continues to hold these elections on a different day. Election day in Maine was placed in September during the early days of the Republic, when traveling facilities were poor and when bad roads and cold weather frequently would have prevented the rural inhabitants from going to the polls late in the fall. All the States, including Maine, elect Presidential electors on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November.

120. Question. Why must tax bills originate in the House?

Answer. After the Revolution, it was decided that officials of our Government, who pass tax laws, should be directly responsible to the people. So they provided that only Congress should levy and collect taxes and that all laws to raise revenue, that is, to tax the people, must originate in the House of Representatives. It was also provided that the Members of the House of Representatives should be elected every 2 years. If Congress raises taxes too high, the people can elect new Members of the House within 2 years to repeal or change those taxes.

121. Question. What are the functions of the House Rules Committee?

Answer. It has more power over legislation than any other committee of the House. It considers only bills that some other committee has reported. Most of its work is to decide whether or not to grant special consideration for bills which otherwise might be long delayed on the various calendars of the House. When the Rules Committee reports a special rule to the House it is usually adopted. When it is adopted, the bill to which it refers is considered under the provisions of that rule.

122. Question. Is smoking permitted in Congress?

Answer. By the rules of the Senate and the House of Representatives, Members are not permitted to smoke while on the floor.

123. Question. Is there a bar in the Capitol?

Answer. No; the last saloon bar was taken out of the Capitol in 1903.

124. Question. Is a filibuster possible in Congress?

Answer. It is possible for a filibuster to be conducted in the Senate because of the liberal rules, which provide that a Senator may speak as long and as many times as he desires. A few Senators can hold up a vote indefinitely in that way.

In 1917 the Senate adopted what is called a "cloture rule" as a part of the Senate rules. It provides that the Senate may end debate by a two-thirds vote. When 16 Senators file a petition with the clerk of the Senate, asking to end debate, the Senate must vote on the petition at 1:00 p. m., the second calendar day thereafter. If two-thirds vote for cloture, then no Senator may talk longer than 1 hour on the bill. So long as one-third of the Senate is opposed to cloture, it is impossible to end a filibuster if enough Senators are willing to talk in relays.

Forcing roll calls is about the only method of filibustering left under the rules of the House, and when the Rules Committee brings in a drastic rule prohibiting the offering of amendments or considering the bill for more than a certain number of hours, even that method of filibustering is impossible.

125. Question. Are visitors and representatives of the press allowed to listen in on the proceedings?

Answer. Yes; in both Houses places are provided for them in the galleries. A special place is set aside for accredited members of the press and is referred to as the "press gallery."

126. Question. Are eating places provided in the Capitol for Members and their guests?

Answer. Yes; in both the Senate and House wings of the Capitol meals are served at prevailing prices. Meals are not served free to anyone. It is a quarter of a mile from the Houses of Congress to the nearest private restaurant off the Capitol Grounds. Since Congress usually meets at noon, the Members obtain their noonday meal when it is convenient for them to do so during a lull in the proceedings or while something is being considered which does not require their attendance. If a vote is called for during their absence, the bells are sounded and they can return to the floor in plenty of time to vote.

127. Question. Are the Members provided with offices in which to conduct their business?

Answer. The 435 Members of the House have offices in two buildings about 150 yards south of the Capitol. When the weather is bad or when traffic is too heavy on the streets, they can reach the Capitol Building through a subway.

The 96 Senators are provided offices in a building about 150 yards northeast of the Senate wing of the Capitol. The Senators are provided with a one-rail electric train in a subway for quick transportation from their building to the Senate floor.

128. Question. How should one address a Member of Congress if he desires to communicate with him?

Answer. Example as follows: Hon. John Jones, M. C., House (or Senate) Office Building, Washington, D. C.

If Congress is not in session, the communication should be addressed to his home town.

129. Question. Who has custody and use of the seal of the United States?

Answer. The Secretary of State. He affixes the seal to all civil commissions for officers of the United States appointed by the President.

130. Question. What is the flag?

Answer. The United States statutes provide that: "The flag of the United States shall be 13 horizontal stripes alternate red and white and the union of the flag shall be 48 stars, white, in a blue field."

131. Question. How is the number of stars in the flag determined?

Answer. By the number of States. And on the admission of a new State into the Union, one star shall be added.

132. Question. What is the pledge to the flag?

Answer.

"I pledge allegiance to the flag of the United States of America,
And to the Republic for which it stands,
One Nation, indivisible,
With liberty and justice for all."

This pledge is widely used in the public schools of the United States.

133. Question. Who wrote the pledge to the flag?

Answer. The pledge to the flag was written by Francis Bellamy, Boston, Mass., in August 1892. It was first repeated at the exercises in connection with the celebration of Columbus Day (October 12, 1892).

134. Question. What is the approved ceremony for use in schools when pledging allegiance to the flag?

Answer. If it is customary to have a flag hanging in the front of the schoolroom, it is left in its regular position for the ceremony. Otherwise a pupil is appointed to hold a flag before the school, a medium sized flag on a short staff being preferable. At a signal from the teacher, the pupils arise in their places and stand erect. They then bring the open right hand, palm downward, to a line on a level with the forehead, the thumb just touching the right eyebrow. Standing thus they slowly and distinctly repeat the pledge in concert. At the words "to the Flag of the United States of America" each pupil extends the right hand, palm up, toward the flag, the hand remaining in that position until the pledge is completed, when it is dropped to the side. This ceremony is generally followed by a patriotic song.

135. Question. What are some of the improper uses of the flag?

Answer. It is unlawful to use the flag for advertising purposes or to mutilate, defile, or contemptuously treat it, but it is no disrespect to wash or dry clean an American flag. It is also proper to mend the flag when torn, unless it is in such bad condition that it would be a discredit to the owner if displayed.

136. Question. What was the original name of our national anthem? When did it become our national anthem?

Answer. Defense of Fort McHenry.

By an act of Congress approved by the President on March 3, 1931, the words and music of The Star-Spangled Banner were designated as "the national anthem of the United States of America."

The words were written in 1814 by Francis Scott Key, 1780–1843, a lawyer, of Frederick, Md., and Washington, who, as a visitor on board a British vessel in Baltimore, had witnessed the British bombardment of Fort McHenry.

The words were sung to the air of Anacreon in Heaven, and gained at once popularity as a national lyric.

Whenever the national anthem is played on board a vessel of the Navy, at a naval station, or at any place where persons belonging to the naval service are present, all officers, and enlisted men not in formation shall stand at attention, facing toward the music, except at colors, when they shall face toward the colors. If in uniform, covered, they shall salute at the first note of the anthem, retaining the position of salute until the last note of the anthem. If not in uniform and covered, they shall uncover at the first note of the anthem, holding the headdress opposite the left shoulder and so remain until the last note of the anthem, except that in inclement weather the headdress may be slightly raised.

137. Question. What kind of an oath is an alien required to take before he becomes a naturalized citizen of the United States?

Answer. The laws of the United States provide that before such a person "is admitted to citizenship he must declare, on oath in open court, that he will support the Constitution of the United States and that he absolutely and entirely renounces and abjures all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty, and particularly by name to the prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty of which he was before a citizen or subject; that he will support and defend the Constitution and laws of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic, and bear true faith and allegiance to the same."

138. Question. What is the American's creed?

Answer. The American's creed was written by William Tyler Page, former Clerk of the United States House of Representatives, in 1917 and adopted and promulgated by the Government's Committee on Publication. It was accepted by the House of Representatives on behalf of the American people April 3, 1918. It is as follows:

I believe in the United States of America as a Government of the people, by the people, for the people; whose just powers are derived from the consent of the governed; a democracy in a republic; a sovereign Nation of many sovereign States; a perfect Union, one and inseparable; established upon those principles of freedom, equality, justice, and humanity for which American patriots sacrificed their lives and fortunes.

I therefore believe it is my duty to my country to love it; to support its Constitution; to obey its laws; to respect its flag; and to defend it against all enemies.

Compulsory Military Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MARY T. NORTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 7, 1940

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, in considering what my stand should be with respect to this measure, which proposes to conscript the youth of the Nation for military service, I have prayerfully asked for divine guidance. I am not insensible to the grave responsibility that is before me. And I suppose my mental processes have reacted to the problem in much the same manner as have those of all Americans, who are striving to find the solution most compatible with the welfare of the Nation.

No proposed legislation, during the period of my service in the Congress, has consumed more of my time and attention. My desk literally is piled with letters and telegrams, urging me to take one side or the other. People here in Washington and back home in New Jersey importune me to vote both for and against the measure. I have followed the Senate debates with profound interest. I have read, and in some cases reread, articles on the measure by newspaper and magazine writers, by military experts and by others who must be presumed to know whereof they speak. And I have endeavored, to the very best of my ability, to piece together all of this information, into the pattern that will present an answer consistent with the welfare of my country. And in weighing the evidence on both sides of the issue, I have tried to have special regard for the source thereof, because I think it of vital importance that before we shape decisions in matters of this character we know definitely that the sources of our information represent people and organizations that are interested solely in the national welfare. Modern propaganda approaches an objective by trails that are as devious as they are numerous, and it is well to remember that some of the nations abroad are spending millions of dollars to disseminate information designed to keep us divided, and thereby impotent defensively. And obviously, a measure of this nature, designed as it is to strengthen our defensive forces, would not be in harmony with plans of nations that contemplate acts of aggression against any of the nations of this hemisphere.

I am not unfamiliar with war. I know from experience the tragic consequences thereof. During the last war it was my privilege to serve in a capacity that brought me into intimate association with participants that seldom make the headlines, women and children of the underprivileged class, whose husbands and fathers were overseas. I know their privations and sufferings. After the war when I came to Congress my work on the Veterans Committee carried me to veterans' hospitals, where I observed at first hand the horrible grist that came from the mills of the war god. And knowing and seeing all of this, I never could bring myself to cast my vote for a measure that would lead to another war, or would prove the means of sending one single American boy to fight in foreign battlefields. And being a woman, and knowing that in the final analysis it is the members of my own sex—mothers, wives, and loved ones at home—who are the real sufferers I am opposed to legislation that carries potential steps toward war. But I am not opposed to legislation that will provide the means for keeping the Nation out of war. For these reasons then, I have approached the problem before me with a great amount of deliberation, and my decision is predicated upon a sincere and genuine desire to act for the best interests and welfare of my country.

I believe that the measure under consideration should be regarded in the light of what has transpired and what is transpiring abroad. To disregard or attempt to waive aside this background is folly. No nation can afford to isolate itself from a threatened danger by turning its back to it. Forces are abroad in Europe and Asia that champion an ideology of government that is diametrically opposed to ours. They are striving, with the fervor of fanaticism, to uproot the last vestiges of democracy from the soil of Europe. They are powerful, aggressive, ruthless, and bent upon world-conquest. And when they finish the job in Europe, their attention will be focused upon the Western Hemisphere. Already their advance agents are busily at work in South and Central America, paving the way by propaganda, by espionage, and by other means for the show-down that will come when the work in Europe is completed.

Let us try to divest ourselves of wishful thinking and regard the problem confronting our Nation realistically. South America is a veritable treasure house of natural resources. It is fabulously rich in the things that the totalitarian nations need badly and do not possess. It holds forth for the plucking, raw materials, agricultural products, and mineral wealth, as well as acres and acres of fruitful land for colonization. Can anyone in their right senses imagine for a single minute, in the light of what has transpired in Europe and Asia, that Hitler and his partners in international crime will be bothered about the Monroe Doctrine when abundant plunder beckons? And suppose an expedition were landed and took possession of one of the southernmost republics. From what our military experts tell us, we are in no position, at the moment, to successfully resist an invasion of our own shores, to say nothing of transporting troops to expel totalitarian invaders from South America. And bombing bases in any part of South America could wreak havoc with the Panama Canal, our Caribbean possessions, our eastern seaboard cities, and our large industrial areas that are the lifeblood of our national industry.

I feel that much of the opposition to this measure is the result of wholesale misinformation. Many people throughout the Nation—honest, patriotic people—have been led to believe that it constitutes a serious threat to their tranquillity and welfare. I believe that most of these people, knowing the situation as it really is, would regard the measure in a more favorable light. One statement oft repeated in debate and in other channels against the bill is that which claims the measure will lead us to war. That assertion, to me, is a "bogeyman" that is the progeny of honest but impractical pacifists and dishonest "fifth columnists." The Nation stands committed to a policy that definitely and absolutely negatives the possibility of a war of our own making, a war of aggression, and the Nation is unanimous in the determination to send no soldiers to fight on battlefields beyond the Western Hemisphere. And it always has been my idea that the Congress, which is the representative body of the people of the United States, is the war-making body. How, then, can the force to be made available under this proposed law be the power that will motivate war?

Dictators seldom, if ever, make war against nations that can meet them on equal terms—nations that can match their military prowess. That isn't the way of the bully. It was the small, helpless, little nations that fell by the wayside in Europe and Asia. Let us run down the list of the fallen and the conquered—Ethiopia, Austria, Norway, and Denmark were hopelessly unprepared; Poland, Czechoslovakia, Finland, Holland, and Belgium were small and inadequately prepared. France was inadequately prepared and internally disorganized. And England, now in a most difficult position, was likewise inadequately prepared.

Among the suggestions advanced by those opposing passage of this bill is the one that the so-called volunteer system should be given a fair trial before going to the extent of conscription. There are many convincing answers to that suggestion, but the most conclusive is that the volunteer system has been given a fair trial and found wanting. In our own time the Army, if my memory serves me correctly, has made two concerted and genuine efforts to enroll troops by that method, with very unsatisfactory results. In one of these instances the number sought was less than 100,000 as against the 900,000 or more required in the present instance. The volunteer system places the fate of the Nation in the hands of but a small percentage of the Nation's manpower, whereas every man and woman in the Nation should be in a position, by adequate and systematized training, to do his or her share in a national emergency.

Opponents of the measure either possess an overwhelming confidence in the honor and character of dictators, or visualize an era when a few patriots, armed with only a musket, could stem the tide of an invading host from behind hedge fences and stone walls. The war of today is a highly mechanized business and victory rides with the force that is prepared, and prepared by careful, systematized training, and training that is a matter of months and, in some cases, years.

The tragedy that stalked the battlefields of Europe and Asia has demonstrated that any other alternative means slaughter and devastation.

If we are to prepare so that we may avoid war—and if my memory is correct most of my colleagues voted for preparedness after the invasion of the Low Countries last spring—if we are to prepare, let us do it the American way, and leave nothing to chance or to wishful thinking. Let us see to it that our armed forces have all of the equipment and all of the manpower that will place us in a position to assert our rights in this hemisphere when and if the show-down comes.

I favor this measure because I am convinced that it is an integral and necessary part of the preparedness program; because I am convinced that it is the very best insurance my country can have against war; because I am convinced it is the only democratic way of placing the burden of defense of the Nation and the hemisphere on the shoulders of everybody in the Nation; because I feel that it will take our youth and improve it physically and morally, and teach it obedience and discipline; and because, as an American, I feel that my Nation should be ready to take up any challenge from any nation on the face of the earth that places at issue or in jeopardy the lands and the sacred principles that are the heritage of generations of free men, our forefathers.

Compare Our Problems With England's Problems—Part III

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

EXCERPTS FROM THE ALIEN MENACE

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting a series of excerpts from the Alien Menace, by Lt. Col. A. H. Lane, an officer in the British Army, who is more interested in England's welfare than he is in political expediency. He, like many in America, tells the truth. He hits the nail on the head, and he sets a good example for Members of Congress of the United States.

In reading this series, the Members will find that the same insidious influences, which are undermining England, are also undermining the United States—so it behooves us to protect ourselves before it is too late.

The excerpts follow:

ALIENS AND THE FILMS

The immense power of the films to educate and influence the public does not seem to have been studied by our successive Governments, and this great menace of propaganda has been neglected by our ministers in a manner which is difficult to understand.

What has been the influence during all these years which has prevented the formation of a well-organized Government film censor's department?

Statistics show that in England alone some 7,000,000 persons attend the films every week. Information is largely conveyed to the brain by eye, and impressions thus produced are generally lasting, and this is more especially the case among uneducated and uncivilized peoples. The talking film appeals to both eye and ear, thus having two avenues of approach to the mind instead of one only, as is the case of the wireless loudspeaker.

Our enemies, almost at once, realized that in the film they possessed, perhaps, the most powerful instrument for propaganda that the world has ever known. Even before the Great War they were using it against us, and since August 1914 it has been their most potent means for disseminating information calculated to injure us. Wherever, as in India, the masses are illiterate, or, as in England, credulous, our enemies' films have done an incalculable amount of harm.

Most of the films shown until comparatively lately have been foreign films. A large proportion of these have been demoralizing, and many are directly or indirectly anti-British and subversive in character and have been forced upon the long-suffering British by some of the aliens who control and direct the vast film industry in this country, our Dominions, colonies, India, and the Far East. Moscow films, having sown the seeds of revolt in Egypt, India, China, South America, and other disturbed centers, are now being shown here with ever-growing freedom.

Now, as to the propaganda value of a film. On November 5, 1926, I was one of a deputation to the Home Secretary, Sir William Joynson-Hicks, which protested against the general management of films in England, a large proportion of which were antipatriotic, and in particular a strong protest was directed against the exhibition in England of an American film, entitled "The Unknown Soldier," which portrayed an American in the title role and on that account alone was an outrage to British feelings, having regard to the revered grave in Westminster Abbey. On that occasion I said to the Home Secretary, inter alia:

"The British public do not sufficiently realize that the foreign film producers have captured the cinema business of the British Isles, not only for the money to be made in it but also for propaganda purposes. These foreign film producers, backed by foreign financiers with unlimited money, are aiming at destroying our patriotism, our traditions, and our ideals. They are educating our people downward and not upward. The Government should appoint a censor of films—to have the same powers as the censor of plays—as is done in Australia."

In his reply the Home Secretary expressed his sympathy with the deputation, especially with the remark that our people were being "educated downwards and not upwards." But he made the amazing statement that in regard to the films he had no legal power to interfere. It is worthy of mention, however, that following on press reports concerning this deputation and the subsequent public outcry, "The Unknown Soldier" was withdrawn.

On December 12, 1926, the Daily Mail published a lengthy article describing the United States film-makers' grip of the British cinema industry. It quoted a statement by one of the officials of the Cinematograph Exhibitors' Association that American film companies derived an income of something like $6,000,000 a year from British cinemas, and paid no income tax here on that account—certainly an example of profitable propaganda. What was the political influence behind this?

I now propose to prove how, instead of preventing the dissemination of subversive propaganda on the films, we encourage it through lack of proper Government censorship. A great parade is made in the cinemas of the "Passed by the British Board of Film Censors" certificate, which used to bear the signature of Mr. T. P. O'Connor, M. P., but now is signed "Edward Shortt." This certificate is misleading, since it deludes many to believe that there is a Government censorship. The film censors—whoever they are—are neither appointed nor paid by the Government, but by the producers themselves, many of whom are aliens. This is a Gilbertian state of affairs, and it is on a par with a criminal paying his judge. But in spite of every effort made by patriotic societies and others to effect an alteration in the form of censorship, nothing effectual has been done up to date, and thus the greatest propaganda medium for evil remains to a great extent in the hands of German-American financiers.

It was not a coincidence that Mr. T. P. O'Connor, who was no lover of Great Britain—and whose wife was an American—was appointed censor. It may also be mentioned that Mr. T. P. O'Connor's eyesight was very weak during his later life. Since Mr. O'Connor died, Mr. Edward Shortt has been appointed censor, but the harm has been done.

Twelve years of films—many of which were propaganda—designed, if only by suggestion, gradually to destroy the patriotism, ideals, and traditions of our Nation, have had their effect. They have, with considerable success, achieved their objective.

Certain films shown in India and the Far East, especially since the War, have been purposely made—in the United States, Germany, and so forth—with the definite idea of ruining British prestige among the natives of these countries. The harm these films have done is enormous. They appeal to millions who cannot read.

The Daily Mail (June 2, 1930) throws some light on this subject:

"Surprise has been caused among cinema goers by a film interview with Mrs. Sarojini Naidu, the poetess and follower of Gandhi, which was shown in London last week and is to appear at provincial theaters this week.

"Mrs. Naidu is serving a term of imprisonment for her part in the raid on the Government-controlled salt depot at Dharasana, near Bombay, and a number of people who have seen the talking film have suggested that the screen should not be used for the propaganda of revolutionary leaders.

"The showing of this film, which is included in a news reel, raises in an acute form the question of censorship of such films.

"It was explained to a Daily Mail reporter on Saturday by Mr. J. Brooke Wilkinson, the secretary of the British Board of Film Censors, that news films are outside the jurisdiction of the censorship. The subjects are left to the discretion of the editors. Mr. Wilkinson explained. 'The Government, the licensing authorities, and the trade,' he said, 'have always opposed a censorship of topical films.'"

It is significant to recall here an interview which the correspondent of the Jewish Guardian had with Mr. E. Godal, managing director of the British and Colonial Kinematograph, in May 1921. The Jewish Guardian, May 27, 1921, stated that when Mr. Godal was asked: "You have no fear, then, for any invasion of anti-Jewish films?" Mr. Godal replied: "Impossible; remember that our people are in the unique position of being their own censors, their own judges of what fare they shall offer their patrons from the miles of films with which they are tempted."

Considering that since 1921 films have become more degrading, anti-British and more harmful generally, besides much greater in number, it would seem that these alien cinematograph "bosses" have continued to be their own censors.

It is true that local committees have been formed to deal with films. And in January 1932, Sir Cecil Levita, chairman of the London County Council, 1928–29, was elected chairman of the home office advisory committee on film censorship. But it must be remembered that when chairman of the L. C. C. Film Committee, this K. C. V. O. obtained official recognition for the so-called British Board of Film Censors which has proved such a dangerous farce. Following this step the home office ordered all local authorities to adopt this censorship. Judging from many of the films shown of late years in London, this appointment does not hold out much hope of improvement in censorship.

France has a Government censor department with strong powers, which sees all films before they can be shown. No films of a subversive nature are passed.

Doubtless the reader will remember the great effort that was made at the end of 1927 to bring in a bill to promote the manufacture of British films, the basic idea being to place the British films in a position of equality with the foreigner and to insure our having all-British productions.

This bill was passed and is now in operation under the name of the Cinematograph Film Act, 1927. But readers of it will notice an extraordinary omission. As introduced, the bill provided that in order to qualify as a British film not only the author of the scenario and the maker of the film but the producer should be British subjects. Yet when the bill was being discussed on the report stage in the House of Commons on November 17, 1927, Colonel Applin, Member of Parliament, brought in an amendment—which was carried—to permit foreign producers being employed, although, as I have explained, the bill was intended to foster British productions. Now, as the chief authority and power is the producer, this amendment nullified the whole aim and object of the bill; consequently German-American producers can carry on as before with their pernicious propaganda, some of which is indirect and subtle, but nearly all designed to destroy British ideals.

The effect of this amendment has been most serious and far-reaching not only in the British Isles but in every country where these films are shown. Our prestige in India and the Far East has been seriously damaged by this means.

From a financial point of view the practical destruction of the bill was worth large sums to the alien film producers.

The Sunday Express (December 15, 1929) stated, "The quota act is dead."

"The 'quota' companies cannot get any more capital."

"American distributors in this country are wriggling out of their quota obligation."

"The British film is betrayed at home and boycotted abroad."

It would seem that anti-British managers deliberately show poor British films in juxtaposition to high-class foreign ones, in order to belittle this country and bring contempt upon the real British product.

In proof of this assertion that there is a conspiracy to belittle the British product the Daily Telegraph of June 22, 1931, drew attention to this matter. The film critic, discussing the poor quality of many of the British films shown here, explains their origin thus:

"Many of the films of which complaint is made are produced here by American companies for the purpose of technical compliance with the quota regulations. They are legal rubbish, made with the minimum of money and efficiency for the purpose of casting discredit on the British film industry."

The Australian Board of Film Censors, in its report published February 12, 1932, "deplored the 'moral tone' of British talking pictures." (Daily Mail, February 13, 1932.)

The Times (February 15, 1932) stated that the commonwealth film censor reports that the tone of films in general in the last year has not improved.

The machinery for talking films was made in the United States of America, chiefly by the Western Electric group with the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. ($200,000,000 capital reserve) behind them. The machinery has been supplied on the installment system. This scheme has given these American combines a great control over our film and cinema companies not only in the British Isles but in our Dominions and colonies.

The enormous profits thus made in this country by these United States of America companies are not subject to English income tax.

From the above will be seen some of the extraordinary developments by which the alien controls our cinemas. These alien schemes have gained great impetus during the past 3 years, what time our "labor" government was in office.

The Sunday Dispatch (September 13, 1931) stated that within the next 12 months the American motion-picture industry will have invested nearly £5,000,000 in film production in the British isles.

FILM SOCIETIES

It is difficult to overestimate the great moral wrong which has been done and is being done to the British Nation by the film society which was founded in 1926 by the Honorable Ivor Montagu (brother of Lord Swaythling) and Mr. S. Bernstein.

Mr. Montagu has been associated with Serge Eisenstein in the production of some subversive films. Serge Eisenstein has been for several years Moscow's chief film propagandist, and has declared revolutionary propaganda to be "the first task of Soviet dictatorship" (Daily Express, October 18, 1930).

"The members of the film society are drawn chiefly from influential and well-to-do people whose interests are best described by the word "cultural," and from university lecturers, school teachers, educational publicists, and others connected with the instruction of youth, the result being that its performances have a propaganda value far beyond that which would be attached to ordinary film exhibitions" (Daily Telegraph, April 4, 1931).

The film society, in common with all other private film societies, is understood to be party to an undertaking not to show subversive film propaganda. This society showed how censorship could be evaded by not charging for admission. Our weak laws and administrations seem unable to control these shows.

The success with which the film society has evaded the law and has not been interfered with, especially under the Socialist Government, has led to the formation of the London Workers' Film Society which, with Mr. Montagu and other members of the film society on its executive, produces most dangerous Communist and anti-British propaganda films that have not passed the censor. Branches of this society have also been formed in many of our large towns.

The Federation of Workers' Film Societies has been formed at 74 Old Compton Street, W. 1, and publishes a paper called the Workers' Cinema, a subversive monthly publication which would not be allowed in any other country.

These societies obtain their films through the Soviet organization Mezhrabkom (Workers' International Relief). The transmission of money to them has been facilitated by our Socialist Government's political trade arrangements with Moscow through Arcos. The Blue Express, the most vindictive of all Moscow's anti-British propaganda films, also the Storm of Asia, etc., have been obtained in this way. With one exception these films have been banned by the British Board of Film Censors. There seem to be considerable funds at the disposal of these societies. Large audiences attend the shows of the workers' film societies. Hundreds are brought free in motor coaches, and the International is often sung (Daily Mail and Morning Post, June 16, 1930).

The Soviet Union last year produced 232 propaganda films. This year the number will probably be doubled. It is chiefly these films which have done so much harm to British prestige in India and the Far East. Large film studios are being constructed in central Asia and eastern Siberia. One of the great aims of these films is representing Czarist Russia as a hell and bolshevized Russia as a paradise.

With regard to the evil influences exercised by many films shown in this country, the following impartial opinion is of considerable interest.

On November 11, 1931, Capt. A. B. Moore, inspector of police for the State of New York, staying in London, told a Daily Mail reporter:

"You people see too many films about gunmen. My censorship department would not allow the films to be seen in New York that you have advertised all over the west end of London. They are produced by men of no responsibility but unlimited money. They are produced simply to make money, and they don't care what it costs America in reputation" (Daily Mail, Nov. 12, 1931).

It is useless to deny—as the late Sir Israel Gollancz, professor of the English language at the University of London, did—that these American talking films are seriously affecting the language of our people, especially the younger generation.

FILM PRODUCERS

A great deal has appeared in the press lately regarding the great British film combine, the Gaumont-British Corporation. This corporation now controls 350 cinemas in the British Isles. Three million people are said to attend these cinemas each week. This corporation is arranging to spend £1,000,000 per annum in talking pictures. The chairman of this corporation was Col. A. C. Bromhead, and his brother, Mr. R. C. Bromhead, was managing director. In August 1929, Mr. Isidore Ostrer was appointed chairman and Mr. Mark Ostrer vice chairman. Mr. C. M. Woolf was then appointed managing director, Mr. Michael Balcon was made the production supervisor.

In an authoritative article in The Sphere, December 28, 1931, it is pointed out that 49 percent of the shares are held by the Chase National Bank of New York, while 49 percent is the property of the Ostrer interests acting on behalf of the Fox Film Corporation, United States of America, according to the Daily Mail, June 6, 1930.

The Ostrer brothers have lately bought a controlling interest in the Baird Television Co.

The following information may be of interest to the reader as regards the various groups of film producers and cinema owners and the persons who control them.

Mr. Sidney Lewis Bernstein is a director and the chairman of Bernstein Theatres, Ltd.; a director of the Capital and Counties Electric Theatres, Ltd.; the managing director of the Charing Cross Road Theatre, the Denman London Cinemas, Ltd., Empire Kinemas, Ltd., Film Agencies, and the Kinematograph Equipment Co., Ltd., and a director of the Shrewsbury Empires, Ltd.

Dr. Rudolph Becker is the managing director of British Sound Films Productions, Ltd.

Mr. Ludwig Blattner is managing director of the Ludwig Blattner Picture Corporation, Ltd., of Boreham, Elstree. His codirectors include Mr. H. Darewski.

Mr. Harry Day (formerly Levi) is the chairman of the Theatre Securities, Ltd., a company which controls the Bedford Music Hall (Camden Town), Empire Theatre of Varieties (Bristol), Harry Day's Amusements, Ltd., and King's Hall (Dover).

Mr. V. H. C. Amberg is chairman of the British Talking Pictures, Ltd., and a director of the Associated Film Industries, Ltd.

A Productive Nation

OF
HON. JAMES C. OLIVER
OF MAINE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 7, 1940

ARTICLE BY WILLIS A. OVERHOLSER

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted to me to extend my remarks, I am pleased to incorporate herewith an article written by Mr. Willis A. Overholser, of Libertyville, Ill., entitled "A Productive Nation" which was inspired by the acceptance speech of Wendell L. Willkie, Republican nominee for the Presidency of the United States. I wish to take this opportunity to commend Mr. Overholser for his clear, concise, and able comment in this day and hour of the Nation's history when constructive suggestions are so necessary. I concur with Mr. Overholser in his observations:

The attention of the country has been focused upon the speech of acceptance of Wendell L. Willkie as the Republican candidate for President. In considering his speech as a whole, it seemed to me that the keynote of the speech rested in his emphasis upon the importance of our being a productive nation. The following words, taken from the speech, are in point:

"It is from weakness that people reach for dictators and concentrated government power. Only the strong can be free.

"And only the productive can be strong."

In some of the first of this series of articles an attempt was made to emphasize this point by stating that it is not so much a case of sharing existing wealth as it is a case of bringing about a greater production and of providing pensions and relief needs out of the increased production. It was furthermore asserted at the beginning of this series that while the problem of production, as a major economic problem, has largely been solved (insofar as the ability to produce is concerned), nevertheless, it should be apparent that we cannot correct errors of distribution by pursuing a course of destruction, such as the killing of little pigs, the plowing under of cotton, and the making of rich men poor. The real income of the country is the wealth it produces. General prosperity will come only when we are a productive people and a fair distribution is made of the products after they are produced.

WILLKIE'S PROGRESSIVE VIEWS

The following, although a bit lengthy (yet only a small portion of the speech), are quoted from Mr. Willkie's acceptance address because of the importance and bearing that they have upon the principal matters herein referred to. In these views the candidate shows that he recognizes the need for a broader and better distribution:

"I am opposed to business monopolies. I believe in collective bargaining, by representatives of labor's own free choice, without any interference and in full protection of those obvious rights. I believe in the maintenance of minimum standards for wages and of maximum standards for hours. I believe that such standards should constantly improve.

"I believe in the Federal regulation of interstate utilities, of securities markets, and of banking. I believe in Federal pensions, in adequate old-age benefits, and in unemployment allowances.

"I believe that the Federal Government has a responsibility to equalize the lot of the farmer with that of the manufacturer. If this cannot be done by parity of prices, other means must be found—with the least possible regimentation of the farmer's affairs. I believe in the encouragement of cooperative buying and selling and in the full extension of rural electrification.

BETTER DISTRIBUTION OF BUYING POWER

"The purpose of all such measures is, indeed, to obtain a better distribution of the wealth and earning power of this country. But I do not base my claim to liberalism solely on my faith in such reforms. American liberalism does not consist merely in reforming things. It consists also in making things.

"The ability to grow, the ability to make things, is the measure of man's welfare on this earth. To be free, man must be creative.

"I am a liberal because I believe that in our industrial age there is no limit to productive capacity of any man. And so I believe that there is no limit to the horizon of the United States.

"I say that we must substitute for the philosophy of distributed scarcity the philosophy of unlimited productivity."

Those, indeed, are inspiring and encouraging words. In commenting on the New Deal, Mr. Willkie stated:

"It does not preach the doctrine of growth. It preaches the doctrine of division.

"We are not asked to make more for ourselves. We are asked to divide among ourselves that which we already have."

ECONOMICS IN TERMS OF ARITHMETIC

In the field of economics the New Deal has taught us a few things in regard to division and subtraction, with entirely too much emphasis on subtraction (destruction). When it has come to multiplication (production) it has taught us virtually nothing, and in giving too much consideration to subtraction it has even failed to do a very good job of teaching us much about the art of distribution. As previously pointed out, prosperity is primarily concerned first with production (multiplication), and then secondly with distribution. Also, as already noted, with modern inventions of labor-saving devices, etc., we have the facilities for an abundant production.

As a result of our failure in the field of distribution, however, we have balled up the works, so to speak, in the field of production. Probably the main explanation for this is that there is a lot more to distribution than bare division. One of the most important factors in distribution is proper monetization (a proper money system). Large numbers of people completely overlook this. The New Deal in largely overlooking this went up the blind alley of subtraction (destruction) through plowing under cotton, killing little pigs, etc.

Candidate Willkie, in his acceptance speech, did not go into much detail, and it will be necessary for him to say and do more before we can draw any very definite conclusions as to most things of public importance. Great detail, of course, is not to be expected in such a speech. However, there is a great deal in his words of acceptance to indicate a more liberal and progressive trend than has been displayed by any Republican administration within the memory of the average American citizen.

BIG OBSTACLE TO PRODUCTION

Having emphasized the need for greater production and having recognized the necessity of various progressive steps toward better distribution, he will do well to take a few pages from Henry Ford and the late Thomas A. Edison. It, of course, is not sufficient to merely talk about being productive. We must get at the causes for nonproduction, and Mr. Ford and Mr. Edison have pointed out the major cause. Mr. Ford has stated:

"Here is a nation that might be the richest nation in the world when actually we haven't enough of anything because there is not enough production. The need is here; the ability to produce is here; the stoppage is in the system that puts profits before production—and that is the money system. * * *

"Money is just part of society's transportation system for moving goods from man to man; it breaks down so often that it is time our financial engineers developed a better 'model.' * * *

"I am convinced that our money system is antiquated. We have plenty of men. We have plenty of material. But money, which is not so important as men or materials, is holding up progress. This must be changed."

Mr. Edison, during his later years, stated: "I think we are getting a sound idea on the money question. The people have an instinct which tells them that something is wrong and that the wrong somehow centers in money." After calling attention to certain improved monetary practices which should be, but have not been, adopted Mr. Edison asserted that if those changes are placed into effect that "then you will see an era of progress and prosperity in this country such as never could have come otherwise."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOACHIM O. FERNANDEZ

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 6, 1940

LETTER BY HON. JOACHIM O. FERNANDEZ, OF LOUISIANA

Mr. FERNANDEZ. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter addressed by me to the voters of my district:

To the Voters of the First Congressional District:

As you undoubtedly know, I am a candidate for reelection to Congress from the First Congressional District of New Orleans, an office I have held for the past 10 years. During that time I have given faithful service to the people of my congressional district, my city, my State, and my Nation.

My record is one of tremendous accomplishment, due solely to my own ability and initiative. I am a member of the powerful Appropriations Committee. The importance of this committee is realized when you consider that not one dime of the billions of dollars the Federal Government spends each year can be expended until this committee, of which I am a member, approves the appropriation of that money.

I am a member of the Naval Appropriations Subcommittee, ranking next to the chairman of that committee. I have taken a most influential part in guiding the national-defense program of our country. My speech before Congress on May 4, 1939, advocating the expenditure of $770,000,000 for the Navy was the first congressional proposal for a two-ocean Navy. It was my speech before Congress on June 4, 1940, that influenced Congress to adopt the present system of training of naval pilots, by the establishment of auxiliary naval aviation schools, one of which is to be established right here in New Orleans at the site on the shores of Lake Pontchartrain I suggested in that speech.

I have been instrumental in having millions of dollars of Federal money spent in New Orleans and the First Congressional District. The construction of the new Federal Building facing Lafayette Square, at a cost of $2,500,000; the new post-office building at Arabi, at a cost of $100,000; the initial allotment of $10,000,000 to New Orleans as one of the first slum-clearance projects in the country; the construction of the Agricultural Research Laboratory in New Orleans, at a cost of $2,000,000; the appropriation by Congress of $650,000 for the construction of a new customs building and appraisals stores in New Orleans; the appropriation by Congress of $400,000 for the construction of a new Coast Guard station; Federal aid of $500,000 granted to the fur trappers; and further aid to the extent of $1,000,000 presently in process—all are among the tremendous sums of Federal money I have secured for New Orleans.

The construction of the Federal Lighthouse Supply Depot at North Galvez Street on the Industrial Canal; the rehabilitation of Fort Pike at the Rigolets; the deepening of the bayous and streams of St. Bernard and Plaquemines Parishes, and the placing of beacons and lights thereon, at a cost to the Federal Government of several hundred thousands of dollars; the recent approval of my request for the expenditure of large additional sums for further improvement of the bayous and streams of those parishes—all are among the accomplishments for which I alone can take credit.

The Public Works Administration and the Works Progress Administration have likewise spent millions of dollars of Federal money in New Orleans in the First Congressional District, largely by reason of my personal influence in Washington. Such structures as the new Charity Hospital; new schools in New Orleans, particularly the Francis T. Nicholls High School; new fire-engine houses; the new branch library on Alvar Street, opposite McCarthy Square; the Florida Avenue Bridge; the widening of St. Claude Avenue; paving of North Claiborne Avenue, of Franklin Avenue to the lake, of Canal Boulevard to the lake, and of Marconi Drive; the development of the New Orleans Airport; the concrete stadium in City Park—all are among the many projects financed from those funds for which I interceded in Washington for the benefit of New Orleans.

I have voted for every labor bill presented to Congress in the past 10 years. I am endorsed by President Green of the American Federation of Labor, by the Central Trades and Labor Council of New Orleans, and by every labor organization in the present campaign.

I earnestly solicit your vote for my reelection and ask you to go to the polls on Tuesday, September 10, and vote for me so that I may continue my work for my congressional district.

Sincerely,

J. O. FERNANDEZ.

Why Kelland Is for Willkie

STATEMENT BY CLARENCE BUDINGTON KELLAND

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, the other day I had placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a short statement giving my own appraisal of Wendell Willkie. Today I am placing in the RECORD a statement from one of our noted American authors, Clarence Budington Kelland, telling very briefly and pointedly why he is for Willkie for President.

I consider this a literary gem worthy of a place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The statement follows:

WHY KELLAND IS FOR WILLKIE

(By Clarence Budington Kelland, Noted Author)

NEW YORK.—I am devoting my time and efforts to bring about the election of Wendell Willkie because:

1. I believe in his integrity and ability. I believe that he will fight to the last ditch to preserve and to maintain the Constitution of the United States, and to make secure to the people those essential rights and privileges under which America has thrived.

2. I am opposed to the reelection of Mr. Roosevelt because I believe that a third term is not merely a threat of dictatorship, but is dictatorship itself.

3. I believe that Mr. Willkie will quicken and revive the self-respect of the American people, which has been seriously undermined by the New Deal.

4. I believe that opportunity for all, which has been stifled for 7 years, will come to life again only if Mr. Willkie is elected and Mr. Roosevelt is defeated.

5. Because a vote for Mr. Roosevelt is also a vote for Mr. Ickes, Mr Corcoran, and that curious little coterie of men who have been, with Mr. Roosevelt's consent, the rulers of America.

6 Because I believe that under Mr. Willkie's administration a decent, lawful, solidly grounded prosperity will be reestablished in this land, with a new and better understanding between employer and employee; and because that malignant New Deal policy of setting class to hating class will be abolished from this land.

7. Because with all the strength of my heart and soul I do not believe our revered American institutions and our peace and our home life can survive dictatorship—a preview of which was given in the recent convention in Chicago which nominated Mr. Roosevelt and was compelled to swallow Mr. Wallace.

8. Because Mr. Wendell Willkie has always been loyal to those who deserved his loyalty.

9. Because I believe firmly that Mr. Willkie has been raised up in this emergency to lead this people wisely and equitably to safety and to sanity; because he has been chosen spontaneously by the voices of the people to be their leader in a holy war to preserve the United States and its free institutions.

The Drift Toward War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 6, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, throughout the past year there has been a war hysteria created in the minds of the people, which is highly dangerous to our national safety. The people can determine the policy of this country; they can determine whether we will engage in war or whether we will remain at peace. The voice of the people, in time of national crisis, will largely serve as the guiding hand which controls our destiny. We must keep out of this war. We do not want any part in it. We have our own economic problems which must be solved. These cannot be solved now if we are forced into a war.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an editorial which appeared in the Washington Daily News of very recent date, which expresses my views upon this highly important subject, except I cannot subscribe to the policy of approving a compulsory conscription of our men and boys in time of peace and when war is not imminent. This editorial follows:

[From the Washington Daily News]

WE'RE STRAYING TOWARD WAR

We think a dangerous thing is happening. It is hard to define because it falls within that all-inclusive area called national psychology. It is a matter more of omission than of commission; something more sensed than seen; hard to pin down. We'll try to describe it this way:

As we read the newspapers and the magazines, listen to public speeches and radio commentators, and talk with people, we find peace mentioned less and less and war more and more; what-shall-we-do-if-we-get-in taking precedence over what-shall-we-do-to-keep-out.

A year ago this month, when the President made his fireside speech and a few days later his address to the extraordinary session of Congress, all emphasis was on how to avoid being drawn in. That emphasis—that tone—characterized practically every written or spoken word in those days. It was as nearly unanimous as anything could be in a nation of 130,000,000 people.

We had got into one war. Our fingers had been terribly burned. We wouldn't let that happen again. The main job was to prevent. Every effort should be pointed up to that single purpose.

Gradually, subtly, not deliberately but, rather, subconsciously, an inevitability school began to develop. The emphasis started to shift. "We'll have to get in if this lasts very long" began to be heard here, there, and yonder.

As the Hitlerian conquest spread, particularly when the Low Countries were invaded and then France fell, this new tempo stepped up. The inevitability school gained enrollment. As the realization grew that we were in danger greater than we had dreamed, that it must be billions for protection, and conscription to man the equipment those billions would buy, the emphasis shifted still more and with increasing momentum. The problem grew to look more like a war problem and less like one of merely staying out. National expression moved from negative to positive. So, as the months sped on the national effort lost its unanimity, ceased to point to a single purpose. Still more joined the inevitability school. Either by silence they gave consent, or in what they did say was of war, not its avoidance.

All this without Lusitanias, without our ships being driven off the sea, without those innumerable overt acts which whipped up the war spirit back in 1914 to 1917.

We say this is a dangerous state of mind. "Vice is a monster of so frightful mien, as to be hated needs but to be seen; yet seen too oft, familiar with her face, we first endure, then pity, then embrace."

What to do?

We believe right now is the time to back up for a reappraisal of our national attitude, to take a new look at our hand, to reacquire a perspective we had once and then lost.

As for this newspaper, we are for the billions, we are for the selective draft, we are for the island bases, we are for everything it takes, but all to get ourselves strong for defense—to keep out, not to get in. All to ward off, not to repeat, the loss of life, the 126,000 dead, the 234,000 wounded, the billions spent, the ingratitude, the Uncle Shylock stuff, the double cross and the hangover we got out of the last one.

If you think the same as we do maybe it would be well for all of us to visit some of the veteran hospitals, to call on some of the sick and the crippled and the insane, and then rededicate ourselves to the proposition we saw so clearly 1 year ago this month.

The Fish Amendment to the Military Training Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHIL FERGUSON

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 7, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON POST

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Post for today:

[From the Washington Post of September 7, 1940]

A POLITICAL TRICK

Representative FISH'S amendment would write one word in large letters across the military training bill. That word is "politics."

There is a great deal of confusion as to whether this amendment would actually delay the training of men for military service. Its supporters insist that it would not postpone by one day the actual induction of men into the Army. Registration under the draft would go forward immediately upon passage of the bill, they say, and if the number of volunteers at the end of 60 days were fewer than 400,000, conscription would be used to make up the difference.

Congressman WADSWORTH, joint author of the conscription bill and a vigorous opponent of the Fish amendment, complained that if a call for 400,000 volunteers during the next 2 months should be successful, the Army would be unable to care for them. If the compulsory training bill is enacted without the Fish amendment, tentative plans call for the induction of 50,000 men during the first part of November, 60,000 after November 15, and larger groups in the following months.

So the strongest argument against the Fish amendment is not the possible delay it would entail. More serious would be the psychological effect of a decision to postpone application of the draft until after election.

Congress has already voted approximately $15,000,000,000 for defense preparations. It has recognized that we are unprepared for self-defense in a world where military conquest is running riot. Yet our Congressmen have voted to postpone the operation of an effective military training program until after they have completed their political campaigns.

In other words, the House is willing to falter and fumble because this happens to be an election year. The vote on the Fish amendment thus becomes a grave confession of weakness. It reflects discredit upon the quality of statesmanship in the House. What is far more serious, it suggests that our democratic system is not equal to the stern task of preparing the Nation for defense in the present emergency.

Even though the Fish amendment might not seriously delay the induction of trainees into the Army, it would make hash out of the careful plan represented by the Burke-Wadsworth bill. No one should forget that under this bill voluntary soldiers would still be sought. Many thousands of men are needed to bring our professional Army up to its full authorized strength. These must be obtained through 3-year voluntary enlistments.

The Fish amendment would cut off the flow of 3-year recruits into the Regular Army. Its adoption would bring a drive for 1-year enlistments. We would thus acquire a reserve army composed of both volunteers and drafted men. And the Regular Army which must train these 1-year recruits would be denied the essential increase in its professional personnel.

In approving this bungling proposal House Members were probably swayed by the appeal that the voluntary system be given a last trial. That system is already being used for the only purpose to which it is adapted. Actually the House voted to upset the voluntary 3-year enlistment plan without removing the necessity for conscription.

It appears, moreover, that the Fish amendment would limit the total number of men to be drafted or accepted as volunteers to 800,000. That number is far below the Reserve force which the Army believe to be essential to national defense.

Enactment of this amendment would be inevitably regarded as a cheap political trick. Does the House want the country to understand that it is afraid to take a stand for effective national defense until the campaigns are over? If not, it will hasten to reverse this thoughtless vote and send the military training bill to the President.

Compare Our Problems With England's Problems—Part IV

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 6, 1940

EXCERPTS FROM THE ALIEN MENACE

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting a series of excerpts from the Alien Menace, by Lt. Col. A. H. Lane, an officer in the British Army, who is more interested in England's welfare than he is in political expediency. He, like many in America, tells the truth. He hits the nail on the head, and he sets a good example for Members of Congress of the United States.

In reading this series, the Members will find that the same insidious influences which are undermining England are also undermining the United States—so it behooves us to protect ourselves before it is too late.

The excerpts follow:

ALIENS AND THE BRITISH BROADCASTING COMPANY

Apart from the presentation of patriotic movies and talkies in cinemas, talks by patriots to the millions who are daily and nightly listening in are obviously the most effective means for counteracting hostile film propaganda. Unfortunately, no such talks can be delivered without the permission of the small group of men and women constituting the British Broadcasting Corporation whose citadel towers up today in Portland Place.

This most formidable body, the British Broadcasting Corporation, with an income derived from license for radio sets amounting in 1930 to over £1,000,000 and another income of £160,000 or so from profits on the sale of its publications, received a royal charter in January 1927, when Mr. Baldwin was Prime Minister. At that date it took over the entire staff of the British Broadcasting Corporation, Ltd., a company promoted by the late Mr. Godfrey Isaacs, brother of Lord Reading, and incorporated in 1922. The company, of which Mr. Isaacs was then a director, had in 1922 appointed Mr. (now Sir) J. C. W. Reith to be its general manager. To it had been granted a monopoly of broadcasting by the Postmaster General, Mr. Lloyd George's friend, Mr. F. J. Kellaway.

In the spring of 1928 the British Broadcasting Corporation published New Ventures in Broadcasting, which embodied the conclusions arrived at by a committee of inquiry "set on foot by the joint action of the British Broadcasting Corporation and the British Institute of Adult Education," which institute had for its honorary life president the late Lord Haldane, for its president the Socialist Lord Sankey, for its chairman Dr. Albert Mansbridge, and its vice chairman Prof. H. J. Laski. From those names it will readily be surmised that the Institute of Adult Education, founded in 1921, was and is socialistic.

What did the committee of inquiry set on foot by it and the British Broadcasting Corporation do? It proposed, we learn from New Ventures in Broadcasting, that a "Central Council for Broadcast Adult Education should be created," which council was promptly formed. The council—it contained no clergyman, priest, or woman on it—met with the Socialist Lord Sankey in the chair and appointed an executive committee to assist the British Broadcasting Corporation in preparing its future adult educational program. On the committee was the Guild-Socialist, Mr. G. D. H. Cole, who, with his wife, has frequently broadcast.

Later the Archbishop of York replaced Lord Sankey as chairman of the central council and listening groups of adults were organized. By the end of 1929 the British Broadcasting Corporation was in touch with well over 200 of such groups. It was mainly for the "benefit" of the listening groups that Prof. John Macmurray, a Balliol man, now Grote professor of the philosophy of mind and logic at London University, was in 1930 broadcasting certain shocking ideas (see p. 95) on a "Philosophy of freedom." Among other serial talks arranged by the Central Council for Broadcasting Adult Education for 1930 were "The World and Ourselves—a series of international conversations in which representatives of Great Britain discussed national differences, habits, and political outlook with representatives of * * * Germany * * * Russia, Turkey."

In 1929 a Central Council for School Broadcasting was established. Its chairman was Mr. H. A. L. Fisher, friend of Professor Laski. During 1929 lectures—some of them such lectures—were broadcast to thousands of our schools and over 500,000 pamphlets were issued in connection with the various courses of study. The B. B. C., therefore, aspires to educate not only adults but pupils in schools and, through its Children's Hour, very young boys and girls. In addition to this, it competes with booksellers and with publishers of books and journals. It issues three illustrated weekly journals, the Listener, Radio Times (since September 28, 1923), with a circulation in 1930 of over 180,000 copies, and World Radio, the net sale of whose Christmas 1930 number reached 236,408. In World Radio are given both the broadcasting programs of the Bolsheviks and the wave-lengths from Bolshevik wireless stations.

Unlike the films, the matter broadcast and published by the B. B. C. does not appear to be now censored in any way. According to the B. B. C. Handbook (1929), the post office in January 1927, ceased to exercise any censorship functions over the corporation and, since March 5, 1928, the government has permitted it to broadcast statements involving matters of political, religious, or industrial controversy. The result, as even Mr. Baldwin might have anticipated, has been that subversives of the most dangerous type have been poisoning the minds of the millions possessing radio sets and listening in. For example, in 1929 H. G. Wells and Bernard Shaw were broadcasting their Points of View.

Thus, from January 1927, onward, the B. B. C. has been censoring itself. That the censorship exercised over it by the Post Office before that date was hopelessly ineffective, listeners-in will remember. Why, for example, did the Post Office permit, in the early part of 1923, a wireless debate on Communism?[1]

In January of 1925 an incident occurred which showed that the B. B. C., under the management of Sir John Reith, was leaning heavily toward the left. At the instance of the British Empire Union, Mrs. Nesta Webster, who is a public speaker of the first order, was requested by the company to broadcast. She selected for her subject the French Revolution, on which she is our leading authority. She sent to the company notes which were, as she said, "calculated to offend nobody except the exponents of bloody revolution." She was, however, refused leave to broadcast because her notes, in the opinion of one of the company's omniscient officials, had "the air of an ex parte statement." Mrs. Webster thereupon proposed that she should talk on "Women in Public Life." The company consented to this and, at great trouble to herself, she prepared a talk which "could not appear to be on party politics," and submitted it. This seemed to be acceptable to Sir John Reith and his coadjutors and she was expecting to deliver her talk when, the day before it was due for delivery, she received the following letter from a woman employed by the company:

"DEAR MADAM:

"The Director of Education has handed me your MS. on "Women in Public Life," as being more suited to the women's hour, but I regret that it is too controversial in tone to be permissible, and, moreover, I have had a series of talks on women in Parliament given under the auspices of the National Union of Societies for Equal Citizenship. I regret therefore that I have no alternative but to return your MS.

"Yours faithfully,

"ELLA FITZGERALD,

"Central Adviser, Women's and Children's Sections."[2]

The National Union of Societies for Equal Citizenship advocated votes for flappers.

While objecting to Mrs. Webster's ex parte statements, or rather to her telling the truth about the Jacobins, the company appears to have had no objection to statements of an ex parte nature about the Bolsheviks. On March 25, 1925, a Dr. L. Storr-Best broadcast from Sheffield a roseate account of Bolshevized Moscow and advised his hearers who wished for more information to apply to the secretary of the Society for Cultural Relations Between the Peoples of the British Commonwealth and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics,[3] as to which pernicious society see Mrs. Webster's The Socialist Network (Boswell). Among the more prominent supporters of that body are, or were, H. G. Wells, Bernard Shaw, Mr. Bertrand (now Lord) Russell, E. F. Wise (at one time paid servant of the Bolsheviks), Mrs. Sidney Webb, Leonard Woolf, and Michael S. Farbman, some of whom at any rate would be classed as subversives. Questioned as to the character of the S. C. R., the company in its reply is reported to have said, i. e., "We are assured that the Society for Cultural Relations Between England and Russia has no political intentions."[4] By whom was the company assured? Shortly before, a delegation of Bolsheviks, headed by Tomski, had, owing to the stupendous folly of our Government, been permitted to come to England and to prepare with the general council of the Trades Union Congress a general strike. That the Bolshevik delegation was in close touch with the S. C. R. may be reasonably presumed. From the Blue Book, Communist Papers (1926, Cmd. 2682, p. 132), we learn that the S. C. R. has a curiously mixed membership of intellectuals, persons of "left" sympathies, and members of the Russian organizations in this country and of the Communist Party of Great Britain and that the Communist international favors it as fertile ground for Communist propaganda of the intellectual variety.

Continuing the narrative, a little over 2 months or so before the general strike of 1926 there appeared in the broadcast programs for February 24:

"8.50–9. Speeches at the special general council of the Trades Union Congress in connection with the handing over of Easton Lodge, as a center of working-class education under the control of the general council, relayed from Easton Lodge, Dunmow, Essex. Speakers: The Countess of Warwick and Mr. A. Pugh, chairman of the Trades Union Congress."[4]

A patriot like Mrs. Webster had been debarred from broadcasting, yet the British Broadcasting Corporation relayed the speech of the Socialist Countess of Warwick.

From the above examples it is apparent that the British Broadcasting Co. was not unsympathetic toward left wingers. Before considering the misdeeds of its successor, the British Broadcasting Corporation, it will be well to inspect the latter's personnel in January 1927.

The director general with the very high salary of £6,000 a year was, as now, Sir John Charles Walsham Reith.

He was aided by a board of governors. The chairman of the governors of the British Broadcasting Corporation was a conservative, the Earl of Clarendon, with a salary of £3,000, and the vice chairman a liberal, Lord Gainsford (a Pease), with a salary of £1,000 a year. Lord Clarendon has since been succeeded in his post by a liberal, the Right Honorable J. H. Whitley, ex-Speaker of the House of Commons, whose first wife was Marguerita Virginia, daughter of Giulio Marchetti. The other governors of the corporation in 1927 were the Socialist Mrs. Philip (now Lady) Snowden, Sir J. Gordon Nairne, a director and formerly comptroller of the Bank of England, who married a daughter of the late Baron da Costa Ricci, and Dr. Montague John Rendall, late headmaster of Winchester. Each of them was paid £700 a year.

On the rest of the personnel of the British Broadcasting Corporation, the public has very little information. On March 27, 1929, I, as chairman of the London Council National Citizens' Union, addressed a letter to Lord Clarendon asking him to inform me where I could see a complete list of the staff of the British Broadcasting Corporation, and of the persons employed by it in editing the Listener, Radio Times, and its other publications."

Lord Clarendon did not answer my letter but Sir John Reith, on behalf of the British Broadcasting Corporation, under date of April 4, 1929, wrote to me, as follows:

"Lord Clarendon has sent me your letter to him of March 27.

"While we may regret that you should object to the composition of any of our committees, or question the political impartiality of our work, we cannot agree the rationality of such objection or doubt, and in view of the tone of your letter do not feel called upon to make any further reply. We might, however, refer you to the third paragraph of clause 6 of the corporation's license."

I imagine that Russians asking, if any of them dare do so, for similar information from the broadcasting commissars in Bolshevia receive replies not unlike the one received by me from Sir John Reith. My letter to Lord Clarendon had contained, in addition to that already given, other questions:

"The British Broadcasting Corporation has apparently on its staff a Mr. C. A. Siepmann. Is he a British-born subject, and were his parents and grandparents British-born subjects? Who recommended that Ludwig and Feuchtwanger should broadcast? Why, within a few weeks of the general election, are the Socialists, Mrs. Sidney Webb, Mrs. Barbara Wooton, and Prof. P. J. Noel Baker broadcasting; while, so far as I can see, no prominent anti-Socialist, e. g., Mrs. Nesta Webster or Professor Hearnshaw, is doing so? You may reply that Conservatives have taken part in some of the topical talks or discussions. In that case, I would ask you who selected * * * Mr. Ponsonby's daughter to discuss the political parties with her pacifist and Socialist father?

"In conclusion, I would remind you that on the 8th ultimo, I sent you a report, which I presume you read, dealing with the activities, and containing some of the ultra-socialist utterances of Prof. H. J. Laski. From it you must have gathered that Professor Laski was unlikely to deliver impartial judgments on political subjects. Judge then of my surprise when, on opening the Listener of the 6th instant I found that a broadcast talk by Professor Laski[5] on the 25th ultimo was published in it, the subject of such talk being, of all things, the autobiography of the late Lord Haldane.

"That a Socialist and internationalist professor without any expert knowledge of military affairs should have been chosen by the B. B. C. to review the autobiography of a politician who was Minister of War, who put the nation unwise as to Germany's attitude toward it, and who from a Liberal Imperialist became a follower of the pro-German and pro-Bolshevik, Mr. Ramsey MacDonald, is to my mind conclusive proof that the conduct of the B. B. C. has passed into the hands of Socialists and internationalists.

"If under a Conservative Government the B. B. C. behaves in this fashion, what, my Lord, are we to expect from the B. B. C. in the event of the Socialists obtaining an independent majority in the next House of Commons?"

With regard to Mr. Siepmann or another person of the same surname: The Evening Standard of December 12, 1928 (p. 15, col. 1), published correspondence between Sir John Reith and an aggrieved broadcaster, Mr. E. N. Da Costa Andrade, professor of the University of London. The professor alleged that a member of the B. B. C.'s announcing staff—one Colonel Brand—had been rude to him. Sir John Reith's answer was:

"While I regret the occurrence, I am afraid no good purpose would be served in pursuing further your complaint referring to Colonel Brand. On the occasion of your future talks, Mr. Siepmann or his assistant will meet you."

Siepmann and Da Costa Andrade are not British surnames. If I may venture to make a suggestion, it is that some patriotic peer or M. P. should force the National Government to procure from the B. B. C., and publish a list of the names and addresses of all persons employed by it as broadcasters or in any other capacity, changes of names and nationality by employees being notified on the list. That Bolsheviks under real or assumed names may be lurking in the Portland Place citadel is not an unreasonable supposition. If the B. B. C. is to be judged by the performance of one of its star broadcasters, the Honorable Harold Nicolson, one would not be astonished to learn that Bukharin himself was on the B. B. C.'s premises. Son of that patriotic diplomat, the last Lord Carnock, but educated at Balliol College, Mr. Nicolson on February 21, 1930, in his talks on Persons and Things, said:

"The Moscow Government can scarcely be said to 'persecute' religion in the historical sense of the term. They make fun of it and they render it highly inconvenient and irksome. They persecute individual religious leaders just as they persecute other elements in the state. But the man who wants to worship in his own way is still, I am told (told by whom?), at liberty to do so."[6]

On March 7, in his talk, this peculiar person deprecated all protests against the infamous behavior of the Bolsheviks toward Christians, Moslems, and religious Jews.

"To put it quite badly, if we intervene in the internal affairs of Russia, the Russians (sic) would feel justified in intervening in the internal affairs of the British Empire."[7]

The Bolsheviks, as he was perfectly well aware, had from the outset and were at that time "intervening in the internal affairs of the British Empire."

Thus much, or, rather, thus little, about the personnel of the British Broadcasting Corporation. I will now, by means of a few salient examples, show what the trend of its policy has been. On January 12, 1927—at the time when it received its charter—Prof. Gilbert Murray was "talking on 'The year's work of the League of Nations' (under the auspices of the League of Nations Union)."[8] The professor and the League of Nations Union, of which he is the chairman, are apparently on very intimate terms with the British Broadcasting Corporation, just as the League of Nations Union is on very intimate terms with our Labour Party.[9]

The League of Nations Union's Annual Report for 1920 showed that among the large subscribers to its funds were not only the Peruvian Government and the Zionist Organization, but also Barons E. B. and F. A. d'Erlanger, M. Embiricos, His Excellency Etats Raad H. Anderson, Mr. Gluckstadt, Sir Basil Zaharoff, M. Madsen-Mygdal, H. W. A. Deterding, F. Eckstein, Sir Carl Meyer, and other men and women whose names suggest a foreign origin. See also The Origin and Development of the League of Nations Union (Boswell, 4d.), a documented pamphlet proving, amonst other things, that the League of Nations Union is attached to the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the churches, a body which emanated from a conference of German and other pastors held at Constance on August 2, 1914. Lord Dickinson (father-in-law of Mr. Baldwin's fidus Achates, Mr. J. C. C. Davidson, M. P.) has helped to organize both bodies.

Shortly after Prof. Gilbert Murray broadcast his address Prof. P. J. Noel Baker, a cosmopolitan and another light of the L. N. U., was discussing Foreign Affairs and How They Affect Us,[10] over the wireless. Later in the year the communistically-minded German Jew, Ludwig, and another German Jew, Feuchtwanger, author of Jew Suss, were pouring their ideas into the ears of listeners-in.

After the triumph of Labor at the polls in May 1929—in fact, on May 31, the day after the general election—the mischievous and well-advertised crank, Mr. Osbert Sitwell, was permitted to broadcast eulogies on the American-born Jewish sculptor, Epstein's abortion of a statue, Night. He said:

"A statue (Night) of real interest and beauty has recently been erected in London, and, as usual, the man in the street has expressed the utmost horror. This is only to be expected, however, for a multitude of bad statues jostle him at every turn, and when confronted with a genuine work of art he is by now incapable of any other emotion. Public taste has been degraded to a depth to which it has never fallen before."[11]

The belauding of Night was followed, on July 10, by the first appearance of H. G. Wells in front of the microphone. The topic of his talk was World Peace. In the course of it Wells said:

"World controls of the common interests of mankind, world controls leading to a world government, to a world state, to Cosmopolis, that is the only way to enduring peace in the world. * * * Let us set our faces hard as learners, as teachers, as parents and rulers, as people who talk and influence others, against the teachings of patriotic histories that sustain and carry on the poisonous war-making tradition of the past. * * * And let us discourage the emotions and hysteria of patriotism. Let us check patriotic cant and bear ourselves with a certain critical detachment on the face of patriotic symbols. * * * Patriotism has become the enemy of civilization."[12]

Wells could not have failed to notice that millions of men—and in Russia also, thousands of women—on the Continent were being trained to fight and that our Army, in comparison with continental armies was a tiny one. His unpatriotic balderdash was not rebuked in The Listener. A verbatim report of his talk filled the first three pages and half of another page of its issue of July 17, and in a leading article the public was informed that:

"Men who can see into the future, and who can describe what they see as clearly as Mr. H. G. Wells, are all too rare in this world, and it would be a calamity were they not to hand on their message by means of the microphone" (p. 84).

On August 7, 1914, in the Daily Chronicle, the seer of Dunmow had prophesied that within 3 months from then "the tricolor would be over the Rhine."

On October 21, 1929, Wells was again broadcasting. Among other things, he stated that:

"Militarism and warfare are childish things. * * * They must become things of the past. They must die. Naturally my idea of politics is an open conspiracy to hurry these tiresome, wasteful, evil things, nationality and war, out of existence, to end this empire and that empire, and set up the one empire of man."[13]

A week before, on October 14, Bernard Shaw, in a broadcast talk beginning, "Your Majesties, Your Royal Highnesses, Your Excellencies, Your Graces and Reverences, my Lords, ladies and gentlemen, fellow citizens, of all degrees," had said:

"I must conclude by warning you that when everything has been done that can be done, civilization will still be dependent on the consciences of the governors and the governed. Our natural dispositions may be good; but we have been badly brought up and are full of antisocial personal ambitions and prejudices and snobberies. Had we not better teach our children to be better citizens than ourselves? We are not doing that at present. The Russians are. That is my last word. Think over it."[14]

I invite the reader to look at Shaw and the "Russians" in the photograph opposite, reproduced from one taken at Petrograd (Leningrad) in July 1931. Observe the face of Lunacharsky, the atheistic Minister of Education in Soviet Russia.

As has been seen from the talks of Messieurs Shaw and Nicolson, the British Broadcasting Co. is very indulgent toward the Russians.

Just as in May 1930, the British Broadcasting Co. refused to broadcast the appeal of the late Duke of Northumberland in favor of ex-service men in Southern Ireland, the British Broadcasting Co. in the preceding February refused to relay speeches at the Christian protest meeting (against anti-Christian atrocities in Russia) held in the Albert Hall.

"Shielding," as Mr. Ramsay MacDonald would say, the Bolsheviks "from the blasts of criticism," has not, however, been the only good service done them by the British Broadcasting Co. At the beginning of August 1930, the Bolsheviks' very active ex-servant, Mr. E. F. Wise, C. B., then M. P., who, like Mr. George Lansbury in 1920 and 1926, had been on a visit to the burglars' mecca, broadcast a talk entitled "Try Russia for a Holiday." He said:

"I stayed in a small but comfortable little hotel (in the Caucasus), but most of the accommodation is in holiday homes belonging to the various trade unions. * * * Russians are generally friendly and sociable and, though some of them will be critical at times of England, just as people in England are sometimes critical of Russia, they seldom bear any ill-will at all toward English men and women. * * * Of course, there are risks and difficulties about traveling in Russia, as there are in most other foreign countries. Criminals are to be found in all countries, but my own experience and that of many friends who have enjoyed delightful holidays in Russia is that the long arm of the Government authority (the Moscow murder-gang) maintains (by massacres and torturings) peace and order even in the remoter places on its distant borders. * * * If you are interested in seeing at close quarters an experiment in national reorganization * * * of vast world importance, a visit to Russia is one of the most interesting and novel of holidays."[15]

An honest Socialist M. P., Mr. Joseph Toole, who had also visited Russia, in an article published in the Daily Herald of August 28, 1930, flatly contradicted Mr. Wise.

"I have returned profoundly shocked. From the time I embarked on a Russian ship * * * to the day I crossed to Poland I could see nothing but incompetence, insecurity, insanitation, disease, and want * * * The State there is held by the sword and the rough brutal bludgeon. No personal liberty exists: there is only room for one view, the Soviet view."

The facts adduced and the quotations would suggest that the British Broadcasting Corporation, like its parent, the British Broadcasting Co., is being directed by "pinks" or "reds." How else can it be explained that Prof. John Macmurray, educated at Balliol College, was permitted to broadcast this?

"Our current morality may quite well be a false morality. * * * There is no such thing as a moral law * * * the more law there is in our lives the less morality there is."[16]

Sir John Reith was surely speaking ironically when, on January 2, 1930, he said in the Daily Mail:

"Wireless can broadcast friendship, for it is a very friendly thing. * * * Wireless can broadcast peace. * * * World unity is realizable chiefly because broadcasting is a mighty coordinating force. Imagine * * * if the Wise Men had broadcast to the world: 'We have seen His star in the East.'"

It is more easy to imagine King Herod broadcasting that he had massacred the innocents.

War, Conscription, Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DUDLEY A. WHITE
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 7, 1940

Mr. WHITE of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, there is a feeling on the part of Congress that voluntary enlistment should be given a fair trial before our Government resorts to peacetime conscription which runs far in advance of defense equipment or training facilities.

The administration proposal is not the same as universal service.

Universal service commends itself in that it would, at all times, provide for a limited period of military training of every young man at a given age. It means a continuous plan of developing trained manpower as a safeguard for any and all emergencies. It is based upon the principle that every man owes 1 year of military service, in or out of peacetime, as his contribution to national security.

The pending conscription bill is a horse of a different color. Since at this moment it cannot be considered apart from the warlike flourishes of the New Deal or their insatiable lust for power, I fear its purpose places warlike intention ahead of full peacetime preparation, whereas this country should be bending effort toward preparedness and peace.

War profiteering should never again be countenanced by the American people. Socialization or nationalization of American enterprise is no less vicious. What happened in France on the latter score should be a grave warning to our Nation.

The French Government assumed supreme power over production and distribution. Those great essentials of defense became political footballs for persons desiring continued political power. The whole world saw the result. Production for defense evaporated. Political lollipops tasted good, but they did not stop Hitler. They brought destruction and defeat.

We have been passing out a great many political lollipops in this country. They are easy to take, but Hitler has not built up his war machine with the German people sucking on a sweetened stick, or by taking the easy road. Sooner or later we will have to face the fact that even the United States, great as she is, cannot compete with Hitler's system unless we are willing to lay down some of the political lollipops and put our hands and hearts to the work and sacrifices by which we can build more and better planes, more and better tanks, more and better defense production. Reform legislation enlarging our ease and comfort, as desirable as it may be, fails to serve the most important needs of our Nation when it jeopardizes American lives, American homes, and the preservation of the American system of government.

Coming back to conscription, I would vote for the pending bill if it preserved the fundamentals which represent the American way of life and also eliminated war profits through taxation or otherwise; but I must vote against it, as one who has no political consequence at stake and desires only to keep faith with the ideals and future of the United States, because it makes possible the socialization of American enterprise and creates a needless sweep of power fashioned by power-loving provocateurs and smashes the very rights and liberties which make the United States a republic of free people.

Conscription of both men and resources, in keeping with the American principles, is one thing; needless concentration of power and socialized dictatorship is another. An ever-strong and ready defense is one thing; invited warfare is another. Military training for the defense of our own country is one thing; manpower to be sacrificed to the false gods of secret diplomatic commitments is another. We should sweat and sacrifice for the former; we should shun and fight the latter. I am in favor of complete defense preparation. I refuse to be a party to the encouragement of those in power; to believe that that means they have been given the "green light" to travel the road of intervention.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LELAND M. FORD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 7, 1940

LETTER BY HON. LELAND M. FORD, OF CALIFORNIA, TO THE ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter which I wrote recently to the Attorney General:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., August 31, 1940.

The Honorable ROBERT JACKSON,
Attorney General of the United States,
Department of Justice, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GENERAL JACKSON: I am enclosing herewith a copy of the marriage record of Harry R. Bridges, together with the dates of his various applications, in which he gives this record.

Bridges makes conflicting statements with reference to the same item, which, upon its face, must be perjury. My understanding is that these statements were made under oath on United States Government forms requiring affidavit.

You will note, at the bottom of letter, the registrar of vital statistics of the State of California, filed on December 19, 1938, the following statement:

"There is no record in California of Harry Renton Bridges and Agnes Brown (or McCley) having been married either on December 2, 1923, or May 1, 1934, nor on any other date between July 1905, and June 30, 1938."

It appears to me that perjury has been committed. Will you please advise what steps your office is going to take in the face of these statements?

Very truly yours,

L. M. FORD.

Burke-Wadsworth Compulsory Military Service Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 7, 1940

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, at no time during my service in this House have I ever given more serious, conscientious and deep study to a pending measure than I have given to the bill now before this House, the purpose of which is to provide a system of compulsory military service.

During the past few months there have been numerous and varied bills presented to Congress to strengthen our national defense. I have given my support to all such measures, including appropriation bills and authority to the President to call the National Guard and all reserve components into service. But, after careful study, and a consideration of all available information, I am of the opinion that the present bill to provide a system of compulsory military service in peacetime is not necessary at this time and is such a fundamental departure from the established tradition of this Nation that it should not be adopted at this time, but instead a voluntary system of enlistment should be given a trial.

AMERICAN TRADITION IS OPPOSED TO PEACETIME CONSCRIPTION

To change one of the most basic principles of democracy, upon which this Nation was founded and has existed, and which has had the support of our people through all the years of our national life, from the beginning until the present time, is a serious matter and should not be done except in case of the greatest and most certain necessity.

For more than 150 years this Nation has stood against compulsory military service in time of peace. In this we have stood almost alone among the great world powers. Nations of the Old World have struggled along during all these years chained and bound to the age-old system of supporting large and expensive armies. But in this New World we turned our back on this old order of things and devoted our attention to more peaceful pursuits. We have prospered and grown in power and influence. Our people have enjoyed a standard of living that has far exceeded that of any other nation. Our youth has had the opportunity to enter peaceful occupations without restriction. Our system of government has encouraged them to advance, and in no time of peace have they been compelled to give themselves up to military service. Those who have done so have acted upon a free and voluntary choice. This is democracy as we understand it in America. Any other system is not in accord with our American way.

During the debate on this bill it has been frequently urged that conscription is the democratic way to raise an army. Is it? It is my opinion that conscription in peacetime is far removed from the principles of democracy. Instead, it has the stamp of totalitarianism, and I am convinced that the principle which underlies it is foreign to our American democracy.

The basic idea that supports conscription or compulsory military service in time of peace is the same premise upon which totalitarian states are founded. It assumes that the individual is but a pawn in the hands of the state. Such conscription in time of peace has always been objectionable to free men. Millions of Europeans have left their native countries to avoid compulsory military service in times of peace and have become loyal and devoted American citizens, to enjoy, among other privileges, our freedom from such conscription.

A totalitarian government can compel men to enter the army. It can make them work at jobs they do not like. It can make them worship as they do not choose, and it can tell them that because compulsion applies to all alike democracy has been achieved. This kind of government in other countries, however, is called variously nazi-ism, fascism, or communism.

It has been a glorious tradition of American democracy that never in the entire history of this Nation has it been necessary to resort to peacetime conscription for the purposes of defense. It is a tradition in which we can take just pride. And I am not convinced on the evidence that was produced before the Military Affairs Committee, either House or Senate, that it is necessary at this time to reject or destroy the glorious American tradition of peacetime voluntary service and in its place adopt the worst feature of the totalitarian form of government, namely, compulsory military service.

VOLUNTEER SYSTEM HAS NOT FAILED

The testimony before the Military Affairs Committees of both Houses of Congress leaves no doubt that, notwithstanding the claim that is so frequently made that the voluntary system of enlistment has failed us in this emergency, the facts prove the contrary to be the case.

In support of my statement that the volunteer system of enlistment has not failed I direct attention to the testimony of Gen. George C. Marshall, Chief of Staff of the United States Army. Before the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate he said:

> In June we went ahead with enlisting the force without the funds necessary and had to be cautious until the appropriations bill was actually signed, but I think we secured 18,000 men in June. Our quota, which we assigned ourselves, was about 15,000 by the end of the month, and we reached 15,000 10 days before the end of the month. In other words, recruiting went ahead in good shape.

Subsequent to this testimony it appeared that more than 30,000 enlisted in July, again exceeding the quota fixed by the Army; and in August more than 40,000 enlisted. This number again exceeded the quota that had been fixed. And, in this connection it must be remembered that the term of enlistment was 3 years and at the Regular Army pay of $21 per month. It would be interesting and informative to learn what would be the number of enlistments if the time of service should be reduced to 1 year and the pay raised to at least $30 or $50 per month. There is no doubt in my mind that the volunteer enlistments would rise so rapidly that the Army would have difficulty in finding enough equipment with which to clothe and equip them for training.

The testimony of Rear Admiral Chester W. Nimitz, Chief of the Bureau of Navigation of the United States Navy, also refutes the idea that the volunteer system has failed. In his testimony before the Senate Military Affairs Committee, he said, in answer to questions propounded by Senator REYNOLDS, as follows:

> Senator REYNOLDS. You do not experience any difficulty in getting sufficient voluntary enlistments, do you?
> Admiral NIMITZ. So far we have not. We have today about 7,000 men on the waiting list, waiting to go into the training stations. * * *

I also wish to direct attention to a portion of the testimony of General Shedd, Assistant Chief of Staff of the United States Army, when he appeared before the Senate Military Affairs Committee. Among other questions, he was asked by Senator THOMAS of Utah, as follows:

> Senator THOMAS. You have never tried to recruit men on a yearly basis, have you?
> General SHEDD. No, sir.
> Senator THOMAS. So that is a very important factor. There is a difference in a young man's thinking about himself if he can go out and train for a year and make himself a Regular Army man for 3 years; there is quite a difference.
> General SHEDD. There is a difference there.
> Senator THOMAS. And I was pleased to learn—General Marshall informed us today—that the application for enlistment in the Army was greater than we were told in the press. We have been informed that we were having difficulty in meeting the quotas that the Army is planning for. Now that is hardly true, is it?
> General SHEDD. We are getting them faster than we thought we would. That is correct, sir.

The statements I have read, taken from the testimony of the highest ranking officials in the War and Navy Departments, refute the claims that have been made that the volunteer system cannot be depended upon, and corroborate the claim that has been made that if given a chance, under favorable terms of enlistment and pay, the traditional volunteer system will more than justify itself again by measuring up to the demands of the present.

There is also a further bit of evidence that I wish to bring attention to in this connection. It is a statement made by former Secretary of War Woodring, who occupied that post until a few weeks ago. He said:

> How any fair-minded Member of Congress could say that we have given the voluntary system of enlistment for the United States Army fair trial and that it has broken down, and, therefore, we need compulsory service, is beyond my understanding.

Our danger from invasion is not so imminent that we cannot take the necessary time to give our time-honored system of volunteer service a chance to show its worth. Do not let us adopt the methods of totalitarian states until the situation would leave no alternative. We should try the democratic method first.

If invasion of our land was threatened, or danger was imminent then the situation confronting us would be entirely different. Today, there exists a war hysteria built up by one means or another and based upon the atrocities that other nations have suffered. There has been created a fear upon the part of many that not only is this Nation to be similarly dealt with, but that the danger is at our very door. Present conditions do not justify any such conclusion. On the contrary the Nazi forces have their hands full trying to cross 22 miles of water to invade the British Isles. After 2 months of effort, and with the use of vast numbers of airplanes, it has so far failed in its objective. When we increase the distance to the 3,000 miles that separates this Nation from them and add to it the strength of our Navy, and realize that the Nazis would not be able to use airplanes against us as they are now doing against the British, then it can be realized how unlikely it is that we will be called upon to face any invasion of our shores by Nazi forces. In addition to all this would be the impossibility of finding sufficient ships to transport an invading army with its necessary equipment, that would have any chance to succeed.

The best evidence that there is no real or immediate danger is the fact that up to this present time no Army or Navy officer, nor other competent military authority, has expressed any fear of an immediate invasion, or that it is even remotely possible in the near future.

Further evidence of the lack of immediate necessity to raise a vast army by conscription is the fact that as late as January of this year the President only requested funds for an army of 227,000 men. Even on May 31, of this year, after the Nazi forces had broken through the French lines and France was collapsing, the President expressed satisfaction with an army of 280,000 men, and General Marshall, Chief of Staff of the United States Army, on June 4 testified that an army of 400,000 would avoid the necessity of mobilizing the National Guard, and give reasonable liberty of action up to January 1941. But notwithstanding, legislation has already been passed by Congress that would increase the Regular Army up to 375,000 officers and men, and authorize the calling out, by the President, of the National Guard with its 225,000 officers and men, and the Reserve components of 120,000 men, making a total of over 700,000 officers and men, and for all of which I voted, we are now faced with a demand for conscription of 1,200,000 more men and the registration of from 12,000,000 to 23,000,000 men, according to whether the age limit shall be 30 years or 45 years of age.

All of this indicates a serious lack of knowledge as to just what is necessary. Either the President and General Marshall were wrong in their first estimate or they are wrong now. Certainly, the European situation is no worse than it was in June when General Marshall fixed 400,000 as all that would be necessary until at least January. By legislation already enacted we have nearly doubled his estimate to more than 700,000. Under the present plans of the Army for mobilization this would probably be as many as could be properly housed, clothed, and equipped by April or May of 1941.

Thus it cannot be said that there would be any danger in holding off conscription until that time and thereby give the American peacetime way of voluntary service a chance to demonstrate whether the spirit for the ways of democracy still prevails in this land. The idea of giving a 60-day breathing spell, during which conscription would be withheld to give the volunteer system a chance, while better than no recognition at all of the volunteer system, is entirely unsatisfactory as a substitute or excuse for a system of conscription.

I am definitely of the opinion that if the enlistment period was reduced to 1 year and the pay increased to not less than $50 per month, which, together with clothes, food, shelter, and medical attention, would approximate a total wage of $90 to $100 per month in private life, there would be no difficulty in raising as large an enlisted army as would be desired. And it may be that such a result would be attainable with a pay basis of $30 per month. Until we make peacetime service in the Army to reasonably approximate service in civil pursuits we cannot expect young men to rush into the Army. Make inducements that are worth while and there will be a waiting list of those anxious to serve in the Army, as there is now a waiting list for the Navy. The waiting list for Navy service is definite proof of what can be accomplished when proper pay and other conditions exist.

NOT SUFFICIENT EQUIPMENT FOR PROPER TRAINING

Aside from the principle involved in this proposed legislation, that has created such widespread criticism because of its departure from American traditions, and, the practical situations that justify opposition to the bill in its present form, there is a situation that arises that should have careful consideration; namely, how, when, and where are we going to train this vast Army to be created almost overnight? At the present time the Army has neither sufficient housing facilities, clothing, weapons, or equipment for them. The maneuvers recently held at different places throughout the country demonstrated how woefully lacking the Army is in the ordinary equipment that is necessary for a combat unit. It has been said that at the present time we do not have more than enough equipment to supply a complete combat unit of 75,000 men. This is deplorable if true. Certainly we are all familiar with the fact that gas pipe was used to similate antiaircraft guns, stove pipe for machine guns, and beer cans to represent shells, with no tanks, other than motor trucks marked as tanks, for maneuvering purposes. This is only a small part of the story of unpreparedness with respect to weapons of war. And, notwithstanding the driving force that comes from large appropriations and civilian production managers it is stated that in most cases we will not have the weapons available for training purposes before 1942, and, in the case of ships it will be a much later date. The same is true of airships. We have not sufficient airships available to begin any considerable training of pilots commensurate with the need. Yet, in the face of all this we rush ahead a conscription of men instead of taking the time, necessary to have our volunteer system function in the American way.

What we need today is not men so much as war equipment. Our real weakness today is lack of proper equipment for our men. Until we have it there is little worth-while training that can be given our men. Our energy and planning should be toward procuring war equipment. The necessary number of men to man it will be ready and willing under a volunteer system of enlistment long before the equipment is ready for their use.

NEED IS FOR TRAINED MECHANICS AND TECHNICIANS

Furthermore, as a result of the lessons learned in the war now raging in Europe, it is also plain that what is needed is not so much men who know "squads right" and the other movements learned on the parade ground, as it is for highly trained permanent forces sufficient in number to man expertly the new weapons as they are produced—aircraft, tanks, ships, antiaircraft guns, and all the other intricate weapons of war, new and old. I am of the opinion that our most immediate need today is for trained technical men. Men who know machines. These men are in our shops and factories. They should be kept there and more and more men put there at wages that would attract them to this type of service. Such a plan would be based on a recognition of the military lesson being taught on European battlefields—that comparatively small forces of highly trained soldier-mechanics properly equipped can defeat many times their number of partially trained civilian conscripts, regardless of how courageous the latter may be.

OBJECTION TO PEACETIME CONSCRIPTION IS WIDESPREAD

The opposition to the adoption of the conscription method of raising an army at this time is widespread. Objection has come from every type and kind of citizens and from every walk of life. Church groups, labor and farm organizations, leaders in education, religion, labor, and agriculture have all expressed opposition to this un-American method that sweeps aside all American traditions.

These groups and the representative men and women who have spoken for them are not un-American, they are not "fifth columnists." They are sound, substantial, loyal, and patriotic citizens who love America and who want our country to continue to travel the paths that have been trod by our forebears who helped make America great and not depart into the ways of totalitarian governments. They only ask that if it is necessary in time of peace to raise an army for defense, that then it be done in the American way—by a volunteer, rather than a conscription, system. This is not unreasonable. If it should fail to produce the desired results as quickly as is deemed necessary, then Congress can consider other ways and means. But until it is demonstrated that the volunteer system will not work, there is no excuse or justification for adoption at this time of the conscription system of compulsory military service.

To illustrate the substantial character of the opposition to the conscription method of raising an army in peacetime, I wish to set forth a few of the statements that have been made by leaders and groups already referred to by me.

William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, said:

> In providing an adequate army for defensive purposes, the American way should be followed first. A voluntary enlistment program should be launched by the Government designed to create an army of 1,500,000 men. This would be putting voluntary action before compulsion. American labor would respond to such a program wholeheartedly and enthusiastically.

John L. Lewis, president of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, said:

> I wonder if in our zeal to protect our country from the shadow of Hitler we are not using some of Hitler's methods that will in the end proscribe our civil liberties and create social confusion and unrest to the point that will bring about the very conditions we are trying to escape.

The Railway Labor Executives Association, representing 1,000,000 railway workers, issued a statement opposing conscription at this time, in which it was said:

> There has been no demonstration that the voluntary method will not furnish the necessary manpower.

Speaking for the archbishops and bishops of the Administrative Board of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, Monsignor Michael J. Ready told the House Military Affairs Committee:

> This legislation is too important to be rushed through Congress until all other possible programs have been examined.

The Methodist World Peace Commission, representing 8,000,000 members, said:

Military conscription at this time is not essential to national defense. We refuse to believe that the United States, in order to preserve its own way of life, must cease to be a democracy and become itself a totalitarian regime.

Many more extracts from testimony, statements, and similar expressions of opposition to conscription could be given. But those already given are sufficient to establish the substantial and widespread opposition that exists among all classes of citizens.

TEN YEARS OF MILITARY SERVICE MAY BE REQUIRED UNDER TERMS OF BILL

Proponents of conscription have sought in many ways to sugarcoat the compulsory features of the bill now before us and thereby diminish the opposition against the bill. One of the most common misstatements is that the service provided for in the bill is limited to 1 year. This is not so. But it has been so frequently repeated and so widespread that people generally are of the opinion that the required service is limited to 1 year. As a matter of fact the plain provisions of the bill can require as much as 10 years of service from those who are selected under its terms.

Section 3 (c) of the bill reads, in part, as follows:

(c) Each man, after completion of his military training period, shall be transferred to a Reserve component of the land or naval forces of the United States, and until the expiration of 10 years after such transfer or until he reaches the age of 45, or until he is discharged, whichever occurs first, he shall be deemed a member of such Reserve component and be subject to such additional training as may now or hereafter be prescribed by law.

Thus it can be seen that for the next 10 years, or at least until the draftee becomes 45 years of age, he is subject to be called out for further service. Surely there is nothing now so vital to our immediate defense as to require the extension of what has been termed 1 year of training service into 10 years of service. This illustrates that once this Nation starts down the road of conscription, or compulsory military service in time of peace, there is no saying how long it will remain with us. In this bill it is not limited to the emergency which is presently alleged to exist, nor is the extended service of training confined to the continental limits of the United States or its possessions, nor even to the Western Hemisphere. There is no limitation whatsoever. Nor do I know who will be President of the United States 4 years, 8 years, or 10 years from now. I am unwilling to place the young men of today, by conscription, into military service for the next 10 years without knowing what the conditions may be for which they may be called into service by some President, unknown to any of us at this time. It is a leap in the dark I am not willing to take in a matter so vital to the future welfare of our young men and this Nation.

It is also evident to me that the proponents of this bill have in mind some possible additional military service to be rendered beyond mere training. If such is not the case, then what is the reason for insisting that the field of training may extend to anywhere in the Western Hemisphere? Surely, if training is the only purpose of the bill, it could be accomplished within the continental limits of the United States or its possessions. The fact that an amendment that would have so restricted the training area was opposed by those who favor the passage of this bill creates in me a doubt that will not down that we are getting these boys into something far more serious than mere training. I sincerely hope that subsequent events will not develop to make necessary any more serious service than that which the face of the bill purports to provide for.

PROPOSED COMPULSORY TRAINING UNFAIR IN OPERATION

Furthermore, it is said that this bill is democratic because it acts equally toward all. This is as far from the truth as the allegation that the bill only provides for 1 year of service, the fallacy of which I have just shown. If the age limit is fixed to apply to those between 21 and 45 as provided for in this bill or from 21 to 31 as in the Senate bill there will be, it is estimated, 23,000,000 and 12,000,000, respectively, subject to be conscripted. Of these approximately one-half will be exempted because of dependents or otherwise. Thus, 6,000,000 to 12,000,000, according to age limit adopted, will be subject to conscription. It is stated that not more than 1,200,000 will be called into service at this time. Thus, 1 out of 6 or 1 out of 12 will be called according to whether the age limitation is 31 years or 45 years. What happens to the other 5 or other 11, as the case may be? They are not called for service and therefore are permitted to go on their way and pursue their studies, business, or other occupations, get married and live the life of a normal citizen. Whereas, the 1 boy selected gives up his usual vocation, goes into the Army for 1 year, and remains subject to call for 10 years. Where is there any equality in such an arrangement as that?

Furthermore, it can be readily seen that with discretion lodged in some board, appointed under political influence, that it would be easy to grant favors without doing any great harm to the national defense because only one is to be selected and therefore the others are discharged. If we had not had the sorry experience of W. P. A. being used for political purposes it may be this thought would not have entered my mind. But, having seen human misery utilized by politicians for political purposes, and, work denied to some and given to others solely because of party affiliations, I feel justified in presenting this thought in order that if the bill should pass that the proper administration of the draft shall not become an adjunct to a political machine.

CONSCRIPTION OF MANPOWER LEADS TO CONSCRIPTION OF INDUSTRY AND WEALTH

Permit me to also make reference to another question that is entitled to the most careful consideration. It relates to how far the principle of conscription is to be carried in times of peace. Already we have seen how easy it is to extend the scope of conscription once the principle is adopted. This bill established it with reference to a portion of our manhood, and immediately the demand arose to conscript industry. If the lives of our boys are to be conscripted for military service, then there is no excuse to leave industry in a preferred class, but until it has been more certainly demonstrated that the necessity exists to change our tradition against conscription in times of peace I shall vote against any type of conscription. The Senate responded to this demand and included industry within the provisions of the bill. It is only another step to conscription of labor and wealth. The principle that underlies conscription of manhood as provided for in this bill can readily be extended to all the others that I have mentioned, including agriculture, and then we have a totalitarian state. Now is the time to stop, look, and listen and avoid the danger that will be upon us as a nation and people if we continue to pursue the course that is set before us. It is a course once started upon you cannot easily stop.

If subsequent events should make danger more imminent, and the voluntary system of enlistment failed to produce the necessary men, then is the time to turn our attention to some other system to insure an adequate defensive force and the same with reference to industry. But we should not admit defeat of the American way until it has had a trial. No military authority in this Nation has placed himself on record to say that our danger is so immediate that the trial of the volunteer-enlistment system for the next 3 or 4 months, nor failure to conscript industry at this time, would imperil our national safety. This bill is drawn upon the theory that the American volunteer system cannot succeed. I am not willing by my vote to agree to that assumption without giving the American way a trial. I still have confidence in the patriotism of our people. I believe they will respond in the hour of need. Again, I caution to stop, look, and listen before we discard the American way and adopt the way of totalitarians.

Compare Our Problems With England's Problems—Part V

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

ARTICLE BY LT. COL. A. H. LANE, BRITISH ARMY OFFICER

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting an article by Lt. Col. A. H. Lane, an officer in the British Army, who, like many in America, tells the truth.

The article follows:

ALIEN INFLUENCE IN POLITICS

Before the World War the alien penetration of our political parties had become very noticeable, and it will be remembered how alien financiers in the city of London urged the liberal government in August 1914 to remain neutral during the German attack on France and Belgium. The Liberal Party was then supported by many politically minded aliens and some of them proved during the war to be most undesirable persons. Sir Edgar Speyer, Bart., and Ignatius Timothy Trebich Lincoln, son of Nathan Trebich, both persona grata with the liberal leaders, maintained relations with the enemy during the war. Lincoln was an active and clever spy. He was by birth a Hungarian and a British citizen by naturalization. A clergyman of the Church of England and later secretary to Mr. B. Seebohm Rowntree, he had been, in 1910, elected a Member of Parliament (Liberal) for Darlington.[1] Then some years before the war, at a dinner given in London by free traders in honor of Mr. Lloyd George, a list of those present included a considerable number of rich aliens and persons of recent alien extraction. This alien influence in the Liberal Party and the great financial support the party received from foreign sources explains the hostility of the liberal government and the Liberal Party to all proposals to restrict alien immigration.

But it was after the Great War and during the peace conferences at Paris that this alien influence in our politics became not only conspicuous but dangerous to British interests. Whatever may be said for the conception of a league of nations, the peace conference, out of which the Covenant of the League was evolved, was dominated by interests hostile to the British Empire. The economic consequences of the peace are in a large measure the result of alien intervention in the framing of the peace treaty. The policy enunciated by President Wilson was in some of its main aspects not unlike the policy of the Bolsheviks. Both desired the international control of the world. President Wilson wanted this to be through the League of Nations; the Bolsheviks through the Third (Communist) International. Both used similar slogans, such as "no annexations," "no secret diplomacy," and "the right of self-determination." The "self-determination" slogan has been well described as having the effect of dynamite upon the British Empire. It has done great harm in many countries, but in none more than in the British Empire. These disruptive proposals and slogans provided common ground between Washington and Moscow, though on other matters there might be considerable differences.

In the chapter on The Hidden Hand it is shown how international financiers in Berlin and New York helped Lenin and Trotsky to enter and conquer Russia. The same alien financial influence is to be found behind President Wilson in his League of Nations. This connection was well known in Paris during the peace conference, and Pertinax, writing in the Echo de Paris of April 28, 1920, described this financial influence as follows:

"M. Max Warburg is the chief of the banking firm Max Warburg & Co., of Hamburg. He is the principal shareholder in the Hamburg-American and German-Lloyd Steamship Lines. His two brothers, Paul and Felix Warburg, married, respectively, to the sister-in-law and the daughter of Jacob H. Schiff (born at Frankfurt), are the associates of the latter at the head of the Kuhn, Loeb & Co., of New York. Here we have a financial group which up to the declaration of war by America, in April 1917, was the most powerful link between the politicians of Washington and those of Berlin. From 1914 to 1917 this powerful syndicate showed itself extraordinarily active against the Entente."

Before the war Mr. Schiff was the great financial supporter of the Mural Society of German Jews, and this society had close relations with high German circles. During the war, before America intervened, Mr. Schiff, says Pertinax, "founded the American Neutral Conference Committee, which took upon itself the task of bringing about peace with a victorious Germany. Then appeared for the first time all the formulae of the League of Nations, the anathemas launched against the old diplomacy, which was said to be responsible for bringing about the war. On this point consult the work, How the Diplomatists Caused the War, written by Mr. Heubsch, the colleague of Mr. Schiff on the neutral conference committee."

More light on this alien influence behind President Wilson, the peace conference, and the League of Nations is provided by M. Charles Maurras, in his book Les Trois Aspects du President Wilson. He refers to:

"The decisive influence exercised on Mr. Wilson by a very small company, financiers by profession, domiciled between Hamburg, Frankfort, and New York. They were identified with the Association for the League of Free Nations, with its seat in America, and including among other people, Mr. Felix Frankfurter, president of the War Labor Policies Board; a great banker, Jacob H. Schiff; the Cohens; the Blumenthals; the Chapiros, not to speak of Mrs. Mary Sunkovnich."

Dr. Dillon, in his book on the Paris Peace Conference, also alludes to this alien domination of Mr. Wilson and remarks:

"Of all the collectivities whose interests were furthered at the conference, the Jews had perhaps the most resourceful and certainly the most influential exponents. There were Jews from Palestine, from Poland, Russia, the Ukraine, Rumania, Greece, Britain, Holland, and Belgium, but the largest and most brilliant contingent was sent by the United States."[2]

Dr. Dillon seems to be surprised at the influence these aliens of many lands had over the American President. But if Dr. Dillon had read the Intimate Papers of Colonel House he would have known that the Schiffs, the Warburgs, and other great international financiers of New York had succeeded in 1913, by means of confidential negotiations conducted through Colonel House, in persuading Wilson to accept and support in Congress their Federal Reserve bank scheme. It was therefore not so surprising as Dr. Dillion imagined to find those international financiers, with great interests at stake, in the Peace Conference, keeping in close and constant touch with President Wilson.

These facts give force and meaning to a letter sent by the late Israel Zangwill to a banquet given by the Maccabeans in London in 1920 in honor of the late Mr. Lucien Wolf, "the man who fought for Jewish rights at Versailles last year." Mr. Zangwill wrote:

"The minority treaties were the touchstone of the League of Nations, that essentially Jewish aspiration. And the man behind the minority treaties was Lucien Wolf." (Jewish Guardian, June 11, 1920.)

These minority treaties have caused much trouble and friction in many countries, and British Governments have had more than their share of trouble and expense in attempting to satisfy the "aspirations" of the alien promoters of those treaties. British money, arms, and prestige have been used to protect interests that were and are a menace to the British Empire. (See Alien Control in Palestine, p. 162.) The success of alien intrigue and wirepulling at the Peace Conference, and the way in which British rights have ever since been sacrificed to comply with the demands of alien minorities, justify the comment of Dr. Dillon in the book quoted above. "Large numbers of the delegates at the conference," Dr. Dillon wrote, "believed that the real influence behind the Anglo-Saxon peoples were Semitic" and that the alien formula was: "Henceforth the world will be governed by the Anglo-Saxon peoples, who in turn, are swayed by their Jewish elements."

This criticism of Jewish influence is not anti-Semitic. The critics quoted above are, on the whole friendly to the Jews, but they recognize that this persistent attempt to dominate and control the financial and political policies of the nations of the world and to make them serve the interests of a minority possessing much power, especially in world finance, must create friction and disturbances.

This criticism would apply with equal force to Germans, Dutch, Italians, French, or any other race if they attempted by similar methods to impose their will upon other peoples and to make those peoples more or less subject to their domination. As stated in the preface to this book, I do not approach this subject from a sectarian point of view but from the point of view of an Englishman who believes in "Britain for the British," and who strongly objects to alien interference, irrespective of the faith or nationality of the alien. If the Jews are mentioned frequently, especially in quotations from books, reports, and other documents, it is because they have the fortune or misfortune, according to the point of view, to be more active and more successful than any other aliens in influencing and controlling British affairs.[3]

With this evidence of alien interference at the Peace Conference it is not surprising to find British policy constantly deflected from

[1] In the early hours of Christmas Eve, 1925, one of Lincoln's sons, calling himself John Lincoln, then bombardier in "E" Battery, Royal Horse Artillery, murdered a brewers' traveler. He was convicted of the murder, sentenced to death, and hanged. This throws light on the way in which our armed forces are penetrated.

[2] These quotations are taken from The Cause of World Unrest, pp. 176–183 (Grant Richards, 1920).

[3] Much valuable information on this alien influence at the Peace Conference, and its effect upon British and allied interests, will be found in Mrs. Webster's book, The Surrender of an Empire, chapter II, The Sabbotage of Victory.

British interests, and British Government becoming more and more subservient to alien influence. Conservative and socialist governments have been mysteriously committed to policies and acts fundamentally at variance with the true interests and needs of Great Britain and of the Empire overseas. The coalition government, after the war, began this policy of surrender to foreign interests. Our troubles in India started with Mr. Edwin Montagu's efforts, as Secretary of State for India, 1917, to disturb "the placid pathetic contentment" of the Indian masses. Since then, successive governments have pandered to the revolutionary and alien elements in India, and today the Conservative no less than the Socialist Party is committed to the granting of dominion status to India; though most Conservatives know that India is totally unfitted for dominion status. How is this acceptance of an obviously wrong and mischievous policy for India to be explained? It can only be explained by the evidence submitted in this book, namely, alien control and direction of British political parties and governments.

Other examples of this surrender policy include the termination of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, to please the financial powers of the United States; the abandonment of our naval supremacy at the Washington Conference for similar reasons; the "surrender to murder" in Ireland, where we permitted what is practically a republic to be set up in southern Ireland in order to placate a gang of murderous revolutionaries, and to win the good will of our American cousins. The recently enacted statute of Westminster is but the latest and perhaps the most complete instance of the triumph of the alien forces that are working for the dismemberment and destruction of the British Empire. In this latest example the Conservatives, Liberals, and Socialists of the "National" Government, supported by the Socialist opposition, are to be found passing a measure that actually makes it easy, if desired, for any constituent part of the British Empire to repudiate the British connection and to set up a separate and independent republic. Only aliens and revolutionaries have ever demanded this concession, and it is, as Carlyle would have said, "significant of much," that even the conservative champions of patriotism and imperialism have readily conceded this thoroughly disruptive and anti-British demand of a comparatively small body of aliens and revolutionaries.

These illustrations of policies that are alien and dangerous to British national and imperial interests justify the late Leo Maxse's criticism of the Conservative Government of 1923. Speaking in London on April 12, 1923, on the failure of the conservative government to stand by France rather than Germany, Mr. Maxse commented on the strong family likeness between the machinations of our parliamentarians although bearing different and distinctive labels, "so that if one read the public utterances on international affairs of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bonar Law) or either of the ex-Prime Ministers or the official leader of the opposition (Mr. Ramsay MacDonald), they would hardly know whether it was Mr. Bonar Law, Mr. Asquith, Mr. Lloyd George, or some labor leader, who was speaking." Mr. Maxse ended by asking what was the "intangible, invisible influence in the background bringing pressure to bear on British statesmen, which must ultimately involve them in political catastrophe."

In the chapters on alien revolutionaries and alien influence in industry, will be found further evidence of how aliens endeavor to direct political policies by (1) creating revolutionary situations within the Empire, either through political rebellions, as in Ireland and India, or by causing industrial disputes, strikes, etc.; or (2) by obtaining control of financial and industrial concerns, through which they are able to bring pressure to bear on all governments, especially since the recent practice was adopted of appointing ex-civil servants and ex-Cabinet Ministers to directorships in concerns that are financed and controlled wholly or partly by aliens.

Finally, it may be pointed out that for a long time past the nominal rulers of our Empire have been allowing persons of alien extraction, on our behalf, to undertake diplomatic and financial negotiations of the utmost importance. Two examples of this leap to the eye. During the Great War the Liberal, Lord Reading, a lawyer who for a brief period had been on the stock exchange, was sent to the United States of America to arrange gigantic sums of money for us. In September 1929 our delegates to the conference at Geneva, which was held to decide what financial assistance was to be given to small nations in the event of war were Sir Otto Ernst Niemeyer and Sir Henry Strakosch, whose nephew, as reported in the press, is a certain Baron Georges Strakosch von Feldringen, of Vienna.

Is Our Nation Inviting Disaster?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM LEMKE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 7, 1940

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Speaker, the world is afflicted with war insanity. Our Nation is mentally sick—sick with depressions and recessions, sick with farm deflation and unemployment, sick and tired of war hysteria, sick and tired of those who would sell this Nation's honor, credit, domestic market, and manhood on foreign auction blocks and battlefields. In fact, we are suffering from all the diseases that destroy nations. But there is hope that from our present mental slump we will arise a greater, stronger, and better nation than ever before.

In our bewilderment we seem to become pro-everything—pro-Italian, pro-German, pro-Russian, pro-British, and God knows what not. We are pro everything except the real thing—pro-America. Of course, it is not yet too late to save this ship of state. Surely there are enough Members in this House, together with patriotic men and women of vision and intelligence, to steer this Nation through these troubled waters. The time for calm reasoning has arrived. We have acted too long upon our emotions, emotions fanned into white heat by falsehoods.

We have been the prey of designing foreigners and foreign agents. We have been deceived and defrauded by men in high governmental positions who are more interested in kings and queens and dictators abroad than in our own people. We have been deceived and tricked into selling our national defense to foreign nations. We have been fooled into believing that other nations were fighting our battles—into believing that other nations' wars were ours, forgetting that when the crucial hour comes, if it ever comes, we ourselves must defend our Nation—we ourselves will be its defenders or its destroyers.

In a world of confusion and human suffering we forget that our spiritual well-being is unalterably interwoven with our material well-being. Without spiritual progress there can be no material progress. The two go hand in hand. Christianity, home, and security are the very foundation of our civilization.

This year a lot of things have happened that we could but wish had not happened. Europe has gone insane. War brutality and war hysteria are at large. Small, innocent nations have been crushed by brute force. These nations wanted nothing but to be left alone. Three or four million young men have given their lives on the field of battle within the last 12 months. They have drenched the earth red with blood, and millions more have been maimed and disabled for life. May we ask what for?

These young men had nothing to say about it. They were given a uniform and a rifle. If they refused they were put in concentration camps. As Senator WHEELER so ably has said, "Those who do the fighting and the dying never have anything to say in the making of war." Read Mark Twain's Mysterious Stranger and you will learn how a loud-mouthed few, aided and abetted by the war profiteers, plunge nations into war.

We were deceived into the World War in 1917. Undisputed documents now within the reach of every Member of Congress show that Ambassador Page did not represent the United States, but represented Morgan & Co. These documents show that Mr. Page wrote to Secretary of State Lansing, informing him that Great Britain had defaulted in paying an overdraft of $400,000,000—that she had no cash with which to pay—that she needed huge credits.

Mr. Page then stated that he knew that the American people would not stand for such huge credits unless we first declared war. In other words, send our sons first to European battlefields and then the American fathers and mothers will stand for the huge credits to pay the overdraft to Mr. Morgan. This same Mr. Morgan and his kind are again on the job. We are sure that the fathers and mothers will not again be fooled with Mr. Morgan's philosophy—the making of millions out of human blood.

Out of the first $500,000,000 Liberty bonds we bought, with which to help our boys win the war, $400,000,000 went to Morgan to take care of this overdraft. That was Morgan's patriotism. Unfortunately, the war that we entered to take care of Mr. Morgan's $400,000,000 overdraft has cost us over $65,000,000,000 to date. That $65,000,000,000 is responsible for the depression and the recession—responsible for all the homes and businesses that have been wrecked—responsible for thousands of suicides.

And so, today our prayers go out for France, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Finland, Norway, Denmark, Holland, and China, where millions of innocent men, women, and children have been made homeless and hungry by war's brutality and insanity. Our hearts bleed for all the nations that want to live in peace and be left alone, but whose territories are being so ruthlessly invaded and their people so cruelly dealt with by brute force.

But we cannot change the ways of Europe. They have had wars there for over 3,000 years. They will have wars there until their people have the intelligence and the courage to form the United States of Europe. Then and then only will Europe be able to wipe out the religious and racial hatreds that breed war. We cannot do this for them. They must do it for themselves.

We have furnished the allied nations everything that we have except our young men. These we will not again give them. We are sorry if unauthorized promises were made to these nations. Such promises should never have been made. No one man in this Nation has a right to pledge the lives of our sons on foreign battlefields. We have not yet knowingly consented to a dictatorship in this Nation.

Let us not permit ourselves to be swept off our feet by war hysteria, by false propaganda. The penalty will be too severe. It may cost the lives of millions of our sons. In the World War 126,000 of our sons were killed and died on the field of battle, another 234,300 died from injuries, and a million have died since from diseases contracted while in service. Surely we do not wish to repeat that experience. If we again permit ourselves to be deceived into this war it will be the rock upon which our form of government will perish. We will emerge with a full-fledged dictator.

As I listened to the war-mad psychology of the people in Italy when they cheered the declaration of war by Mussolini, I wondered whether the mothers and the fathers who were cheering so madly had gone insane. I wondered if they knew what it all meant. I wondered whether when they receive word that their son is no more, they will continue to cheer. I am very much afraid that in their madness they forgot all about the realities of war.

We are all shocked that the demons of war have again been let loose in Europe and Asia. We must keep these demons out of the Western Hemisphere. These are trying times even for our own country. We still have millions unemployed. We still have hunger and want in the midst of plenty. Last but not least, we again have a few superpatriots who again would wrap the flag of glory around themselves and grab everything in sight. They would again monopolize the patriotism of this Nation that is common to us all.

These are the real traitors. They would divide our people when all should be united. It is to be regretted that these profiteers and patrioteers have gained a considerable camp following—politicians who have nothing to recommend them to the public confidence except the false issue of national defense. These politicians in their ignorance forget that the American people have not yet been swept off their feet by emotionalism, by war hysteria.

National defense is not an issue in this campaign. These politicians will not be permitted to ride into office on that kind of a false issue. We are all for adequate national defense. Since 1920 Congress has appropriated about $31,000,000,000 for the War and Navy Departments—for national defense. This, if equally divided, would give $238 to every baby, every boy and girl, and every man and woman in the United States.

These appropriations were made in accordance with the evidence presented at hearings before the Military and Naval Affairs Committees of the House and the Senate. If that was not enough, then it was not the fault of Congress. I have never opposed any appropriation for national defense. I have opposed appropriations for national aggression, for foreign nations' defense.

But remember that more than mere appropriations of money is necessary in order to get real national defense. There must be a national-defense policy. Also remember that the money that Congress appropriated the American people will have to pay. Therefore it is up to Congress to see that they get their money's worth of defense. Just blindly pouring money out of the Treasury will not provide us with national defense.

During this Congress, the Seventy-sixth, we have appropriated about $14,500,000,000 for national defense. This is an added indebtedness of $110 for every man, woman, and child. This $14,500,000,000, if equally divided, would make 14,500 millionaires. It will have to be paid back by the taxpayers with interest. It will not be paid by us nor by our children, but sometime in the future by our great-grandchildren. When it is finally paid with interest it will have amounted to many times $14,500,000,000.

We are told that it will take about 3 years to spend this money—that we will not be able to equip a large Army before 1943. We are informed that we have only a few first-class fighting planes, but that many more have been and will be ordered. Congress appropriated money and ordered over 6,000 airplanes during the last 4 years. The President says they are "on order." The truth is they have been "on order" but as fast as they were built they were turned over to foreign nations.

While we sympathize with some foreign nations our national defense should come first. No other nation will or can fight our battles. Nor are we foolish enough to ever entrust our safety to any other nation. Poland, Holland, Belgium, and France did that to their sorrow. That stupid doctrine is not the doctrine of pro-Americans. We are not here interested with the propagandists and paid agents of other nations.

Let us use common horse sense. Let us never depend upon George to defend us or to fight our battles. Let us have our own national defense and be prepared to fight our own battles if war comes. The time has come, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], chairman of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee, so ably stated over the radio, that we should provide our own national defense and depend upon ourselves to defend ourselves. Otherwise we may come to grief.

Again we must decide what we want to defend. Do we want to defend the United States alone? That is one kind of defense. Do we want to defend the Western Hemisphere? That is another kind of defense. I favor and always have favored a national defense that will include the entire Western Hemisphere. But let us not imitate Europe and turn this hemisphere into another armed camp.

Our international bankers tell us that we should police the whole world. This would include protection for their foreign investments. Our answer to these is that we are not big enough to do it—it would be beyond our power even if we wanted to. If we protect the Western Hemisphere from European and Japanese aggression, we will have plenty to do. We will have to leave Europe to clean up its own house.

I am also interested in the human as well as in the material side of national defense. I am interested in the soldiers, the sailors, the marines, and the aviators. These, after all, are our real national defense. Without soldiers, sailors, marines, and aviators, there can be no national defense. Without them, the warships, submarines, and airplanes will be at a standstill, and cannon, machine guns, and rifles will remain silent.

Because of this I have always been interested in the veterans of all wars—in the flesh and blood of our national defense. I feel that if the Nation wants able-bodied, patriotic young men with strong nerves and keen intellect for national defense, it will have to compensate the veterans who have fought its wars. Therefore I opposed the so-called Economy Act that deprived the disabled veterans of their just compensation. I felt that the President's frequent vetoes of veterans' legislation were unjustifiable. I voted on every occasion to override such vetoes.

It was because I believed in the human as well as in the material side of national defense that in 1919 I drafted the first State World War veterans' compensation bill in this Nation. Under this bill, North Dakota paid the veterans of the World War an additional compensation of $25 per month from the day that they enlisted until the day of their discharge. It was because of this same reason that I have voted for and supported all veterans' legislation sponsored by the American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, and other veterans' organizations since I have been a Member of Congress.

We all realize that in order to have real national defense we must have a united patriotic people back of our soldiers, sailors, marines, and aviators. Patriotism does not grow in seedbeds of filth, slums, poverty, want, hunger, and rags. It grows only in seedbeds of hope, aspiration, and opportunity. I have always supported liberal legislation to prepare proper seedbeds for real patriotic Americans to grow in.

The nation that does not protect its protectors cannot long endure. No nation on earth is great enough to ignore the appeals for help of its citizens. There are times when a nation must protect its citizens from misfortune in order to preserve its nationalism. Patriotism is the feeling that you are a somebody. It is the feeling that you belong to a nation that is not only powerful, but that is interested in your welfare.

Without this feeling of security and reciprocity, there can be no true patriotism on the part of the individual—there is no nationalism. The 10,000,000 unemployed and the one farmer out of every five who lost his farm are more dangerous to our democracy than the combined armies of Hitler, Mussolini, and Stalin. Real national defense consists in making these people again self-supporting and home owners.

It is for this reason that I have worked for and am supporting H. R. 8748, known as the Farmers Union debt-adjustment bill. This bill would refinance those farms that are mortgaged for more than they are worth by reducing the amount of the mortgage to the productive value of the farm. It would permit an adjustment of the feed and seed loans. They should be canceled. These farmers fed the Nation below the cost of production while they were losing their farms.

During the discussion on this bill we heard a great deal about soft credit and soft money. Of course, these expressions are just repeated parrot-like by those who know nothing about money or its functions. These individuals do not understand that the difference between soft money and soft credit and hard money and hard credit is the same as that between a soft-boiled and a hard-boiled egg. If you get the egg you can live. If you do not you may starve.

It is for this same reason that I have consistently worked and urged Congress to pass the Frazier-Lemke refinance bill—a bill that, if passed, would have saved hundreds of thousands of farm homes. This bill would refinance existing mortgages on farms and homes at 3 percent per annum. The interest rate would be 1½ percent and the balance of each payment would be applied on the principal on the amortization plan. The stability of our Government depends upon homes.

When I became a Member of Congress 8 years ago, the farmers were paying 5½ percent interest on their Federal land-bank loans. This has now been reduced to 3½ percent, as a direct result of the fight that we made for the Frazier-Lemke refinance bill. This was the compromise between 1½ percent and 5½ percent. We will ultimately get the Frazier-Lemke Refinance Act.

It is for the same reason that I have consistently urged Congress to pass the cost-of-production bill. This cost-of-production bill would have increased the farmers' yearly income $7,500,000,000. Since every dollar of farm cash income increases the national income by $7.55, therefore the national income would have been increased by $56,625,000,000. That would have meant prosperity by "plenty" and not starvation by "scarcity"—by the curtailment and the destruction of agricultural wealth.

This bill would give 100 percent parity—cost of production on 70 agricultural products in place of 75 percent of parity on only 5. When this bill becomes a law the Government will no longer have to bail out the farmer—the farmer will then bail out the Government.

Again, it was for this same reason that I sponsored a bill to the effect that the unconstitutional hog-processing tax be paid back to the farmer. The evidence shows conclusively that the farmer paid this tax in lower prices. But Congress has not yet had the decency to pay back this tax illegally and fraudulently extracted from the hog producers. Oh, yes, we paid back all other unconstitutional taxes to the railroads, to the processors, to the packers, and to the cotton and tobacco growers; but the plea of the hog-producing farmer has been consistently ignored. They say the amount is too large. Query: If one steals enough, does that make it legal?

For the same reason I opposed the reciprocal-trade agreement law. In the last 7 years we have imported from foreign nations $8,373,652,981 of agricultural products, substitutes, and manufactured products thereof. That is the foreign valuation. The domestic valuation would be over $16,750,000,000. That is what the consumer paid. That is what our own people should have received instead of foreigners. In place of the stupid curtailment and destruction of agricultural wealth, it would require an additional 87,237,280 acres to produce sufficient agricultural products for our own people.

This would have been sufficient to have handed to every head of our 6,000,000 farm families a check for $2,790. That money would have done billions of dollars' worth of business in our own country. It would have kept the idle employed; it would have given buying power to the Nation.

During the 5 years that this reciprocal-trade agreement law has been in effect we have imported $6,189,997,000 worth of agricultural products and substitutes from foreign nations. Again, that is the foreign valuation. The domestic valuation would be $12,379,994,000—equal to a check of $2,063 for every one of our 6,000,000 farm families.

During the same 5 years we have imported 2,335,273 head of cattle and 758,466,496 pounds of meat and meat products. This was equivalent to another 1,896,166 head of cattle—making the total importation of meat equivalent to 4,235,439 head of cattle in 5 years. These our own people should have raised, not foreigners.

About a year ago 7,000 foreign geese were goose-stepping to United States dinner tables. They were driven 750 miles from Prince Edward Island to Mansfield, Mass.

On July 20, 1940, Argentine corn was sold in Boston in competition with American corn, although our Government and our farmers had millions of bushels in storage.

On September 7, 1940, Dr. Leopoldo Melo, chairman of the Argentine delegation to the Pan-American Conference in Havana, informed the American Chamber of Commerce that after the November election the United States would import Argentine meat. He stated:

> I am going to be indiscreet. Mr. Roosevelt told me that the present hour of political struggle is not propitious to raise this issue because some western Senators are possibly more inclined to listen to the aspirations of their voters than to the facts of the case as explained by the President.

Yes; more interested in American than in Argentine citizens.

Another way to serve the farm problem would be for the Government to encourage a 10-percent alcohol-gasoline blend. I have consistently supported and advocated this legislation. Some foreign nations use as high as 20- to 30-percent alcohol-gasoline blend. If we would require a 10-percent blend, then there would be no further question of an agricultural surplus. The surplus could be used in producing the alcohol. It is now admitted that a 10-percent alcohol-gasoline blend is just as good if not superior to the regular gasoline. Eventually Congress will have to give us this legislation. Why not now?

Another factor in national defense is water. Our Nation has been going dry. I am glad that the Members of the semiarid States have consistently supported water conservation. Through the efforts of the North Dakota delegation the Buford-Trenton and the Lewis and Clarke projects in my own State are a reality. In addition, the Bowman-Haley, the Bismarck, and many other small irrigation projects are now being surveyed and investigated as to feasibility. These projects, I hope, will be granted by the Federal Government in the near future.

Over 5 years ago I introduced a real water conservation bill. This bill provides for a standing appropriation of five hundred million. This bill has for its object the creation of five hundred thousand to a million water holes, lakes, and water basins in the interior of the United States. Our water levels have fallen 52 feet since 1878. This bill will restore the water to its original levels—that will be real national defense.

Finally, as part of our national defense, let us give an assurance of security to all. Let us enact into law the Townsend national recovery plan. I cannot understand why some Members of Congress are so afraid that the people who have created the wealth of this Nation may get too much of it back. Old-age pension should be called old-age compensation, because any person who has worked at a useful occupation from the age of 20 to the age of 60 has produced enough wealth to take care of himself for the rest of his life.

This is not a pension; it is not charity; it is compensation for useful labor performed or for wealth actually created or produced. Owing to mechanical inventions and chemical discoveries we find that we now have an abundance for all. Our problem is no longer to produce more for fear that the morrow may not bring plenty, but rather how to distribute the things that we have and that are essential to our well-being.

The Government pensions its old mules at a dollar a day. It does not require the mule to sign away his birthright or stall, manger, or home as security so that when he goes to his reward the Government may get the dollar back. Neither does it ask the mule about his relatives and why they do not take care of him.

That same Government allows only 67 cents a day for its old people. But in many States before they can come under the Social Security Plan they have to sign away their homes and either prove that their relatives are unable to take care of them or that they are so mean and brutal that they will not do so. And this is the year 1940, and in the United States of America.

In conclusion, if the President and Congress want real national defense let them enact the program I have outlined above and this Nation need fear no other nation or combination of nations. We will then have a united, self-supporting, self-sustaining, and self-respecting people. No one need then question their patriotism.

Compare Our Problems With England's Problems—Part VI

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 7, 1940

EXCERPT FROM THE ALIEN MENACE

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting a series of excerpts from the Alien Menace, by Lt. Col. A. H. Lane, an officer in the British Army, who is more interested in England's welfare than he is in political expediency. He, like many in America, tells the truth. He hits the nail on the head, and he sets a good example for Members of Congress of the United States.

In reading this series, the Members will find that the same insidious influences which are undermining England, are also undermining the United States—so it behooves us to protect ourselves before it is too late.

ALIEN INFLUENCE IN EDUCATION

Our British educational institutions have been undermined by alien influence. Many of the professorial chairs and lectureships are held by men of alien race, while quite a perceptible proportion of the students are of alien blood.

We opened our educational institutions (many of them endowed by old benefactions and more recently subsidized by the British Exchequer) to all comers, irrespective of age or sex, race or creed. Age and sex matter little, but race and creed are fundamental. And now, alike among the teachers and the taught, an alien influence boding ill for English traditions, customs, and codes has long since sprung into existence and is making its presence felt. None of these elements loses any opportunity to abuse the tolerance which we have accorded them; their influence and activities are devoted to the promulgation of disloyal, seditious, and revolutionary teachings. They are eternally seeking to replace patriotism and nationalism by pacifism and internationalism. Alien people are corrupting our young, and they constitute a dangerous and weakening element in our midst.

Old foundations endowed for the purpose of teaching Christian children are passing into the hands of those who will use them as instruments by which the alien shall benefit and the native shall suffer.

But the subversive movement is not limited to the higher educational institutions; it embraces the elementary schools and (what is more alarming) our spheres of entertainment, particularly the films. As to the schools, the reader may perhaps remember that in a recent case reported in the press (in which a school teacher took action against a number of people for libel and won his case) we read that portraits of the King and Queen Victoria were removed from the school; a wooden model of the Cenotaph had also been removed; a number of boys from the Socialist Sunday school objected to singing Rule Britannia; and that the whole idea of Empire Day celebration by the school as a whole was given up. A report of the case appeared in the Times of July 17, 1928, and I recommend the reader to study it closely. It is illuminating as an example of the trend of political thought fostered in the minds of the young today.

The "red" schools—Socialist, Communist, or proletarian—are of alien birth and are maintained by alien funds and influence. The proletarian schools in our large cities and towns are blatantly blasphemous, filthy, and revolutionary in their teaching. They extol the Russian murderers as heroic figures. The Communist schools have been replaced by nuclei, on instructions from Moscow, which has adopted the newer doctrine that is to infect masses. Mass work is the new Communist creed, for it was found that the schools were insignificant and only helped those already converted to communism. The schools have disappeared to give way to the nuclei—the cells within the State schools, factories, and so forth—a method by which 2 or 3 Communists can scatter, day in and day out in worktime, in mealtime, and in playtime, the evil seed of communism, which later is to produce the bolshevisation of Britain.

The Socialist schools, now about 35 years old, are merely seedground for communism—the shadow before the substance. There are about 150 in number, and the teaching is watered communism, with a mild form of class hatred, and a set of prima facie altruistic precepts, only to be applied to fellow Socialists. There is generally a mass of doctrine leading the children to grow up to hate and despise their fellows; children (easy prey) whose nature and outlook become distorted—Communists in embryo.

The whole plan of these schools, nuclei, and so forth, being alien in origin, is fed by alien teachers, who give regular or occasional lectures of an un-English type, always antipatriotic, if not always openly disloyal. The British children are encouraged to correspond with Soviet children, and very evil are most of the replies coming here. They see plays and playlets with titles such as "Mr. God is not at Home," and altogether are cunningly made familiar with atheistic and anti-British ideas at every possible opportunity. And wherever one finds socialistic or communistic work proceeding, one will also find an alien in charge, or in close counsel with those conducting the diabolical work of poisoning the decent British child at its most impressionable age.

In 1861, a systematic attack was begun on our great public and our endowed schools. The Public Schools Commission investigated the condition of Eton and Winchester Colleges and the schools of Harrow, Shrewsbury, Rugby, Westminster, Charterhouse, St. Paul's and Merchant Taylors', while in 1864 the Taunton Commission, on which sat Dr. Jowett's friend, Frederick Temple, set to work to report on the other endowed schools. It is noteworthy that the former commission "received a memorandum on higher education in Prussia," furnished by Bethmann-Hollweg.[1] The commission's report adversely criticized Eton College and the other public schools, and in 1868 an act radically "reformed" them.

Similarly, the very voluminous report of the Taunton Commission, which, according to Professor Adamson, was "greatly impressed" by the "example of Prussia with reference to the administrative side of their problem,"[2] was followed by drastic legislation in 1869. That both sets of schools needed remodeling cannot be gainsaid, but why the commissioners paid such attention to Prussian precedents it is difficult to understand. What suited militarized and despotic Prussia was not likely to suit pacific and democratic England and Wales. It is also, a most illuminating fact that the one wholly laudable thing in Prussian education, viz, the inculcation of patriotism, was not thought worthy of imitation here. In neither our public, endowed, nor our state schools have pupils, as in the United States been obliged daily to salute the national flag. Moreover, owing to Greek and Latin remaining compulsory subjects at Oxford and Cambridge Universities, the teachers, mostly classical men, in the public and endowed schools continued, as a rule, to look down on modern languages, with the result that the number of Britons who, before the Great War, could read, write and speak German and French remained very small, which distinctly benefited polyglot aliens and prevented any considerable section of our upper and middle classes properly observing the maneuvers of the House of Hohenzollern. Some hidden hands protected the Greek and Latin industries at Oxford and Cambridge.

Meanwhile politicians and agitators were clamoring loudly for State education, some of the serious objections to which were overlooked. In 1870, W. E. Forster, a Quaker, married to a sister of Dr. Jowett's friend, the Balliol agnostic, Matthew Arnold, who was an apostle of Kulture, spelt by him "Culture," passed an education act revolutionizing our system of elementary education. Accompanied by the foundation of the National Union of Elementary Teachers (later the National Union of Teachers), which has today such a stranglehold on our Government, it brought into existence school boards and board schools. In the new schools no religious catechism or religious formulary distinctive of any particular denomination was to be taught. At Forster's elbow was his brother-in-law, the poet Matthew Arnold.

"The bulk of the pioneer work which led to the act of 1870 was done by Matthew Arnold * * *. For the State control of education in Prussia he had nothing but praise * * *. On the whole, the example of Prussia in educational matters, as reported by Arnold, was one of the main causes of the passing of the act of 1870."[3]

At Forster's elbow, also, stood Anthony John Mundella. He was son of Antonio Mundella, an Italian refugee from a village near Como. In 1848 Mundella had been taken into partnership by Messrs. Hine & Co., hosiery manufacturers in Nottingham.

"His business took him to Chemnitz (in Saxony), where his firm had a branch factory; what he saw there led him to study the educational systems of Saxony, Prussia, and other States."[4]

Returned to Parliament in 1868, Mundella had become a prominent advocate of compulsory education for all, and "none" we are told, "rated more highly than Forster his (Mundella's) share in procuring the Education Act of 1870."[5] Appointed by Gladstone in 1880 vice president of the committee of the council for education, he was responsible for the act of 1880 making attendance at school compulsory.

The next great step in our elementary education, the unstatesmanlike Balfour Act of 1902, appears to have been the outcome of intrigues by the proalien Fabians.

"In May 1899 * * * a member's meeting (of the Fabian Society) was held to discuss the Educational Muddle and the Way Out in the form of 16 resolutions, 6 on General Principles and the remainder introduced by Sidney Webb (now Lord Passfield) and the General Principles, advocating the transfer of education to the local government authority and the abolition of school boards, were adopted. * * * At the adjourned meeting in November 1899 * * * a draft tract was submitted * * * and with minor amendments the scheme was adopted. It is unnecessary to describe the Fabian plan, because it is substantially the system of administration established by the act of 1902, under which present-day education is organized. * * * The scheme proposed by Mr (A. J.) Balfour followed almost precisely the lines laid down in our tract, which was published in January 1901. * * * Our support of the conservative Government in their education policy caused much surprise."[6]

Mr. (afterward Lord) Balfour abolished school boards, placed elementary education in the hands of municipal councils (i. e., of demagogs), and put denominational schools on the rates. Nothing did more, as Webb and his friends had doubtless anticipated, than did the act of 1902 to cause the electorate to reject the conservatives at the election of 1905. But worse for the nation was yet to come.

During the Great War, Mr. Lloyd George, to the amazement of everyone who knew Mr. Fisher's record, appointed Mr. H. A. L. Fisher president of the board of education. In the latter's education bill of 1918, which added hugely to the burdens of the taxpayers, there was no mention of science—the Great War apparently had not convinced Mr. Fisher of the importance of science—and Lord Sydenham's amendments to introduce elementary science into the curriculum, to fix the minimum hours for physical exercises, to embody training of the Boy Scouts and Girl Guides type, were, of course, rejected by the liberal pandit. Had those amendments been accepted it might, however, have given great offense to the aliens and the pro-aliens who, in 1918 were, as now, orienting the policy of our Government.

That aliens have gained control of our elementary education was forcibly brought home to me, personally, in 1928 in connection with an item before the London County Council meeting on February 7, 1928.

In the agenda there was a recommendation by the education committee to amend the standing order, which states that: "No persons other than natural-born British subjects shall be taken into the employment of the council either in a permanent or temporary capacity," by the inclusion of the words, "and naturalized British subjects."

Immediately I heard of the matter I communicated with several friends and well-known people on February 6 (the day before the meeting), and letters were sent to individual members of the council with the result that the amendment was not moved at the meeting "in deference to the adverse opinion expressed beforehand," as one member stated later. It was thought then that we, who had taken such energetic measures with conspicuous success, had no further need for troubling ourselves over this particular matter. We had, however, overlooked a mysterious influence and underrated the pertinacity of the promoters of the amendment. On December 4, 1938, the London County Council, without any adverse comment in the press, amended standing order 382 (which lays down that no persons other than natural-born British subjects shall be employed) so as to permit naturalized aliens to be employed in any capacity by the council. This means, of course, that German teachers can be employed in our schools and, as is well known, according to the law of the Fatherland, a German does not lose his nationality by becoming naturalized outside his country. "Once a German, always a German."

When the amendment was brought before the general purposes committee of the London County Council there was put forward as a reason for the amendment the fact that the recently naturalized aliens—Poles, Germans, Russians, etc.—who failed to secure employment, "would have to be given public assistance or charitable doles." This, to me, is a futile excuse, and it leads me to ask why should we allow these people to come to this country at all; and why naturalize them if, by so doing, we are compelled to find them employment to prevent them becoming a charge on the public?

Strong protests have been made against this unnecessary action by the council, and it was hoped that the decision to amend the standing order would be reversed, especially since it was pointed out to that body—if its members did not already know—that there was a long waiting list of British-born and fully qualified teachers seeking employment, and that there were 700,000 unemployed ex-service men. Seeing, however, that the London County Council each year is getting more and more under the control of people of recent alien extraction, I am afraid the hope is illusory.

Does not the above incident show how easily offical people may be induced to acquiesce in the relaxations of regulations? Moreover, what can one think of an education committee which, knowing that large numbers of British-born teachers are out of work, recommend aliens—who observe the mere formality of naturalization—to enter an already overcrowded field of our public service? Is it likely that they will teach their pupils from a British standpoint? It is now well known that the Communist Party do not concentrate so much on their "Red" schools, but rely on the Socialist teachers of council schools.

The vast majority of the teachers in our elementary schools are members of the N. U. T.; a considerable number of them belong to the Educational Workers' League, formerly the Teachers' Labour League, affiliated to the Educational Workers' International, an International formed in 1919 and manifestly designed for the purpose of bolshevising teachers.

The hub of academic socialism is the London School of Economics, founded in 1894 by the Fabirns, Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Webb (Mr. Webb had been educated in Switzerland and Mecklenburg-Schwerin), with the aid of the late Lord Haldane. Prof. J. H. Morgan, K. C., has thrown a flood of light on the aims of that institution's founders and endowers.

"When I once asked Lord Haldane why he persuaded his friend, Sir Ernest Cassel, to settle by his will large sums in trust on a certain educational establishment, the London School of Economics, of a peculiar type, six of whose teachers stood at the last general election as labor candidates, * * * he replied, 'Our object is to make this institution a place to raise and train the bureaucracy of the future Socialist state.'"[7]

Who were in 1929 at the London School of Economics "training the bureaucracy of the future Socialist state"? In that year among its appointed and recognized teachers were—nearly one-third of them—the following:

Frederick Rudolph Mackley de Paula, O. B. E., Sir Ernest Cassel professor of accountancy and business methods.

Edith Verena Eckhard, sociology.

Herman Finer, public administration and political economic science.

Morris Ginsberg, reader in sociology.

Theodor Emanuel Gugenheim Gregory, professor of banking and currency.

Harold Joseph Laski, professor of political science.

Hersh Lauterpacht, international law.

Bronislaw Malinowski, professor of anthropology.

Alexander Feliksovich Meyendorff, reader in Russian institutions and economics.

Charles Gabriel Seligman, professor of ethnology.

Sir Henry Herman Slesser (Schloesser), K. C., M. P., industrial law.

Edward Alexander Westermarck, Martin White professor of sociology.

Abraham Wolf, professor of logic and scientific method.

On the competence and patriotic sentiments of the above gentlemen and the lady I make not the slightest reflection, nor, of course, do I say that these teachers are aliens or naturalized aliens. Their forebears may have been here for generations, but the names do inevitably lend a foreign color to this educational institution.

There have been, also, citizens of the United States of America among the appointed and recognized teachers in this institution which receives from the British Government a grant of 40,000 pounds a year.

Since 1929 Sir Henry Slesser has been raised to the bench and made a Lord Justice of Appeal. But Messieurs Finer, Ginsberg, Gregory, Laski, Lauterpacht, Malinowski, Meyendorff, Seligman, Wolf, and the lady are there, while Mr. G. L. Schwartz, Mr. M. M. Postan, Mr. Emile Cammaerts, Dr. F. A. Hayek, Mr. J. C. Flugel, Dr. Margaret Posthuma, Mr. S. P. Turin, Mr. Jules Menken are professors or teachers at it, and, among the instructors with English names are the Socialist ex-Member of Parliament, the Right Honorable Hastings Bertrand Lees-Smith, reader in public administration, and the Balliol Socialist, R. H. Tawney, professor of economic history. The director of the London School of Economics is another Balliol man, Sir William Beveridge, whose anxiety, with the assistance of the British Broadcasting Corporation, to obtain an insight into the private affairs of his fellow countrymen and countrywomen, has recently brought him into the limelight.

At the London School of Economics an important pandit is the Mr. Harold Laski already referred to. He is a friend of Mr. H. A. L. Fisher, contributor to the Daily Herald, an instructor especially favored by the British Broadcasting Corporation and the most influential person on the education committee, London City Council, on which he was co-opted five years ago. Mr. Laski's record will be found in Potted Biographies, which shows his very revolutionary outlook.[5]

Born in 1893 and educated at New College, Oxford, he went in 1914 to America and was lecturer at universities there. When at Harvard from 1916 to 1920 he was assistant editor of the New Republic (New York), a subversive journal. During the Boston police strike he is alleged to have addressed and encouraged the strikers. In 1921 he and Mr. Tawney contributed an introduction to Lord Haldane's Problem of Nationalization. Five years later he was appointed professor of political science [sic] at the London School of Economics. His inaugural lecture was published with a dedication to his "friend Mr. Justice (now Lord) Sankey with enduring affection." Here are two extracts from his writings. The first is from his Karl Marx (1922), the second from his Communism (1927), a work in the Home University Library, two of the editors of which were in 1927 and are now Mr. H. A. L. Fisher and Prof. Gilbert Murray.

The Daily Express, October 30, 1931, reports that Mr. Lazarus Aaronson is lecturer in economics at the London University.

"Marx is, in fact, a noble but not an attractive figure. * * * When the roll of those to whom the emancipation of the people is due comes to be called, few will have a more honorable and none a more eminent place" (p. 46).

"Those who represent the Bolshevists as a set of unprincipled adventurers in German pay do sorry service to the understanding of the greatest event in history since the Reformation. * * * Most of their leaders, and notably Lenin and Trotsky * * * had dedicated their lives to the service of their cause. * * * It is illegitimate to question either their honesty or their idealism" (p. 45).

When we have a national government immune from alien influence one of its first actions should be to anglicize the London School of Economics. As at present constituted it is, in the opinion of many, a danger to the Empire, and I consider it to be a most unfortunate circumstance that Sir Otto Ernst Niemeyer in his tours through Australia and New Zealand was accompanied by one of its professors, Mr. Theodor Emanuel Gugenheim Gregory.

Mr. Gugenheim Gregory may be a most estimable individual, but patriots would have preferred that two other persons should have been sent on this important mission whose names would have recalled the old country to Australians and New Zealanders.

The author has had several letters from both these Dominions, some from leading men, deploring that these two men should have been dispatched. This mission was received with a good deal of suspicion, especially when Sir Otto Ernst Niemeyer advised the Dominions to borrow from the United States of America.

In conclusion, it should be pointed out that one of the greatest educational influences in this country is the press. Certain newspapers and periodicals, controlled by aliens or by people of recent alien extraction, have taken full advantage of this, especially since 1918. By a process of suggestion—clever, very gradual suggestion—these publications have reeducated a large proportion of our people, destroyed their patriotism and made them international and pacific.

Industry as Well as Men Must Hereafter Help the Nation Prepare

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 7, 1940

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, there is nobody in this country who can truthfully imply in the slightest degree that I have not at all times shown appreciation of what this great country has done for me and millions of others; or that I have not at all times fought to the very utmost of my strength for the preservation of our free institutions and our democratic form of government as guaranteed by the Bill of Rights and the Constitution. I have left no stone unturned to oppose every effort of reactionary vested interests to infrange upon the individual civil rights of the people.

UNITED STATES STILL MIGHTIEST NATION OF FREE MEN ON EARTH

No one appreciates to a greater degree than I the advantages and blessings we enjoy in this free country of ours. Though not perfect it is still beyond any doubt the best and the greatest nation of free men on earth. The people have not been shorn of their rights, but for 150 years have enjoyed freedom of speech and freedom of action to an extent unknown in any other country on earth. These liberties I hope and pray will be theirs and their children's forever, and it is the determination they shall be preserved for posterity that is the motive that has inspired me to espouse the cause of selective training as an essential and absolutely necessary unit of our preparedness program. I consider this imperative upon me as a Member of the American Congress; I feel that I have no alternative.

It is my conviction before God that were I to hesitate in this it would mean that I had betrayed the people who have trusted me, and to whom I owe the responsibility of doing everything I can to prevent this country from being deprived of its liberties, yes, destroyed, as have been Austria, Poland, Czechoslovakia, France, Denmark, Belgium, and Norway, with Great Britain's fate still in doubt.

REAMS OF FALSE PROPAGANDA CIRCULATED AGAINST SELECTIVE-TRAINING BILL

These being my feelings and convictions, you will be able the better to understand, Mr. Speaker, how sincerely and deeply I regret that some of our young men and women are being misled by the shrewd, subtle, lying Nazi propaganda aimed at causing discord and disaffection in our country over this matter of selective training. Exactly the same tactics were used by the Nazi spies and provocateurs just preceding the use of armed force in the countries that I have enumerated and that are today no more. The dastardly lie that is being broadcast is that this bill is subtly aimed to deprive the people of their liberties, their rights, and their privileges as free citizens.

The truth is just the exact opposite of what the master Nazi propagandists are trying to make the American people believe. Instead of trying to take liberties away from the American people, we are trying to fortify the Nation so that this madman Hitler cannot do that very thing himself.

NO PRICE IS TOO HIGH TO PAY FOR THE PRESERVATION OF OUR NATION

Mr. Speaker, the United States is a nation worth training our young men to save. It is worth spending every last dollar in the Treasury to protect. It is the duty of Congress to do it, and we intend to, criticism or no criticism, appreciation by those who have been deceived as to the real condition of affairs or no appreciation.

Mr. Speaker, this country, our own beloved United States of America, is the last bulwark of real democracy in a world controlled by dictators bent on destroying every remaining nation that dares to stand for the principle of government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

DICTATORS FROM BEYOND THE SEAS WILL FIND US PREPARED IF THEY COME TO OUR SHORES

Hitler, Mussolini, and the Japanese war lords do not want peoples to control their own governments through the ballot box because they want to control them all themselves—for themselves—through coercion backed by swords and cannon, spies, plots, intrigues, and "fifth columnists," bombers and submarines, wholesale death and destruction of men, women, and children; by murder itself, Mr. Speaker, whenever considered in the least essentially important in the plans of the dictators.

But they shall not get the United States of America, Mr. Speaker, not if under heaven this administration and this Congress can prevent it.

SELECTIVE-TRAINING BILL ENDS OLD LIE THAT INDUSTRY IS MORE SACRED THAN HUMAN BEINGS

I regret exceedingly that any discourtesies have been shown to the young men and women who have come here to protest against this bill. I can understand their viewpoints, especially in view of the countless misrepresentations that have been made about it by subversive agitators. But I cannot overlook or forgive the hostile attitude of big business toward the proposal to take over even under proper safeguards industrial plants refusing to cooperate with the Government. In a recent editorial in the Wall Street Journal, for instance, I noted the following:

> Because there is a selective-service bill before Congress, there is some loose talk to the effect that consideration should be given also to a draft of capital.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, Wall Street wants all the protection that will come to it and the country as a result of selective training, but it considers it mere "loose talk" when the great industrialists are asked to do their part and share responsibility in the preparedness program that is necessary to make this country safe from invasion and disaster.

Such an attitude is repulsive, reprehensible, and indecent when the young people are asked to be ready and prepared to give with their lives if necessary.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I worked and voted for the Smith amendment, which I am glad to say was adopted and will require that American industry, unlike during the World War, must hereafter and forever do its full share along with the youth of the land.

Is Charles Fahy Qualified for the Position of Assistant Solicitor General?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBERT J. ENGEL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 7, 1940

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to comment upon the appointment of Mr. Charles Fahy, former General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, to the position of Assistant Solicitor General of the United States.

I had the privilege of listening to Mr. Fahy's testimony and of cross-examining him at the hearing before the Labor-Federal Security Agency Subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee on March 1, 1940. I am forced to the conclusion that Mr. Fahy's legal judgment is either badly warped or he deliberately misconstrues laws, permitting his prejudices to sway him.

Shortly after the World War Congress, and the Appropriations Committee as an agency of Congress, attempted to save the taxpayers of America money by discontinuing temporary wartime agencies. The result was the sending of bushels of telegrams and letters to Members of Congress and members of the Appropriations Committee by various people, protesting against the discontinuance of such temporary agencies. An investigation disclosed that these telegrams and letters were at least partially instigated by the agencies which Congress sought to discontinue, such agencies, using public funds to send telegrams, and so forth, to various people, getting them to write Congress. The result was the enactment of section 201, title 18, of the United States Code, Annotated, making such actions illegal. The Labor-Federal Security Subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee asked the National Labor Relations Board to furnish the committee—and there will be found on pages 600–601 of the subcommittee hearings a table showing the telephone and telegraph charges month by month, region by region, both fixed and long distance, from July 1, 1938, through December 31, 1939. No one can examine this table without coming to the conclusion that the telegraph and telephone messages increased materially during the sessions of Congress and particularly during the months that the National Labor Relations Board appropriation or legislative bills were before the House.

The subcommittee went into this matter carefully and Mr. Madden and Mr. Fahy held that such action was not illegal and not a violation of the criminal law. I call attention to the following testimony found on pages 597–598:

> Mr. MADDEN. Just let me say, Mr. Congressman, that the evidence which we gave the Smith committee does indicate the fact that in 1937 there were some telegrams and telephone conversations from Washington and there were some made from some of our regional offices to outside people, a good many of them labor unions, pointing out to them that on a certain day in August the House Committee on Appropriations reported out a bill which had reduced the estimate of the Bureau of the Budget by 50 percent.
> Mr. SHEPPARD. Do you think it is a good policy for your organization to spend money indirectly or directly to attempt to influence the Appropriations Committee or its members in their judgment of what should be done with appropriation bills?
> Mr. MADDEN. I think there is a very serious question as to whether it is a proper policy or not.
> Mr. ENGEL. Was not that procedure a violation of criminal law, Mr. Fahy?
> Mr. FAHY. I do not think so.
> Mr. ENGEL. Is there not a law on the statute books which provides that the using of any funds for or by a department or by Government employees which are appropriated by Congress from public funds to influence Congress is a criminal law violation?
> Mr. FAHY. I am familiar with the statute to which you refer. It was passed in 1919 and is section 201 of title 18 of the United States Code, Annotated. That section does provide that none of the money appropriated by any act shall be used directly or indirectly to pay for personal services, telegrams and telephones, advertisements, or other devices designed or intended to influence a Congressman in connection with his vote on legislation.
>
> Mr. ENGEL. That is right; that is the law I refer to.
> You mean to tell me that the Board could use these public funds legally to send telegrams to the American Federation of Labor units all over the United States or the C. I. O. or other organizations trying to get them to influence Congress to increase your appropriation and do it legally?
> Mr. FAHY. I do not think the statute I referred to covers that situation.
> Mr. ENGEL. I do not want to go into detail——
> Mr. MADDEN. Would it be fair for me to ask you a question as long as this has been brought up?
> Mr. ENGEL. I am asking the questions and you are answering them.

I wish especially to call attention to the comment by the gentleman from Georgia, Judge TARVER, Democrat and chairman of the subcommittee upon this subject:

> Mr. TARVER. Let me submit this observation for the record. I think the position which has been taken by Mr. Fahy here is absolutely untenable and that the language in the code section which has been discussed expressly prohibits the use of any fund carried in any appropriation bill passed by the Congress by the agency to whose use it was appropriated for the purpose of trying to influence the judgment of Congress with regard to any matter of appropriation. And if that is not sufficiently clear to Mr. Fahy and to the Board, I certainly feel that this committee should make it sufficiently clear and doubtless will, in language which will be incorporated in this pending bill.

Judge TARVER is a former judge and one of the ablest chairmen that I have ever served under. His fairness and the nonpolitical way in which he handled his bill was outstanding. His legal knowledge and his ability to analyze and bring out facts is clearly demonstrated by the pages of testimony of the hearing.

It is noted that he differed entirely with Mr. Fahy's conclusion and takes the position, and properly so, that the sending of telegrams to organizations to get such organizations to influence Congress to increase their department's appropriation is absolutely illegal and violates that provision of law which provides, according to Mr. Fahy's own testimony, that—

None of the money appropriated by any act shall be used, directly or indirectly, to pay for personal services, telegrams and telephones, advertisements, or other devices designed or intended to influence a Congressman in connection with his vote on legislation.

Mr. Fahy has either deliberately misconstrued an act of Congress in order to help a department of this Government to violate the law of the United States or he has displayed a colossal ignorance of the plain and simple rules of statutory interpretation. He has shown himself to be absolutely unfit to occupy the position of Assistant Solicitor General of the United States. I further respectfully submit that the testimony of former Chairman Madden, in effect, constitutes a confession that he and the Board violated a Federal criminal statute. There are those who feel that, instead of having been made Assistant Solicitor General, Mr. Fahy and the National Labor Relations Board might well have been indicted for violating a criminal statute of the United States.

War If Roosevelt Wins

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEWIS D. THILL
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 7, 1940

ARTICLE FROM WASHINGTON TIMES-HERALD

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, the actions of President Roosevelt point clearly to war. Disregarding the desires of the people in this country and contrary to the expressed opinion of Members of Congress, Roosevelt is taking those fateful steps which can only lead to war. Just recently he transferred destroyers to England in direct contravention of law and without any authority except specious legal reasoning of the Attorney General to back him in his action.

The following newspaper article is worth reading:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of September 6, 1940]

WAR IN 2 WEEKS IF F. D. WINS, JOHNSON SAYS—GENERAL CHARGES PRESIDENT PLANS HITLER-LIKE RULE

PHILADELPHIA, September 6.—Gen. Hugh S. Johnson declared here last night that if President Roosevelt is reelected he will take the Nation into war within 2 weeks and will set up a wartime dictatorship as drastic as Hitler's.

He made this prophecy to reporters a few minutes after he had delivered a Nation-wide radio address launching the "Defend America First Committee," which he has helped to establish to oppose the powerful "Defend America by Aiding the Allies Committee."

PRAISES WILLKIE STAND

"I believe already he has reached an understanding with Great Britain that those 50 destroyers he has given them are only the beginning," said Johnson. "Everybody in Washington who is in a position to know takes you by the lapel, crosses your heart and makes you promise to die if you ever tell, and whispers that we're on our way to war. You can bet your life it's the truth."

General Johnson then said that the election of Wendell Willkie will insure that "whatever actions are taken they will be taken by legal means."

"Willkie stands for aiding England, but not if we have to twist and dodge and break laws to do it. He stands for defending America first," he said.

FLAYS FLEET POLICY

General Johnson's radio address was a blistering attack on both President Roosevelt and the Aid the Allies Committee. He charged that:

1. Roosevelt ought to move the United States Fleet into the Atlantic to "face Hitler," but instead is keeping it in the Pacific to "protect the British Empire." That policy, he said, may get us into war any day with Japan.

2. The United States is trying to keep out of war by "getting into war" and to "save our democracy by giving up our democracy."

Compare Our Problems With England's Problems—Part VII

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. THORKELSON
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 7, 1940

EXCERPTS FROM THE ALIEN MENACE

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting a series of excerpts from the Alien Menace, by Lt. Col. Q. H. Lane, an officer in the British Army, who is more interested in England's welfare than he is in political expediency. He, like many in America, tells the truth. He hits the nail on the head, and he sets a good example for Members of Congress of the United States.

In reading this series the Members will find that the same insidious influences which are undermining England are also undermining the United States. So it behooves us to protect ourselves before it is too late.

THE HIDDEN HAND

Most investigators of the Bolshevist revolution in Russia have observed a close connection between the leaders of bolshevism and certain groups of international financiers. A full and complete record of the part played by certain eminent international financiers of Berlin, London, and New York in the Russian revolution of October 1917, and in the subsequent extension of Bolshevist propaganda, especially within the British Empire, would throw a flood of light upon many otherwise inexplicable events since the end of the Great War. In the second edition of this book brief reference was made to this connection between international finance and bolshevism, but it is now necessary with more information available and with increasing evidence of alien interference with and control of British finance, industry, and politics, to discuss this connection more fully.

To my mind there is no doubt that bolshevism is controlled by a combination of internationalists in which those of the Jewish faith predominate. In 1919, a section of the Jewish press in London openly encouraged bolshevism and Bolshevist propaganda in this country, and so strong was the advocacy that the Morning Post had to give wide publicity to the whole matter until it drew a letter (which appeared on April 23, 1919) signed by Lionel de Rothschild, Lord Swaythling, Sir Philip Magnus, Sir Marcus Samuel, Harry S. Samuel, Leonard L. Cohen, I. Gollancz, General Sir John Monash, Claude G. Montefiore, and Isidore Spielmann, in which these gentlemen admitted with deepest concern and sincere regret the publication of Bolshevist propaganda in sections of the Jewish press, and welcomed the suggestion that British Jews should disassociate themselves from a cause which is harmful. Prior to this letter there had not appeared any expression of Jewish disapproval of bolshevism.

A statement in the Times of March 29, 1919, shows that of the 20 or 30 commissaries, or leaders, who provide the central machinery of the Bolshevist movement, not less than 75 percent are Jews. * * * Among the minor Soviet officials the number is legion.

It is generally known that when Lenin and Trotsky went to Russia in 1917 to start the Bolshevist revolution, the way for which had been prepared by the Kerensky revolution of March in the same year, they received large sums of money from Germany. This fact has always raised the more important and interesting question: Who enabled Germany to provide the money for this sinister gang of revolutionaries? It is now known and clearly proved that the money was provided by a group of international financiers with headquarters in Berlin, Stockholm, and New York. Quite apart from the desire of the German militarists to force Russia out of the war and their readiness to employ Lenin and his associates for this purpose, the international financiers of Berlin, London, and New York, for their own private reasons, also wished to destroy the old regime in Russia. For this purpose they naturally availed themselves of the opportunity provided by Germany's military situation and needs; and in anticipation of their ultimate aims, selected and financed members of their own race to carry out their plans in Russia. While Lenin took with him from Switzerland a number of alien revolutionaries collected from all parts of Europe, his chief lieutenant, Trotsky, brought with him a horde of aliens from the United States. Most of these aliens had in previous years been forced to leave Europe on account of their revolutionary and criminal activities, and had in the meantime found a temporary place of refuge in America. A considerable number of them were ex-convicts. Trotsky himself was in prison in Halifax, Nova Scotia, when the call came for him to join Lenin in Russia. His release from prison so that he might assist Lenin in organizing the Bolshevist revolution is a mystery that has never been explained. What powerful influence compelled the British authorities to order his release and to grant permission for his transport to Russia? While there have been rumors that the order for his release came from a responsible person in the British Government, no authentic explanation has ever been published concerning this act of treachery to both Britain and Russia.

This alien attack upon Russia was not unpremeditated. It was part of a considered plan that had been maturing for many years and in which leading Jewish financiers had displayed much interest. Mr. Wickham Steed, in his book, Through Thirty Years, states "that the late Jacob H. Schiff, the well-known American banker, was known to be anxious to secure recognition for the Bolshevists, among whom Jewish influence was predominant." This is the Jacob Schiff who financed Japan in her war against Russia in 1904–5. He was then head of the banking firm of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., New York, and in the Jewish Encyclopedia, 1906, we read: "It (Schiff's firm) subscribed for and floated the large Japanese war loan in 1904–5, in recognition of which the Mikado conferred on Schiff the second order of the Sacred Treasure of Japan."

This reference to the help given to Japan in the Russo-Japanese War by this firm of international financiers—and a firm whose ramifications are today almost world-wide—recalls the 1905 revolution in Russia. In that revolution a worker's soviet was formed with Leon Braunstein (now known as Trotsky) as its leader. When Braunstein had the misfortune to be arrested his place in the Soviet was taken by another member of the same race who is almost equal in fame as a revolutionary. This was a Dr. Helphand, whose literary pseudonym was "Parvus." He was the mysterious possessor of considerable wealth, and he appears to have found that the advocacy of communism could be combined with the acquisition of riches. This man was an ideal person to act as go-between for the financiers and the German militarists in their relations with Lenin and Trotsky. Valeriu Marcu, in his biography of Lenin (Victor Gollancz, London, 1928) says (p. 38):

"Parvus, a friend of Trotsky as far back as 1905, had set out to prove that the master's (Lenin's) theories could also bring good fortune to the individual in business life, and accordingly had speculated during the war, as a true internationalist in Berlin, Copenhagen, Vienna, and Constantinople; now hoping for political laurels, he advised the foreign minister at Berlin to let Lenin 'pass through.'"

This internationalist, who appears to have enriched himself by his contacts with many countries, made Stockholm his chief center of operations, both financial and socialistic, during the war. Here he established a Socialist bureau, and from this bureau he arranged the abortive Socialist peace conference in 1917. This conference would have been attended by certain British Socialist leaders who were then on intimate terms with Parvus, but they were, it will be remembered, prevented from reaching Stockholm by the action of the late Havelock Wilson and his patriotic seamen. At that time persons who were secretly meeting the enemies of our country, were not as popular as they are today; they were regarded as traitors. Associated with Parvus was a friend named Ganetsky-Furstenburg, whose international financial interests were as extensive and as mysterious as those of Parvus. Mrs. Harold Williams, in her book, From Liberty to Brest-Litovsk (Macmillan, 1919), says that it was through this mysterious person that "the Bolshevists used to obtain large sums of money from an unknown source abroad." She quotes the Russian Socialists (not Bolshevists) Plekhanoff and Pankratieff, who stated that they had "documentary proofs that the Bolshevists had received money from Berlin, through Stockholm. Even the banks were named: The Disconto-Gelleschaft, Nya Bank, the Siberian Bank. The names of the intermediaries were also given: Parvus, Ganetsky, Summonson, and Kozlousky" (p. 144). Similar information, Mrs. Williams adds, was given by the Procurator of the Kerensky Government in documents published, August 3, 1917, in which it was shown that large sums of money had reached Petrograd from Dr. Helphand (Parvus), a Russian Jew, who is described as an obscure international speculator who acquired an enormous fortune, and styled himself as the ideal inspirer of bolshevism.

How these subsidized alien revolutionaries, having invaded Russia, proceeded to murder and rob on a wholesale scale has been recorded by many persons who had the misfortune to be in Russia during the Bolshevik Revolution. All are agreed that the leaders of the revolution and the persons responsible for the most brutal and revolting murders were Jews. No more terrible account of the horrors of this Jewish invasion and conquest of Russia has been written than that of Mr. Robert Wilton, Times correspondent in Russia before and during the Great War, and during the first and second revolutions. In his book, The Last Days of the Romanovs, Mr. Wilson shows from personal investigations that the foul murder of the Czar and his family was arranged and carried out by Jews.

"The Germans," says Mr. Wilton, "knew what they were doing when they sent Lenin's pack of Jews into Russia. * * * The whole record of Bolshevism in Russia is indelibly impressed with the stamp of alien invasion. The murder of the Tsar, deliberately planned by the Jew Sverdlow (who came to Russia as a paid agent of Germany) and carried out by the Jews Goloshchekin, Syromolotov, Safarov, Volkov, and Yurovsky, is the act not of the Russian people, but of this hostile invader."[1]

For the crimes and horrors of the Russian Revolution the Germans, and their financial backers in the Great War, are morally responsible.

I have not the space for further details of this plot of alien financiers to organize a world revolution, beginning with the Bolshevist Revolution in Russia. Those who wish to go further into the history of this plot against civilization should consult the books from which I have quoted; also the Russia's Ruin, by Wilcox (Chapman & Hall, 1919). The study of this financial aspect of the Bolshevist Revolution of 1917 can only lead to one conclusion, namely, that the revolution could never have been achieved by Lenin and Trotsky without the aid of considerable financial resources. As Mrs. Williams says, page 291 of her book:

"One is forced to draw the conclusion that the hundreds of thousands, or rather millions, spent by Lenin and his followers were furnished to them from some exchequer which had millions at its disposal. Only banks and the state exchequers have the possibility of subsidizing propaganda on such a scale."

The most complete record of these financial arrangements made with Lenin and his associates is the Sisson Report, published by the American Committee on Public Information. This report gives in Document 28 full particulars of the millions received by the Bolshevist leaders from the German Imperial Bank via Stockholm. In Documents 10 and 11, extracts are published from a resolution sent by the German commercial banks to the chairman of the Bolshevist Central Executive, declaring that "the German banks after the war were to control Russian industry." This is important, because the post-war relations of the German financiers and their associates in New York, London, and Stockholm, with Soviet Russia, tend to confirm this resolution. Keeping this resolution in mind, let us now turn to post-war bolshevism.

One of the post-war links between international finance and bolshevism was the late Leonid Borisovitch Krassin, a native of Siberia. Krassin, who in his student days had been a revolutionary, was an engineer, and, like Parvus, had combined revolutionary activities with a successful business career. After taking part in a revolutionary plot in Russia in 1907, he escaped to Berlin where he obtained employment in the firm of Siemens Schuckert, which was affiliated to Allgemeine Elektrizitats Gesellschaft. In 1909 he became a director of the St. Petersburg branch of this firm. Early in 1917 we find him in Stockholm in association with the mysterious friend of Parvus—the German-Jewish financial agent, Ganetsky-Furstenburg, to whom I have already referred. With this financial agent Krassin traveled to Berlin. As it was at this period in 1919 that the financial arrangements were made in Berlin for the transfer of Lenin and his alien gang of conspirators and cut-throats to Russia, it is not surprising to find Krassin, after the Bolshevist coup d'état, resuming his old position in Russia as the representative of Siemens Schuckert. Among Krassin's most powerful supporters in Germany were the international financiers—Hugo Stinnes; Felix Deutsch, manager of the A. E. G.; and Walter Rathenau, president of the same concern. As Mrs. Nesta Webster says in The Surrender of an Empire, page 107:

"Krassin thus played a dual role, on one hand representing the interests of the great German-Jewish capitalists and on the other acting as the lieutenant of Lenin, whose avowed aim was to destroy capitalism. If any further evidence was needed of the connection between bolshevism and international finance, the case of Krassin would provide it."

In 1921 Krassin came to London as leader of the Soviet Trade Delegation—the negotiations for which had been initiated by persons in the city of London with powerful international financial interests behind them. Some of these same Anglo-German interests in the city had been mixed up in the Marconi scandal of 1912, and now they found in Krassin the man to further their scheme to link this country with their Germano-Russian enterprise. This enterprise was in accordance with the resolution of the German Commercial Bank quoted in the Sisson Report, to secure, after the war, the exploitation of Russian resources by the international financiers of Berlin. To further these aims, Stinnes, Felix Deutsch, and Walter Rathenau, the A. E. G. chiefs and friends of Krassin, came also to London in 1921. The object of their visit was to open negotiations to form an international syndicate to undertake the reconstruction of Russia. It is known that these visitors had private and confidential interviews in London with politicians and financiers, and the Vossiche Zeitung stated that the visit "was for the purpose of arranging with the British Government a project for the combined exploitation of Russia by Great Britain and Germany." (See The Surrender of an Empire, p. 121. Also Morning Post, December 16, 1921.)

The Evening News (London) reported on January 11, 1922, that Krassin was again in Berlin conferring with Rathenau. All these negotiations after the war were consistent with the policy and intentions of the international financiers, with the German group at their head, who had established bolshevism in Russia. Having succeeded in destroying Russia and in placing it under the corrupt and despotic rule of an alien oligarchy, it only remained, as the Morning Post, March 19, 1921, had said, "for the international capitalist, who is the paymaster, to exploit Russia." And it added: "It is well known that there are certain syndicates in this country, mainly Jewish, that have long been willing to trade with Russia." This connection between bolshevism and international finance is very clearly shown by M. Andre Cheradame in his book La Mystification des Peuples Allies, in which he asserts, on the evidence he had obtained, that the communists had been backed up throughout by the Deutsche Bank, which maintained relations with German-Jewish financiers, naturalized as English or American in London and New York.

"Bolshevism," he states, "leads necessarily to the exploitation of Russia for the profit of a syndicate of supercapitalists, of which the real leaders are Jews and Germans."

This statement supports Rathenau's own declaration that "300 men, all acquainted with each other, control the economic destiny of the continent."

At that time Rathenau was one of the 300 and was associated with 84 large concerns. Mrs. Webster, reviewing these facts, says: "Viewed from this angle the trade agreement with Great Britain and Russia in 1921 takes on a different aspect. No longer a compact with a derelict empire, but with the most formidable power in the world, the power of international finance, it is seen not as an act of folly but as a surrender to forces with which it authors were either unable or unwilling to contend."

That Mrs. Webster is right is proved by more recent events. The Bolshevist danger to this country lies not so much in Communist propaganda per se, but in the fact that bolshevism is one of several weapons employed by alien financial interests to bring Britain and the British Empire under their control and domination. What they have done in Russia they may do here by similar methods. I shall deal more fully with this influence of alien finance in Britain in another chapter. But before concluding this survey of the relations of alien financiers with bolshevism I will quote some recent evidence to show that this connection still exists and is in some measure responsible for the financial crisis in Europe, and threatens the security and solvency of our own country. Our financial crisis in July 1931 was largely due to the international financiers in the city of London having granted large credits to Germany, which Germany declared herself unable to repay. The newspapers described these loans or credits as being "frozen" in Germany. This statement was not strictly correct. Germany had passed on these loans or a good portion of them to Soviet Russia, and it was in Russia where they were—or are still—"frozen." The financial collapse of Germany, or even of Great Britain, would not necessarily mean any loss to the international financiers who wrangled our money into Soviet Russia. The money is at least in the keeping of members of the same international family. The following extracts from recent statements on this question of "frozen" credits not only prove that the relations between international finance and bolshevism continue, but they suggest that these relations may have serious consequences for this country.

On September 18, 1931, Mr. James W. Gerard, American Ambassador in Berlin during the war, after returning from a visit to Europe, declared that Germany "did not need any financial assistance and that a large percentage of the loans from the United States was lent to Russia." He added: "If we're going to do business with Russia, let us do it directly and not through Germany, which has arranged to give Soviet Russia millions of dollars' credit to purchase commodities in Germany." [2]

Mr. Gerard does not mention the fact that the American financiers who arranged the American loans to Germany have both blood and business relations with the German financiers who passed those loans on to other members of the same fraternity in Russia. This story of Germany passing loans received from England and America to Russia has been told many times in the socialist journal Forward, and the story is now confirmed by a paper closely associated with Soviet interests. The British Russian Gazette and Trade Outlook, December 1931, said in an editorial article:

"It must be ironic for them [British manufacturers] to view the forced cessation of work on the giant Cunard liner, which is attributed to this country's 'frozen' credits in Germany, credits which have been used in great part by Germany to finance orders from Russia. During 1931 orders amounting to over £45,000,000 have been placed with German firms by the Soviet buying organizations."

Further information on these credits was given by Lord Beaverbrook in an address at Lincoln, reported in the Daily Express, January 16, 1932. Speaking on German reparations, Lord Beaverbrook said: "It is true that Germany owes our international financiers in the city of London £50,000,000. * * * Our international financiers in the city borrowed that money from France and America and paid 2 percent for the accommodation. They lent it to Germany for 8 percent. And what did Germany do with the money? She lent it to Russia for 15 percent interest. That is what became of the money."

Lord Beaverbrook added that "these buck-jumping financiers * * * have ramifications all over Europe. We need not worry ourselves about them." While Lord Beaverbrook is correct in his account of the operations and ramifications of these international financiers, he is wrong in saying we need not worry about them. We have every reason to be concerned over this alien control and direction of our finances, politics, and industries, as I shall show in another chapter. How, for instance, can Lord Beaverbrook's Empire Free Trade proposals be fully adopted while Britain and a large part of the British Empire are dominated by powerful alien financiers, whose interests are not reconcilable with the national and imperial interests and needs of this country?

In this chapter I have shown how international financiers, working through their German connections, have supported bolshevism in Russia. I have also shown that even now the connections between these financiers and Soviet Russia continues and is, by means of credits, obtained from England and America, enabling a corrupt alien oligarchy to maintain its control in Russia and to extend its demoralizing influence far beyond the frontiers of the Soviet Union. Though the Communists profess to hate capitalism and order their paid agents in England to cry "Down with the capitalists," the leaders in Russia never fail to give the international financiers a hearty welcome whenever they visit the U. S. S. R. When Felix M. Warburg, of New York, visited Russia in 1927, he had a great reception, and the speeches delivered on that occasion indicated that the Bolshevist leaders and the leaders of world finance understood each other very well, that their aims were not dissimilar, and altogether they were a united family working in their respective ways for a common end.[3]

Felix M. Warburg, and his brother, the late Paul Warburg, both of New York, came to the United States of America from Hamburg and belong to the German banking firm of that name. They became partners of Jacob H. Schiff in the firm of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and Paul, who organized the Federal Reserve Bank, became the dominant force in New York banking and finance circles. That certain financial groups in the United States had, and still have, close relations with the German financiers who found the money for Lenin's adventure in Russia, is a well-known fact, and that one or more of these American groups assisted the same adventure through Trotsky is more than probable. Trotsky, we know, was mysteriously released from prison at Halifax (Nova Scotia) and provided with the means to enable him and his associates from New York, mostly very undesirable aliens, to proceed to Russia.

The facts submitted in this chapter leave little room for doubt concerning the financial backing of bolshevism not only during the Great War but right down to the present time. Not only is Russia today governed and ruthlessly ruled by an alien gang but this gang has been, from the very beginning, financed and maintained by a group of international financiers who are also aliens in the sense that their aims and objects are inconsistent with the national desires and purposes of the countries and peoples they dominate. Knowing what we do today of the power and ramifications of these international financiers, who exploit all nations, can we say England is not under their control and direction?

The Burke-Wadsworth Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEONARD W. HALL
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 7, 1940

Mr. LEONARD W. HALL. Mr. Speaker, my statement shall be brief. I have already indicated that as an inexorable need I would support the Burke-Wadsworth bill, with or without the Hayden-Fish amendment. And I think we have precisely that sort of need today. And also I have indicated that in any measure of this kind I would work for and support, as an amendment, the principle of giving the volunteer system a clean-cut opportunity to prove its merits.

When the Hayden-Fish amendment was brought before the House I supported it. It is true, it hems in the volunteer system within an obviously narrow and rigid period, 60 days. But this is the first opportunity we have had to impress our views on this vital subject. The administration for months and months has elected, for its own good reasons—or, more probably, lack of foresight—not to give a real volunteer system a chance. Consistently, even from the beginning of the European war, it has held stubbornly to the 3-year enlistment period, and on the inducement to enlistment of a pay of $21 per month. And to volunteers who offered themselves, even at this pay rate for service of 1 year, recruitment in the Army was shut; they were told they were not wanted.

But the House has now adopted the amendment, and I think it is a most salutary contribution to the bill. There are some who dare say that its term will delay a proper assembly of men, in quantity and in quality. These statements, however, come from the leaders of this administration, who vote on orders, anyway. The fact of the matter is that the Hayden-Fish amendment will not delay the draft—and that is what induction into the service is—one single minute. It will not delay registration, classification, or the act of induction itself. If I thought that it would, and obviously in view of my announced position to support this bill, naturally I would have been against the amendment. And on the other side of the Capitol, many of those in favor of the Burke-Wadsworth bill, including one of its strongest advocates, the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], likewise supported the Hayden amendment. And in the House, the author of this measure, the esteemed gentleman from my own State, Mr. WADSWORTH, in explaining the operations of the draft machinery and indicating the time that actual inductions would be made, in effect conceded that there would be no delay by operation of the Hayden-Fish amendment. It is true he opposed it on other considerations, but he made no charge that this amendment would in any way delay the draft.

This amendment simply extends the permission, the encouragement, and the right to enlist under our traditional volunteer system. It is intended to give that system a fair chance. The Army wants 400,000 men by the 1st of January of next year. If the volunteer system does not produce that number within the 60-day period provided then the conscription machinery will operate. And do not forget that, according to the author of this bill, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], actual inductions into the service may absolutely not be expected until immediately around the 15th of November. The 60-day period would be over by that time. So much for the charge that to give American boys a chance to enlist in line with our best traditions and ideals is delaying national defense.

I hope that the membership of the House will keep crystal clear the fundamental, the underlying, purpose of this bill—the assembly of qualified men, in the numbers admitted to be necessary, to assure our Nation of a defense system that cannot be successfully assailed. It is the need for men that is the mainspring for the consideration of this measure. Men and time, both.

I think it has been made perfectly obvious here that if these were half normal times we would not even receive for consideration in the House a bill providing for compulsory military service in peacetime. I know I would not. And if we had the confident choice from an ability to predict our precise situation at any time, and in relationship to any part of the world, I also feel that we would come to compulsory service only as the result of our participation in war.

But we cannot predict our precise situation in the world of tomorrow. These are simply unpredictable times. Part of the world today is being consumed by the flames of war. Whether those flames will spread or subside, nobody knows. But simple realism dictates that in a world enguifed in war we must take every needed step that common, unadorned, everyday prudence, dictates. And that is that we shall have a defense system that will be strong enough to safeguard our security, our welfare, and our destiny.

There are many people in our country who do not strain at conscription in peacetime, whether there is an emergency or not. They are not bothered whether the volunteer system can produce the men needed. They prefer the conscription system on many considerations. I do not. But I shall embrace it if there is no other way out. The need is for men, and we must get them, and in the time shown to be necessary, under either of the alternatives.

In the perfection of this bill we cannot give too painstaking efforts. I have in mind especially consideration of all those parts of the bill bestowing power on the Executive. I hope that he will not be given one single grant of power that is not necessary as an essential of national defense.

This is a peacetime measure, to help assure by the creation of an unassailable defense system, the peace of America. To such an objective, there can be no objection. There are those who fear that it is really intended for aggressive war by us.

I simply want again to make the statement, that I am as strongly opposed to involvement in this war as I have always been, and that if I thought this measure was a will toward our involvement in war I would be bitterly opposed to its enactment. My convictions have not changed. Our happiness, our security, and the perfecting of our American civilization will be served best by noninvolvement in the tragic conflict in Europe.

Farm Imports From Foreign Countries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK CARLSON
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 7, 1940

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Speaker, the American farmer is suffering from increased farm imports and decreased farm exports. The Hull trade program lowered farm tariffs and opened our home market to the advantage of foreign farmers with low wages and cheap lands. Our farmers are asked to curtail their production and when they do their market is given to foreigners. The American farmer is entitled to the American market.

Total United States agricultural exports and imports

	January-June, 1938	January-June, 1939	January-June, 1940
Total agricultural:
Imports	$476,534,000	$519,662,000	$641,258,000
Exports	412,763,000	268,179,000	352,664,000
Excess of imports [1]	63,771,000	251,483,000	288,594,000

[1] This trade balance benefits the farmers of foreign countries.

The following table shows value and increase in farm imports. These may greatly increase if we vote a $500,000,000 loan to Latin American countries to be used in financing competitive farm crops:

Proof of Authenticity of British Secret Document

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 4, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks, quotations from magazines, the press, and to include exhibit 125, I shall attempt to prove that the contents of the British secret document, which I inserted in the RECORD on October 11, are true.

This report, as you know, was investigated by the Senate committee on the alleged activities at the Geneva Conference, and is an exhibit in those hearings.

EXHIBIT NO. 125—BRITISH SECRET DOCUMENT

Comprises 27 pages, 8 by 5½ inches each, photostats, and is a duplicate, line for line, of Exhibit No. 126, without the cover sheet and the foreword of the publishers inside the cover sheet; the first page of Exhibit No. 125 being page 3 of Exhibit 126, which first page of Exhibit No. 125 is also numbered 3.

As placed with the committee, Exhibit No. 125 has the following memorandum accompanying it:

"NAVY DEPARTMENT,
"OFFICE OF NAVAL INTELLIGENCE,
"Washington, February 9, 1929.

"Memorandum for the director:

"With reference to a document recently obtained from Mr. W. B. Shearer, which purported to be a confidential letter from Sir William Wiseman to Mr. Lloyd George, I wish to submit the following comment which I believe is convincing that the document is not authentic. The information which disproves the direct statements made, was obtained in New York by Lt. Comdr. Paul Foster, who conducted a personal investigation."

Please note that exhibit 125 is not the report rendered by Lt. Comdr. Paul Foster, but is instead an abstract of his report which Mr. A. S. Merrill furnished the Senate committee. The report is ambiguous and incomplete, and therefore of little value. As a matter of fact, it appears to be an attempt to shield the British Consulate and the British Military Intelligence Department.

1. Without question the original of this document was printed and not typewritten. Obviously such a letter as this purports to be would never have been printed by Sir William Wiseman or any other man writing from New York a letter of such a confidential character and addressed personally to Lloyd George, Prime Minister of England. In evidence that this letter was printed are the following:

To say that the original was printed is silly, because originals of printed documents are written in long hand, typed, or recorded. This should be obvious, for no one dictates a lengthy report to a linotype operator. However, let me say here and now that the author of the British document, whoever he was, knew what he was talking about, because the contents of the letter are only too true. Dr. William J. Maloney, a former English citizen, but now a naturalized citizen of the United States, graciously accepted the blame of authorship, to whitewash the responsible parties who wrote the document. He was not even familiar with the document, as his testimony revealed when he appeared before the Senate committee. I shall now reproduce a small part of his testimony:

Senator SHORTRIDGE. Who prepared the words which are found on the first, or outside page?

Dr. MALONEY. I don't remember his name, sir. He was a journalist who had been employed in Mr. Creel's bureau. He read the pamphlet and made this cover for it. I do not remember what his name was.

Senator SHORTRIDGE. So that is a fact, is it, Dr. Maloney, that you wrote this document?

Dr. MALONEY. Yes, sir.

Senator SHORTRIDGE. And caused it to be published?

Dr. MALONEY. Yes, sir.

Senator SHORTRIDGE. Was there a publishing house known as A Gordon Brown & Co.?

Dr. MALONEY. No; that was just a name.

Senator SHORTRIDGE. One hundred and sixty-four East Thirty-seventh Street, New York?

Dr. MALONEY. That was just the name adopted for putting that out.

* * * * * * *

Senator ALLEN. When the State Department had this hearing in New York touching this, what was their purpose? Were they objecting to the promulgation of this pamphlet?

Dr. MALONEY. I refused to attend that hearing. It was scheduled for a Friday morning at 10 o'clock; and about 9 o'clock I sent a telegram to Br. Bannaman, saying I regretted if I inconvenienced him but that I would not attend the hearing. He did not then either arrest or subpena me.

Two Secret Service men came around and told me this was a matter of 20 years; and they fixed the date for another hearing the following morning. I had not asked for any postponement; and, again they did not compel my presence; so I ignored them.

Senator ALLEN. What did they allege as the nature of the offense which you had committed in promulgating this?

Dr. MALONEY. They did not allege anything, sir.

Senator ALLEN. And was it dropped?

Dr. MALONEY. It was dropped. I heard no more about it.

* * * * * * *

Senator SHORTRIDGE. While you may have answered this question, why did you pursue the matter in the way you have just stated? What was the motive?

Dr. MALONEY. I wanted to show the ramifications, as I saw it, of British propaganda in this country.

Senator SHORTRIDGE. I think you said you were then opposed to our country entering the League of Nations?

Dr. MALONEY. Yes, sir.

* * * * * * *

Senator ALLEN. Did this circulate in Great Britain in any form?

Dr. MALONEY. We got a number of orders from Great Britain for single copies, from members of Parliament and others, who seemed to think it was an amusing thing.

This testimony of Dr. Maloney is illuminating, for he could not remember the name of the printing company, nor the name of the journalist who prepared the words on the front page of the pamphlet. He admits, however, that the document was written—which is contrary to the statement in the report by Mr. Merrill. Then, again, he ignored the request of the State Department to appear before it, by refusing to attend such hearing. The State Department made no effort to have Dr. Maloney testify. He furthermore states that two Secret Service men informed him that the authorship of the document was a matter of 20 years. That, in itself, is interesting, for what right had our Secret Service officials to threaten him with 20 years for publishing this document. Surely it was no offense against the United States. So it appears to be another form of coercion in order to protect the British Government.

The doctor was, however, interested in exposing British propaganda, and he makes the statement in his testimony that he exposed only a part of it; and he is right.

Let me again quote from the testimony:

Senator SHORTRIDGE. May I ask you why you wrote it? You may now enlarge or answer briefly or fully as is necessary.

Dr. MALONEY. Lord Northcliffe, at that time the proprietor of the London Times, the London Daily Mail, and a great number of other English newspapers, was over here in charge of the British propaganda in America. I used to read his newspapers and follow his boastings as to what he was doing to put us into the League, and I was opposed to the League. I heard, about May 1919, that his campaign had reached a crisis in an issue of the London Times of July 4. He was going around getting articles from various Americans friendly to England and friendly to going into the League at that time, and he was telling in his papers about the numbers. I think he said he had 8,000 purchasing agents. He had a club over here of 100,000 which he called the Overseas Club. He ran a magazine for their special benefit. He was very busy in interchanging preachers, and I think he claimed he had arranged 1,260 meetings for British preachers to address in the United States. He was also interchanging newspaper correspondents, and so forth. So I thought that if I prepared a skit on all he was alleged to be doing, or said he was doing, when he published his account of his stewardship on July 4, it would not have the effect that he anticipated, particularly if I could spread this all over America and show them just what he thought he was doing.

* * * * * * *

When Mr. Northcliffe published his report on July 4 he had much of what is in here. He had more that is not in here, and some of the things in here he had not. I thought we had rather brought his campaign to an anticlimax.

In his testimony, Dr. Maloney makes the statement that the English and Canadian people thought the British secret document was amusing. I do not question the amusing part of it, for they must indeed have looked upon us as the biggest suckers in the world in allowing ourselves to be used and abused and ridiculed by a power we helped to win a war which they would have lost.

It is particularly tragic, in that it has not only brought about another war, but has in addition to that provided a wide dissemination of socialistic and communistic doctrines which are now destroying our own Government. It also authenticates a part of the letter which I inserted in the RECORD on October 11, 1939. No one can fail to recognize the effort which was made by the committee, innocently or otherwise, to cover up the authenticity of this report, for it is absolutely clear that the real author was whitewashed by the committee, in not trying to establish the identity; and by Mr. Merrill in obscuring pertinent matter which should have gone into the record.

I. Subparagraphs (a), (b), (c), and (d):

(b) Both the right and left margins throughout are perfectly uniform. No typist would be able to attain such perfection.

(c) There are no typographical errors or erasures.

(d) The individual letters examined under a microscope show different characteristics, in itself conclusive proof that the document was not typewritten. For instance, to follow the letter "e" throughout a sentence: In the first case, the loop at the bottom might be indistinct and in the second it might be heavier at the bottom, an inconsistency that is not found in typing.

Mr. Merrill's report on these subparagraphs is ambiguous, immaterial, and not pertinent, as to proving or disproving the authenticity or correctness of the British secret document. He reports on a printed pamphlet and not on the original report. As a matter of fact, he has not even taken the original report into consideration.

I shall now quote subparagraph (e) of paragraph I.

(e) The letterhead reads British consulate. This is incorrect, as the office in New York is a consulate general.

The statement in this subparagraph is also incorrect, for the office is the British consulate, and the official in charge of it is the British consul general. This is a designation used by all governments.

Referring again to paragraph I, wherein the statement is made that messages of such confidential character were not addressed to Prime Minister Lloyd George personally, is another error, for Sir Gilbert Parker did render a weekly, personal report to the Prime Minister of England, as this paragraph I now quote will show:

(By Rt. Hon. Sir Gilbert Parker, Bart.)

I was in the United States for some months on this trip. I have been from New York to San Francisco. I was at Washington when President Wilson dismissed Count Bernstorff and heard him do so, and I am firmly convinced of this—that President Wilson committed his country to this war at the right moment—neither too soon nor too late. He had stopped up every avenue of attack by the pacifists and the jurists and the pedants and the pettifoggers.

Perhaps here I may be permitted to say a few words concerning my own work since the beginning of the war. It is in a way a story by itself, but I feel justified in writing one or two paragraphs about it. Practically since the day war broke out between England and the Central Powers I became responsible for American publicity. I need hardly say that the scope of my department was very extensive and its activities widely ranged. Among the activities was a weekly report to the British cabinet on the state of American opinion, and constant touch with the permanent correspondents of American newspapers in England. I also frequently arranged for important public men in England to act for us by interviews in American newspapers, and among these distinguished people were Mr. Lloyd George (the present Prime Minister), Viscount Grey, Mr. Balfour, Mr. Bonar Law, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Sir Edward Carson, Lord Robert Cecil, Mr. Walter Runciman (the Lord Chancelor), Mr. Austen Chamberlain, Lord Cromer, Will Crooks, Lord Curzon, Lord Gladstone, Lord Haldane, Mr. Henry James, Mr. John Redmond, Mr. Selfridge, Mr. Zangwill, Mrs. Humphrey Ward, and fully a hundred others.

Among other things, we supplied 360 newspapers in the smaller States of the United States with an English newspaper, which gives a weekly review and comment of the affairs of the war. We established connection with the man in the street through cinema pictures of the Army and Navy, as well as through interviews, articles, pamphlets, etc.; and by letters in reply to individual American critics which were printed in the chief newspaper of the State in which they lived, and were copied in newspapers of other and neighbor States. We advised and stimulated many people to write articles; we utilized the friendly services and assistance of confidential friends; we had reports from important Americans constantly, and established association by personal correspondence with influential and eminent people of every profession in the United States, beginning with university and college presidents, professors, and scientific men, and running through all the ranges of the population. We asked our friends and correspondents to arrange for speeches, debates, and lectures by American citizens, but we did not encourage Britishers to go to America and preach the doctrine of entrance into the war. Besides an immense private correspondence with individuals, we had our documents and literature sent to great numbers of public libraries, Y. M. C. A. societies, universities, colleges, historial societies, clubs, and newspapers.

It is hardly necessary to say that the work was one of extreme difficulty and delicacy, but I was fortunate in having a wide acquaintance in the United States and in knowing that a great many people had read my books and were not prejudiced against me. I believed that the American people could not be driven, preached to, or chivied into the war, and that when they did enter it would be the result of their own judgment and not the result of exhortation, eloquence, or fanatical pressure of Britishers. I believed that the United States would enter the war in her own time, and I say this, with a convinced mind, that on the whole, it was best that the American commonwealth did not enter the war until that month in 1917 when Germany played her last card of defiance and indirect attack. Perhaps the safest situation that could be imagined actually did arise. The Democratic Party in America, which probably would not have supported a Republican President had he declared war, were practically forced by the logic of circumstances to support President Wilson when he declared war, because he had blocked up every avenue of attack.

This is conclusive proof that confidential messages were sent to Lloyd George, and not only prove that the report by Mr. Merrill is in error, but it also substantiates the contents of the letter which was in the RECORD of October 11.

I shall now continue to quote from exhibit No. 125, British secret document:

2. The office of which Sir William Wiseman was in charge, although he worked in close harmony with the British consulate general, was never directly connected with it and the consulate letterhead was not used. The headings used by Sir William were invariably "MI–c, Report No. —."

Paragraph 2 is immaterial, for it does not prove or disprove this report.

3. Sir William Wiseman was relieved by Colonel Thwaites in 1918 and left the United States shortly afterward. During June 1919, when the subject document was supposed to have been written in New York City, Sir William was actually in Paris attending the peace conference as an advisor to the British delegation on American affairs. In March 1919, Colonel Thwaites was relieved by Captain Strath-Gordon. He was in charge on the date of the document.

This paragraph is immaterial, because it again deals with an issue that has no bearing on the authenticity of the document.

4. Neither Sir William Wiseman nor Captain Strath-Gordon were friendly to Lloyd George, either in a political or personal way. Even had they been, such a report as this would have been addressed to the head of the intelligence service in London, thence to the central offices of the various branches of British intelligence (the Foreign Office, the Home Office, the Colonial Office, the Military Office, the Naval Office, etc.), which are directly under the Prime Minister.

This paragraph is, if I may use the word, silly, or even childish, for it assumes an impossible situation. It would be ridiculous should anyone take this seriously and believe that the Prime Minister of England would send people unfriendly to himself to America to take charge of the consulate, of the British propaganda service, and of the British military service. Such things never happen in any government, particularly in such important organizations.

5. It is difficult to believe that anyone would attempt to figure out the average time and cost of "Anglicization" to the penny and minute, as mentioned on page 4.

It may be a little difficult to figure out how anyone would sit down and estimate the cost of "Anglicizing" Americans. However, it is not difficult to imagine that the British Government would engage in such tabulation, for they look upon us as sheep, as one of their nobility has already stated. Looking upon us as sheep, they will, of course, count us like sheep; and that is what they did in the British secret report.

6. On page 9 mention is made of a dope scandal in the family of Lord Reading. It is hardly conceivable that such reflections on a prominent member of the English Government would be made in an official document, especially if such references were irrelevant.

This also has no bearing on the authenticity of the letter which was in the RECORD of October 11, but inasmuch as it is mentioned, let us bear in mind that there was a dope scandal in England and a Marconi scandal which nearly disrupted the British Parliament.

7. There are repeated references to Messrs. Pierpont Morgan & Co., whereas the firm name is always referred to as J. P. Morgan & Co. and the individual as J. Pierpont Morgan. A man of Sir William Wiseman's intelligence and experience in New York would not make such an error.

Mr. Merrill takes exception to the fact that the author of the British secret document interchanged the name of J. P. Morgan &. Co., and J. Pierpont Morgan, and states that no one connected with the British Government would make such a mistake. This statement is also immaterial, for it is quite likely that a Britisher or an American might use one name when he referred to the company and the other name when he referred to Mr. Morgan personally.

8. On page 12 the work of F. Cunliffe-Owen is spoken of in a commendatory way, whereas at this time he was under the surveillance of the British Secret Service, as he had been reported on adversely.

Again Mr. Merrill draws a very peculiar deduction, when he refers to Mr. F. Cunliffe-Owen. I am sure the gentleman in question was not adverse to the British Government, and that there was not reason why the British Secret Service should watch Mr. Cunliffe-Owen. It would be much more sensible if he and other Englishmen were watched by the American Secret Service.

9. On page 16 references are made to the Morgan firm, regarding the loan to Japan, and to the statement that the greater part of that firm's capital is invested within the British Empire, both of which statements Sir William Wiseman would have known to be incorrect.

Page 16 of the British secret document refers to a loan of $200,000,000 made by the United States Treasury, through J. P. Morgan & Co., to the British Government. This statement is absolutely true, for I have photographs of two checks issued by the United States Treasury, one for $200,000,000, drawn to the order of Sir Cecil Arthur Spring-Rice, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the other for $30,000,000, drawn to the order of Colville Barclay, Minister Plenipotentiary of the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

This is, therefore, sufficient proof that the author of the British secret document knew what he was talking about when he wrote that report. I now quote from the New York American of Sunday, February 22, 1925:

April 25, 1917: The famous $200,000,000 check issued against this warrant was promptly endorsed to J. P. Morgan & Co., British fiscal agents, to cover an overdraft which Morgan and the banks allied with him had granted Great Britain before our entrance into the war. This $200,000,000 of the United States Government got to Morgan just in time, as is evidenced by Walter Hines Page, then American Ambassador to Great Britain, in his authoritative Life and Letters.

"In April 1917 the British balances in New York were in a serious condition. By April 6, 1917, the date of America's entrance into the war, Great Britain had overdrawn her account with J. P. Morgan & Co. to the extent of $400,000,000 and had no cash available with which to meet this overdraft. The money was now coming due; if the obligations were not met the credit of Great Britain in this country would reach the vanishing point. The American Government finally paid the overdraft out of the proceeds of the Liberty Loan. This act saved the credit of the Allied countries."

Thomas W. Lamont, of the Morgan firm, has made the proposition that we cancel half the allied indebtedness to us, now totalling $12,000,000.

May 15, 1919: Thirty million dollars of Liberty Loan money handed to Great Britain without legal warrant after the war was over. American diplomatic and consular officials abroad were complaining at this time that Great Britain was spending millions to get a monopoly of the oil resources of the world and to recover her pre-war trade supremacy. The total sum unlawfully advanced to Great Britain after the armistice was $330,000,000.

The endorsement of Colville Barclay, Minister representing the British Government, on the back of the $30,000,000 check paid to Great Britain 6 months after the war was over.

On December 5, 1918, after the war, Norman H. Davis, special representative of the Treasury Department abroad, wrote to the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Albert Rathbone as follows:

"From the Treasury standpoint it is advisable, of course, to cut off as soon as possible all advances to the Allied Governments. But, on the other hand, from a political standpoint, it may be advisable not to cause too much anxiety just before the peace conference.

"As I have already advised you, the British Treasury has notified the French and Italian Treasuries that they are through making advances to them. They have either done this in order to force them on us or for political reasons in order to force their opinions at the peace conference in consideration of them agreeing to additional advances."

Loans unauthorized: The secret correspondence carried on by cable, courier, and sealed diplomatic pouch, and thereafter carefully guarded in the archives at Washington, discloses that the officials on duty in Washington, having applied to Congress for authority to make these loans, and having been refused such authority, thereafter continued to make them without legal authority. These amazing documents, whose authenticity is beyond question, prove that the Treasury Department, in making these unwilling advances, was yielding to a contention of the President, then in Paris negotiating the Versailles Treaty, that the success of his policies—the League of Nations—depended upon liberal advances to the countries upon whose representatives at Versailles he counted for support.

For example, Secretary Glass, on January 14, 1919, cabled President Wilson in Paris, promising a new loan to Rumania, and containing the sentence:

"Appreciate importance of food supplies in relation to your policies and anxious to use powers of Treasury to support them."

A judicious interpretation of the mass of data now available can lead only to the conclusion that both the representatives of the American Government and the representatives of foreign governments knew that there was no authority under the law to make post-war advances for European reconstruction and relief.

The language of the law, the successive Liberty Loan Acts clearly provided that credits should be advanced to the Allies only for the purpose of prosecuting the war against our public enemy.

The record further shows that Secretaries of the Treasury McAdoo and Glass, realizing their inability legally to make further loans after the war ended, sought authorization for such loans in Congress in December 1918 and February 1919.

The books of the Treasury Department show that, specifically denied this power by the Congress, Treasury officials then proceeded to disburse to the Allies $15,000,000,000 more of American public moneys.

The foregoing quotations should be sufficient evidence to show that Mr. Merrill's report is wrong and the British secret document to Lloyd George is correct.

10. On page 13 there is a reference to Kuhn, Loeb's entry into the motion-picture field and acquisition of the Players-Lasky-Hearst motion-picture concerns. The consolidation occurred in December 1919, while the date of the document is June 1919.

This statement by Mr. Merrill is also wrong, for the Famous Players-Lasky was acquired by British interests in May 1919 and not, as he states, in December of the same year.

The following quotation from the New York Times, May 16, 1919, is in proof of this:

EUROPE, THE FIELD FOR ITS PICTURES—FAMOUS PLAYERS-LASKY AND BRITISH INTERESTS IN A $3,000,000 CORPORATION—AMERICAN-FOREIGN ACTORS—CONSTRUCTION OF BIG STUDIOS TO BE BEGUN AT ONCE—THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS THE FIRST FILM

The formation in London of a corporation capitalized at $3,000,000 to produce motion pictures against European backgrounds was announced last night by the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation. The name of the corporation is the Famous Players-Lasky British Producers, Ltd.

The construction of studios and plants on a large scale will be started immediately, according to C. A. Clegg, business manager of the international enterprise. American and European actors will take part in photoplays staged in the Alps, the devastated areas of France and Belgium, Wales, Scotland, Spain, and other famous and picturesque parts of the Old World.

The Americans chiefly interested in the venture are Adolph Zukor, president, and Jesse L. Lasky, first vice president of the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation. Among those representing British interests are Maj. David Davis, M. P., Maj. Norman Holden, Alexander Nisbet, W. J. Burdon Evans, Albert Hirst, A. W. Keeley, Thomas Wrigley, J. H. Kippax, J. G. Thompson, George Isaac, and Abraham Collins. Most of these men are already identified with banking, manufacturing, and theatrical institutions in England.

Mr. Merrill concludes his report with the following statement:

11. The above, to me, is quite convincing that the document is a fraud.

Mr. Merrill makes a statement which I flatly contradict, because his report is wrong, and the British secret document is correct.

There is much more evidence to be had to prove the authenticity of the British secret document, that was sent to Lloyd George on June 10, 1919, and which I hope to have time to submit before this Congress adjourns.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH W. BYRNS, JR.

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 7, 1940

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I made a speech on the floor of the House in opposition to the so-called conscription bill as it was then drawn. I stated in the course of my remarks that unless changes were made in the bill as then presented I would be forced to vote against it. I made the speech purely from my study of this question and from testimony before my committee and the result of personal investigation, which convinced me that our needs were far greater for equipment than for manpower at the present time. Changes have been made in the bill as it was reported out of my committee. I am not yet firmly convinced that we are ready for conscription of personnel until such time as we have the matériel with which to adequately equip and train them. However, there has always been a school of thought that under our American system of government the Representative of the people should reflect the sentiments of his constituency, bowing if necessary to their combined judgment even in instances where this conflicts with his own individual opinion. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I propose to vote for this bill as amended.

Texas State Convention of American Legion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MORRIS SHEPPARD

OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 9 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. JOSEPHUS DANIELS, AMBASSADOR TO MEXICO

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD extracts from an address by Hon. Josephus Daniels, American Ambassador to Mexico, at the Texas State Convention of the American Legion, at Laredo, Tex., on Monday, August 19, 1940.

There being no objection, the extracts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXTRACTS FROM ADDRESS BY HON. JOSEPHUS DANIELS, AMERICAN AMBASSADOR TO MEXICO

A score and three years have passed since you and your comrades and shipmates responded to the call of your Commander in Chief to bear "without rancor and without selfish object" a distinguished part in "the most terrible and disastrous of all wars." You responded in the faith that you were enlisting in a "war to end war." In the aftermath of that first engagement of American troops on European soil many books have been written and various views advanced as to the reason that impelled you and your fellows to offer upon the altar of your country all you had and all you hoped to be. You have been told by slanderers in high places that you were prompted to the sacrifice by the desire to "save your skins"; by hatred of the people against whom you fought; by the altruistic purpose of making the world safe for democracy; to obtain revenge for ruthless submarine warfare; to secure possessions and colonies for your America. These and other incitements have been declared to have induced you to cross the Atlantic to engage in the cruelest war in history. But you know and I know, and we must make history speak the truth, that the one and impelling motive (others may have contributed) that carried America into the World War was the overpowering conviction that participation in that struggle and the peace conference following the fighting would insure the goal of all the ages—a warless world, wherein the arbitrament of the sword would be replaced by the arbitrament of reason and justice by the nations of the earth. It was to usher in centuries of peace that you took up the sword. And when it was "over, over there," the soldiers and sailors of our country recrossed the Atlantic, confident that the peace won by sacrifice would be insured by the wisdom of diplomats and statesmen. The fact that you have been disillusioned because the chancelleries failed you and mankind in neglecting to translate your courage into permanent peace neither in the least impairs your consecration to the high endeavor to remove the curse of war for all time on the face of the earth nor lessens the lasting gratitude of your Government and your fellow countrymen for the victories achieved by your valor.

As the Legionnaires of the great State of Texas—as great in patriotism in peace and war as in its far-flung territorial expanse—assemble in this hospitable city where the good-neighbor doctrine is in flower, I feel commissioned to bring you posthumous honors from your great Commander in Chief, Woodrow Wilson, and your illustrious Secretary of War, Newton D. Baker. If it be given to those who have preceded us to the Better Land to know what is transpiring on this sphere, these two sun-crowned leaders would bid me say to you in the immortal words of Woodrow Wilson after the armistice:

"I am proud to be the fellow-countryman of men of such stuff and valor. * * * What we all thank God for with deepest gratitude is that our men went in force into the line of battle just at the critical moment when the whole fate of the world seemed to hang in the balance and threw their fresh strength into the ranks of freedom in time to turn the whole tide and sweep the fateful struggle—turn it once for all, so that henceforth it was back, back, back, for their enemies, always back, never again forward."

I am humbly grateful, as the survivor of the three civilian officials charged with the direction of the military forces of your country in the crucial and high days of 1917–18, to be honored by the privilege of bringing in person my greetings as your Secretary of the Navy in that heroic era forever illumined by the nobility of your high courage. As we foregather today and recall the experiences of the World War, we are truly looking back to glory."

In all the years since the Senate jettisoned the garnering of the peace which your valor brought within reach, there has been one and only one consistent and persistent voice raised by a great organization for continued and efficient preparedness on land, on the sea, and in the air. And that one voice, sometimes crying in the wilderness where blind were leading the blind, has been the clarion voice of the American Legion. At every gathering, local, State, and national, of your organization you have been the one agency with vision born of knowledge attained by suffering in the tragedy of war-slaughter, crying out in the spirit and in the very words of America's most illustrious victor for independence and liberty: "In time of peace, prepare for war." While others have poohpoohed the possibility of the calamities that now affright the world, you have not failed to warn of the perils of unpreparedness. In this course the American Legion has been no war-monger, no alarmist, no militarist, no agent of predatory manufacturers of munitions. Its prophecies and warnings have been well founded. Its utterances have not been made in glittering generalities. A perusal of the resolutions of the American Legion, from the day it was organized in Paris by forward-looking members of the American Expeditionary Force, evidences that you early saw the dangers and pointed the way to prevent the menace to desired peace. In every resolution adopted, Legionnaires have called upon those in authority to avoid the mistakes disclosed in former wars by keeping in readiness the agencies to defend their country. You have demanded the calling to the colors, in any future war, of the accumulated dollars and the reserve manpower to the last penny and the last drop of blood for national defense. When there has been advocacy of conscription of men to fight and die for their country, the Legion has pointed out the injustice of sacrifice by courageous youth while permitting wealth to escape. It has demanded alike the draft of money and industry and labor in any future war. It is no fault of the Legion that in the present crisis provision is lacking to make immediately available every man and every dollar in the event America is threatened with invasion.

Your countrymen—many noble and patriotic men who thought peace would be unbroken—sometimes derided your leadership for preparedness—and you will be the last to claim that all your recommendations were the perfection of wisdom. There have been many since the armistice so engrossed in their own private interests that they were indifferent to your annual iteration and reiteration of the need for readiness for defense. In all the years, the American Legion has cried out and spared not in its insistence upon national preparedness when those in authority said the Legionnaires saw peril where no peril existed. Today, all who have been deaf to the entreaties of the Legionnaires owe an apology for their criticism or neglect of your now-proved wise foresight. You knew better than those who stayed at home in 1917–18 what war was. You knew, as your comrades died on the battlefield, that giant fortunes were being piled up by those who never exposed their precious bodies to shot and shell. And you highly resolved, as you said "Never again," in disembarking after the armistice, that, so far as in you lay, your country should never lack the agencies of protection and defense in the event of another war, or permit the piling up of fortunes by munition makers and others for national preparedness or in war.

When the only plan of peace by cooperation of the nations was rejected in Washington, you and your Commander in Chief and your Secretary of War and your Secretary of the Navy declared in unison of spirit, if not in exact words: "With our refusal to take a seat in the League of Nations, the imperative duty of maintaining the most adequate navy in the world and a strong army rests upon us." Your organization was the one large body that supported the position taken by your Secretary of the Navy, with the approval of President Wilson, when he recommended another 3-year program of naval construction, along plans taught by the experience of war, declaring: "If the United States does not enter the League of Nations we shall require for our safety incomparably the greatest navy in the world."

Other counsel prevailed in that period. We witnessed the destruction of mighty naval ships, partly completed, decreed by the abortive Washington Conference, its action sugar-coated by the Nine Power Treaty to preserve the intergity of China—a promise made to the ear and broken to the hope. No member of the Legion was responsible for the miscarriage of the good purposes of that well-intentioned conference. No Legionnaire can be charged even with participation in the abandonment by the Government of its armor-plate plant at Charleston, W. Va., or the nonproduction of planes at the naval-aircraft factory at Philadelphia, or other examples of continued neglect of the Army and Navy in the years following the World War.

If I were commissioned to issue any command to my countrymen in this critical hour in world history, it would be "Eyes south." Too long have we in the United States looked too exclusively to countries across the Atlantic. Likewise, if I might venture to issue a command to our sister republics south of the Rio Grande, I would say "Eyes north." Some of them, like our Republic, have looked too exclusively to European countries. The manifest destiny, welfare, protection, and safety of this hemisphere from outside permeation lies in friendly continental solidarity. The barrier of language, the lack of communications, and transportation have militated against that understanding and cooperation essential to advance and preserve the economic and political independence of pan-American nations. The brightest silver lining in the clouds in the skies of today is the recognition by all the countries on the Western Continent that "the injury of one is the concern of all." From the day that Bolivar sought the unity which has now been achieved and Wilson declared that never would the United States add a foot of territory to its domain by force, and Roosevelt enunciated the good-neighbor doctrine—these high-visioned acts and declarations culminating in the declarations of Montevideo, Buenos Aires, Lima, Panama, and Habana—we have been moving toward the goal of American peoples animated by the common resolve to vaccinate this hemisphere against the introduction of any "ism" contrary to the tenets of democracy and political and economic independence. Habana marked the realization of a long-cherished dream—an American Continent unitedly resolved to uphold the ideals that caused its peoples long ago to throw off Old World domination. If there is any such thing as manifest destiny, it is that present disturbed world conditions demand the cementing of American strength to preserve American freedom.

It is fitting in your reunions to recall the experience of the high days when you worthily wore the uniform of your country. In another period of world convulsion, what you achieved in 1917–18 is an inspiration to younger men faced with serious decision. Though you fought across the seas, the spirit that animated you was the same which sent your forebears into all the wars in which America has been engaged. They came to these lands to find spiritual and material freedom and have never taken up arms except in defense of the ideals of our homeland. It "satisfied the fathers of this land—and has always been their satisfaction" to fight for our flag and die for our flag "when reason primes the rifle, when honor draws the sword, when justice breathes a blessing on the standards they uphold."

A fine young man said to me a short time ago, "Providence has been unkind to me by bringing me to maturity at a time when all the world has gone crazy and the opportunity of living my own life as I had planned it is imperiled by causes beyond my control." Such American youths, tempted to blame providence for the perils of their day, forget their blessings. They truly have reason to fear for the future, but they should always remember that the law of compensation works, and that they possess a homeland, a place to hang up their hats with none to say them nay, the right to think and speak and write and worship where no overlord can deny that their home is their castle. There was a time when those of us who are older lightly esteemed the possession of citizenship in a democracy, with the protection incident thereto. I confess to growing up in an American home where these inherited rights were so common I little understood the proud boast of the Apostle Paul when he declared "I am a Roman citizen." Citizenship and the right to have a home seemed as inherent to living as the air we breathe, something so universal and free that it is only recently that I have felt, night and morning, like getting on my knees and thanking God for the simple right to live where I could say with pride, "This is my own, my native land."

We must learn to appreciate and understand just what our country is. What it means to us and does for us, and what may be its services to humanity. We must bend every effort to maintain our homes, and to better our land, and to preserve America against the encroachment of systems of "isms" contrary to the spirit handed down to us by our forefathers when they created this our country—these efforts we must make that our land may remain that of our hearts.

The preservation of America—this is also our duty to humanity and civilization. In years to come, when peace and reason shall have returned to the earth, the traditions and the spirit which are ours today will prove to have been vaults wherein will have lain preserved spiritual treasures now fast disappearing from the homes of many of our suffering fellow men in other countries. In years to come, if we have fulfilled our duties, our land will have preserved unto us and unto humanity a store of wisdom and tolerance which will serve upon which to rebuild civilization.

Some Americans rail against taxation, which compared with that in other lands affords no justification for complaint. They denounce self-imposed regulation in wages and hours, enacted to preserve the dignity and health of men who toil. Many, indeed, prate upon the woes and ailments of our economic life. And yet is this our economic life so poor, indeed, when the national income has grown by leaps and bounds? Our people do not starve; if they are ill, they may find comfort and medical attention. We have economic problems—of that let there be no doubt—but there is even less doubt that these problems are not only less acute than those afflicting other continents, but are also more susceptible of solution. In our own hands lie the powers of remedying our woes, and the powers given to us are mighty indeed. Things that to us are but common, nonluxury articles are jewels beyond price to many of the war-racked peoples of this earth. We can buy gasoline for our cars, whether they are to be used for business or pleasure, in quantities and qualities unknown to peoples beyond the seas today; our foodstuffs may be used freely. Butter, eggs, fats, and meats across the seas are not only limited but even unobtainable in many regions. In the wake of war disease is rearing its ugly head in certain regions beyond the seas; the disease cannot even be controlled, for they have not the men, the money, the time, or the supplies necessary to stop it. We can not only control but even abolish disease in our own land.

The problems in many countries are not left to the judgment of the individual—rather are they for the decision of an autocratic minority. A man overseas who speaks his mind, who offers his own solution for the problems which beset his life, he is a man in danger indeed and usually does not last long in our world. But a man in our country speaks as he will, acts as he will, provided always his neighbor is not damaged by his words or his action. Ours is still a land where whatever good, no matter how infinitesimal, that may lie within a man's heart is given full and free opportunity to share in the betterment of our homes.

We can criticize those who are responsible for our national destinies, and such criticism will not lead us into immediate elimination. If we disagree with those who steer our ship of state, the remedy lies with us; we can make known the will of our people, and that will cannot be disobeyed. Do these peoples beyond the seas have any recourse against totalitarian rulers? None, save the negative and fruitless recourse of flight or death.

Across the seas we find men whose home life is lost to them. Either are they forced to leave what they have for years known as their country; what for years has been their home; what for years have been their lives, their neighbors, their work, their amusements—or is it that they cannot continue to live under the constant pressure of a system which leaves them no room to live? Those who are forced, unwillingly, to leave their homes and to wander through the world seeking a happiness denied them in far too many climes; men, the very fabric of whose existence has been torn asunder to make room for the texture of a state-planned and disciplined race of unimaginative slaves, are possibly those whose plight is the more tragic. Those who have left because the spirit of their self-consciousness impels them to escape from the shadow of systems where self is to be abolished and where the state, not the soul, is the all-wise—they are men who carry with them the spark of redemption, the spark which will aid in relighting the fires of warmth and human kindness through our world. Tragic is their fate, for they are not driven animals, but rather are they men who know the limits of man's fate are not imposed by an autocratic minority riding roughshod over man's creative soul, but rather limits imposed by the creative and imaginative powers of that same soul. They are not men to be pitied, for one does not pity a man who carries in his heart the essential spark of what has created our civilization; rather are they men to whom our hearts should incline in sympathetic admiration, captains of souls whose vessels plow uncharted and storm-tossed seas, but captains whose lives shall serve to pilot their comrades into the lee shore of a better life. They carry within their hearts the spirit of their homes; yet, brave and strong though they may be, they are still men floating in an unresisting medium wherein they cannot now find that firm support of permanence wherewith to rebuild their homes. It is only by reflecting that today there are millions of our fellow beings who are wanderers upon the face of the earth with no place whereon to lay their heads that Americans can fully appreciate the heritage. In Mexico refugees, particularly those from Spain, who organized and fought for the republican government which for the time being was overpowered, have found welcome in a country whose language they speak. Thousands driven out of their native land are trying to begin life over again, some expecting to become citizens in an adopted country and others awaiting the hour which they believe will strike when they can go back home to live in a resurrected republic. These and men from other war-torn nations are indeed men without a country. I have talked with some fine spirits from Iberia whose hearts bleed as they have no permanent land on which to stand.

Not long ago I talked with one of the most distinguished exiled patriots of Spain, whose friendship I had enjoyed when his heart was aflame as he helped to fashion what he believed was a permanent democracy in this country. Today, like a wounded bird, he has no place of abode, no homeland, no country in which to abide. His heart is in his homeland, as in a sense he is a wanderer upon the face of the earth. He told me the story of the man without a country in the year 1940—a true story that moved me to deepest sympathy. When he had completed his recital, and confided to me his heart's desire to live in his native land and help his countrymen in their aspiration for self-government, there were tears in his eyes—and in mine, too—as he sadly said, "My dear friend, I hope you will never know the agony of experiencing what it is to be a man without a country."

A man without a country. Sorry, indeed, his lot, for he is an automaton—he eats, sleeps, wakes, breathes—and yet he is not alive, for he has no home—no anchor in heart, in life, in his fellow man—he is not a being but an unfortunate robot. He cannot say, "If my bark sink, 'tis to another sea," for he has not the living support of self-understanding, comprehension of his fellow man, and the realization of the eternal cause underlying all of life—his bark neither floats nor sinks; his bark needs no tiller nor keel, no supporting element, no balance, no sails, for it wanders aimlessly in an eternal vacuum, where there are neither rocks nor friendly lee shore, neither North Star nor southern cross, nor any of the heart-warming landmarks familiar to those who follow the sea.

Particularly today should our minds dwell on those who now have neither country nor home, and it is only through appreciation of what our homeland means to us that we may begin to understand the misery and the tragedy that overwhelms many homes today.

Our country is based on our homes, and home to us is a theme running in a deep and steady dominant through the pattern of the lives of Americans. Our songs, our poems, our literature, our achievements, our work, our amusements—through the very core of the lives of those who have been, who are, and who will be Americans—the deep chord of the American concept of what is home has been and, God willing, will continue to be the basic melody of our country.

The basic spirit of those who came from across the seas to build their homes has built us into a Nation where the aspirations of men, through hard work and creative ability, continue to reach satisfaction of fruition. The American home is the symbol of our ideal—a haven where the individual, self-respecting, yet respectful of the needs of his fellowmen, may by himself, yet with the help of his neighbor, work out the ways of a life where his own ideas may find materialization.

The totalitarian home is an incubator where, irrespective of the self-respect of the man, the plans and the purposes of the state administer and determine how the man shall develop along the set lines, he and his home shall be destroyed as having failed the state. Such a home is far from being a place where the man may work out his destiny; rather is it a place where his destiny must be worked out for him. It is an attempt to destroy the very thing for which the first thinking men strove—a place where he would be at home, where his family and he could find safety and comfort.

Man, in this our world, travels uncharted seas, seas of darkness and dread. He needs a ship wherein to ride the billows, a sail to carry him on his way, a compass, a keel, and a rudder so he may steer toward the lee shore of his dreams. The ship must be based on the soul of the man, the sail must find its impulse from the wind of his strivings, the compass must show him a path free from the rocks of misunderstanding, and a rudder that with his own hands he may determine whither he should go. The man and his ways should not be molded into the build of the ship. The man should be free to allow full play, tempered by the rights of his neighbors, to the chart-market trail of his aspirations. Today the homes of many other lands beyond the seas are but strait jackets wherein the souls of men are confined and molded to set specific actions.

As I have reflected upon the stout heart and faith of my distinguished Spanish friend, who is today an exile from the land of his heart's desire, my mind has reverted to the favorite classic of my youth, Edward Everett Hale's Man Without a Country, and the equally soul-stirring story by Mary Raymond Shipman Andrews of the American who vainly thought love of his native land was dead until it was awakened as he heard the Star-Spangled Banner in the country of his adoption. It stirred his early patriotism to the depths, and he laid down honor and fame to once again drink from the spring of patriotism which had nourished him in his youth. In these drifting days of tragedy, I venture to advise as the true and living fountain of patriotism the placing of these two stories in the hands of every American youth, and their re-reading by every American citizen. The American Legionnaires and others can find no higher inspiration toward a noble patriotism than is found in the realization by two men who learned the lesson of love of country in lands far from home. As the closing sentiment for this hour let me offer the noble words of the Man Without a Country, when he came to himself:

"For that flag, the Stars and Stripes, never dream a dream but of serving her as she bids you, though the service carry you through a thousand hells. No matter what happens to you, no matter who flatters you or abuses you, never look at another flag. Remember that behind all these men you have to do with, behind officers and government, and people, even there is the country herself, your country, and that you belong to her as you belong to your own mother."

Freight Rate Discrimination

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 9 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. LISTER HILL, OF ALABAMA

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, the conference report on the transportation bill just adopted by the Senate contains the provisions embodied in the joint resolution introduced by myself in the Senate and by Representative RAMSPECK, of Georgia, in the House. This joint resolution was considered by a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce composed of the Senator from Florida, Mr. Andrews; the late Senator from Minnesota, Mr. Lundeen; the Senator from South Dakota, Mr. Gurney; and the Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. Tobey; and myself as chairman. After extensive hearings by the subcommittee the resolution was favorably reported to the full committee and written by the full committee in the form of amendments into the transportation bill.

Under these amendments any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage of one region, district, or territory over another region, district, or territory is made unlawful and prohibited and the Interstate Commerce Commission is directed to investigate immediately and upon finding such undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to exist to enter such orders as may be necessary for the removal of same. Under these amendments now to become the law of the land the unjust and unfair discriminations between sections in freight rates should be removed and all sections of our country permitted to enjoy that development and prosperity to which the character and genius of their people and their natural resources entitle them. I ask unanimous consent to place in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by me before the Atlanta Traffic Bureau on freight-rate discriminations on March 29 last.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The history of the Atlanta traffic bureau is a most interesting and enlightening one. Organized nearly 40 years ago by a small group of far-sighted progressive merchants and industrialists, it has achieved notable results, the benefits of which have not been confined alone to the metropolis of Atlanta. Indeed, its accomplishments have substantially advanced the best interests of the entire South. Under its able leadership it has grown in strength and prestige until today the Atlanta traffic bureau is recognized not only in the South but throughout the country as an outstanding champion of the rights of southern shippers and southern industry. At the same time it has won an enviable reputation for its fair attitude toward our important transportation agencies.

Since 1854, when the railroad, The West Point Route, was completed from Atlanta to my home city of Montgomery, our people have been bound to you by social, economic, and transportation ties which have meant much to our respective communities. We have learned much in the past from our social contacts and business intercourse with you. Beginning, as you did, at such an early date, to secure for yourselves reasonable, equitable, and nonprejudicial transportation charges, it has seemed wise for us to follow as nearly as we could in the direction which you were so successfully going. Indeed, your accomplishments served as an inspiration to great leaders in Alabama like the late former Governor, B. B. Comer, who after heroic efforts secured for us in Alabama equitable rates in line with those you had secured and were then enjoying in Georgia.

The first I learned of the importance to the people of reasonable freight rates was when as a boy I happened to listen to a discussion by my elders about the activities going on in our neighboring State of Georgia by such distinguished men as Gov. Hoke Smith, Little Joe Brown, Bolling Jones, your own late lovable Harry Moore, Judge Wimbish, and others. Since then I have followed with more interest than you would imagine what you have been able to accomplish in the way of securing equitable transportation charges, which have contributed so effectively to the upbuilding of this great city of yours.

You have every right to be proud of your association's historic past. From my experience in Washington both as a Representative in the House and as a Member of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce I can testify you have continued to carry forward in a successful and outstanding way the torch handed to you by your distinguished predecessors who gave birth to this organization. I say this because it seems at times that John Cooper and Gene Hart are as active in Washington before committees of the House and Senate and before the Interstate Commerce Commission as they are in Atlanta.

I have been closely associated during the past 10 years with your distinguished and brilliant Congressman and my warm personal friend, BOB RAMSPECK, who labors unceasingly and with marked success for the best interests of his district and of the entire South and the entire Nation. I rejoice in the fact that he and I have cooperated and collaborated in bringing about some very important amendments to the Interstate Commerce Act which have passed both Houses of Congress. I am confident these amendments will soon be approved by the President and become the law of the land.

Under these amendments any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage of one region, district, or territory over another region, district, or territory, is made unlawful and prohibited and the Interstate Commerce Commission is directed to investigate immediately and upon finding such undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to exist to enter such orders as may be necessary for the removal of same.

The necessity for the writing of these provisions into the law for the removal of unfair interterritorial freight-rate discriminations constitutes one of the most compelling and challenging problems before the country today. Transportation is a vital necessity to our civilization. It is as much responsible for the economic and social development and for the political unity and solidarity of the United States as any other single factor. The future growth, development, and destiny of our country will depend in large measure both upon the adequacy of our transportation facilities and upon the efficiency, economy, and uniformity with which such facilities function in the interest of the country as a whole. Attainment of a sound national economy demands equality of opportunity for all parts of the United States to develop in a manner and to an extent justified by the human and natural resources present in the various regions. To have a full and fair opportunity to participate in the commerce of the entire Nation in a Nation-wide market on a basis of free and fair competition to all concerned is a right that not only belongs inherently to all the people of all the States and to all the regions of the country, but unless such a right is accorded their necessarily follows a denial of a free flow of commerce, which immediately retards the social and economic growth of certain sections of the country, and eventually retards the economic growth of the whole country. Business expansion, the unemployment problem, the problem of wage equality, the farm problem, the development of our national resources, the attainment of a sound and balanced national economy are involved and interwoven in the matter of freight-rate inequalities. These inequalities constitute a key log in the economic jam which is holding back our national recovery and progress.

Our railroads, which have been and still are the dominant transportation agency, are entitled to great credit for their part in the amazing economic growth and power of the United States; but as important as this contribution has been in the past we are now able to perceive certain uneven results and unbalanced conditions that ought to be corrected in the public interest, which of course, includes the welfare of the railroads themselves.

Through the development of engineering skill railroad service, as evidenced by the physical ability and capacity to move goods from place to place over the country, has been nationalized. Every citizen who has to wait at a railroad crossing for the passing of a freight train witnesses, in the variety of cars from different railroads which usually make up the train, a visual demonstration of this nationalized service. It is, indeed a great achievement. The economic side of railroad transportation, however, has not kept pace with the physical and technical developments. The freight-rate structure of the country, which epitomizes the economic phase of railroad operations has, in fact, followed a contrary trend to the growth of service. On the one hand, uniformity and standardization of service on a national scale appears to have been the ultimate goal, while on the other hand regionalization has been the outcome, whether by design or circumstance, in freight-rate structures.

Today we have no national freight-rate structure. We have five separate regional or territorial freight-rate structures, namely, eastern or official, southern, southwestern, western trunk line, and mountain Pacific. Present railroad-rate territories were not fashioned according to any predetermined plan. They are simply the outgrowth of tradition. The rate structures within them grew up topsy-turvy. The aim of the railroads was to get the traffic and they got the traffic by meeting competition. The railroads from the very beginning have paid little attention to costs, equality, and relativity in fixing their rates. The Interstate Commerce Commission in readjusting those rates and taking the basic railroad patterns has largely disregarded transportation costs. It has proceeded on what is called the value of the service theory of rate making rather than the costs of service. As a result, the Commission has felt itself compelled to endorse as reasonable a rate on comparative noncompetitive traffic which may be four or five times as high as a rate which they likewise endorse as reasonable on what is called competitive traffic.

In the official territory we find greater consideration given to the manufacturer and his freight than to the producer of raw materials and his freight. Railroads in the official territory naturally established their rate structure with the idea of moving the existing traffic and serving the manufacturers as they predominated in furnishing the traffic. From the very beginning it has been the policy of the eastern railroads to bring in from the outside essential industrial raw products to the manufacturers at favorably low rates and to carry the finished products at low rates, as compared with the southern and western sections of the country. The southern and western railroads did not have manufacturing and were not much concerned with the building up of manufacturing in their territories. On a whole their policy was to keep rates as high as possible where competition did not compel reductions and to put them as low as possible where competition required it.

Because rates have been made on the basis of competition and of all that the traffic will bear rather than on a basis of cost and of the economy and well-being of the entire nation, we find shocking disparities as between the rates in the different regions. Class-rate levels in official territory established and maintained by the railroads are on a much lower level than the class rates in the West and in the South. As a result, the shipper outside of official territory is tremendously handicapped as compared with any competitor located in that territory and the consumers in official territory are denied the right to purchase goods and commodities at the lowest and most reasonable costs.

Even shippers in Canada enjoy a material advantage in shipping into the official territory over shippers in the other territories of the United States and the very protection supposed to be given under our tariff laws to American industry is defeated and denied. For example, it is exactly 657 miles from my home city of Montgomery, Ala., to Springfield, Ohio, from Ottawa, Ontario, to Springfield, and from New York, N. Y., to Springfield, and yet the first-class rate from Montgomery to Springfield is $2.02 per hundred pounds, from Ottowa to Springfield $1.60, from New York to Springfield $1.41. The rate is 42 cents higher from Montgomery to Springfield than it is from Ottawa to Springfield and 61 cents higher from Montgomery to Springfield than it is from New York to Springfield. We could go on indefinitely with such comparisons and I do not know of a single one that can be made in favor of the western and southern territories over the eastern territory on manufactured commodities ready for use by the ultimate consumer.

The effect of the regionalization of freight-rate structures has been to localize commerce by hampering a natural flow of goods across the artificial boundary lines. A continuation of divergent systems of rates may result in making a workshop of one region of the country and raw material producers of another region, with all the economic and social consequences which flow out of such disparities.

Exactly this situation has developed in this country. In the area of our country extending from Boston on the north to Baltimore and Washington on the south the average density of population runs well over 1,000 people per square mile. This is the area of heavy manufacturing and the area where freight rates are holding industry and pulling more industry to it. In contrast, the average density of population throughout the United States is only some 41 people per square mile. In the great western section of the United States, comprising 70 percent of the country's area, the average is less than 10 persons per square mile. In the southeast the average is about 50 persons per square mile. So long as competition makes freight rates it is obvious that the areas that now have the lowest freight rates will continue to have them. They had them originally and they have them now, as all transportation agencies in these areas compete for the heavy volume of traffic from the manufacturing plants that keep the millions upon millions of people occupied supplying themselves and the rest of the country.

While we speak of manufacturing it is interesting to note the distribution of manufacturing plants in the United States by counties. We find that 25 percent of the manufacturing plants of the country are located in 7 of the more than 3,000 counties of the United States. We find that another 25 percent of the manufacturing plants of the country are located in 46 counties. In other words, in 53 counties of the more than 3,000 counties, 50 percent of the manufacturing plants of the United States are located today. Of these counties 41 are in official territory, 2 in southern territory, 4 in western trunk-line territory, 1 in southwestern territory, and 5 in Pacific territory. The official territory has 71.65 percent of the manufactures of the country and three-fourths of the purchasing power of the Nation.

These figures show one of the results of interterritorial freight-rate discriminations based on the competitive theory of rate making. They show how these discriminations tend to concentrate plants in greater and greater degree where they already are and prevent development of those parts of the country that have little in the way of competitive force to bring down freight rates. They show how regions rich in raw materials have a serious if not fatal handicap when they undertake to convert their raw materials into finished goods and market them in the face of the existing regional discriminations in freight-rate structures. They show how one region of the country may be an empire while other regions of that same country may be but satrapies of that empire.

The discriminations cannot be justified by any differences in the cost of the transportation of freight in the different regions. This is clearly shown by the reports of the Bureau of Statistics of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and particularly the report entitled "Territorial Variation in the Cost of Carload Freight Service on Class I Steam Railways in the United States for the Calendar Year 1936." This latter report shows that there is no controlling reason from the angle of costs of transportation service for higher rates to be charged on traffic between western-territory points or between southern-territory points and the official territory points than the rates charged between points in the latter territory. In fact, the cost in the area south of the Ohio and Potomac Rivers has been clearly shown to be less than the cost in official territory for the same service.

The interest of the East and the official territory as well as the interest of the South and of the whole country demand that there be an end to the gross and unjustified inequalities in freight rates and that the country be permitted to develop and progress on natural lines.

One may ask, What of the railroads of the South and West if rates are to be reduced? A revision of freight levels would give the railroads in and between each of the territories a greater volume of traffic and would result greatly to the benefit of western and southern railroads. The railroads of the South and of the West need business and this business can only come through the development and industrialization of these sections based upon a better and wiser utilization of their natural resources.

If the South is to enjoy the rich advantages of her natural resources and that happy and prosperous civilization to which the character and genius of her people entitle her she must gain an economic balance between agriculture and industry.

Several years ago Dr. H. A. Morgan, the present chairman of the Tennessee Valley Authority and former president of the University of Tennessee, made a study of the value that comes from the decentralization of industry. He compared the States of Mississippi and Ohio. In Ohio he found industry distributed almost ideally. Mississippi has practically no industry. In Mississippi he found only 13 percent of the population urban. In Ohio he found the population is 63.8 urban. Dr. Morgan asks, "And what of agriculture?" Mississippi with an area larger than that of Ohio and with farming practically its only occupation, produces annually agricultural products to the value of only $965,000,000. Ohio, a smaller State with less land in agriculture and fewer farmers, produces for the comparable year $3,096,000,000 in agricultural products, nearly three and a third times as much in value as Mississippi. Dr. Morgan asks, "Do you see what industry does for agriculture?" Industry does two important things for a locality. It decreases the tax rate of the farmer; it produces an industrial wage to buy diversified farm products and thereby increases farm income and the purchasing power of the locality.

The development of industry in the South and West does not mean to rob the East of industry. The development of industry in the South and West means to give a higher standard of living to the people in those sections and to increase their purchasing power for the products of eastern industry. If we can raise the income of a farmer in the South or the West from an 80-cents-a-day income to the $3-a-day income of the industrial worker, we have furnished a consumer with a new purchasing power for the products of the work of a high-priced mechanic in the East.

In analyzing the treatment of our natural heritage of land and raw materials we have come to realize that permanent differences in freight charges as between regions accelerate the removal of products and materials without just or adequate return to the regions which furnish them. In the light of our experience of more than a century with organized transportation service, we ask that each region be given freight rates that do not confine the means of livelihood of the people of such region to the depletion of its soil and the exploitation of its essential raw materials primarily for the enrichment of another region. May I quote here the words of the illustrious Henry W. Grady, of Georgia, spoken in 1887, the year the Interstate Commerce Act was passed. These words are as true today as they were the day they were spoken 53 years ago. Mr. Grady said:

"But agriculture alone—no matter how rich or varied its resources—cannot establish or maintain a people's prosperity. * * * No Commonwealth ever came to greatness by producing raw materials. Less can this be possible in the future than in the past. The Comstock lode is the richest spot on earth. And yet the miners, gasping for breath 1,500 feet below the earth's surface, get their existence out of the splendor they dig from the earth. It goes to carry the commerce and uphold the industry of distant lands, of which the men who produce it get but dim report. Hardly more is the South profited when, stripping the harvest of her cotton fields, or striking her teeming hills, or leveling her superb forests, she sends the raw material to augment the wealth and power of distant communities."

And yet this is exactly what the West and the South have been doing ever since this country was founded.

And as a result of this economy the East owns between 80 and 90 percent of the man-made wealth of the United States, if not more. Its proportion of ownership is increasing each year. The East has this enormous ownership and control of the wealth of the Nation, although the South and the West together have 79 percent of the land of the country, produce all its gold and silver, 95 percent of its oil, 90 percent of its lumber 63 percent of its agricultural dollars and, on the basis of yearly production, have practically a monopoly on the natural wealth of America with the exception of coal and iron. The time has come when there must be an end to this condition if the Nation is to endure. The Omaha World Herald sounds the clarion call in the following editorial of August 29 last:

"THE MIDWEST MUST FIGHT

"The Middle West, laggard in growth, needs to face facts squarely.

"There is a wall around it, restricting its markets to local areas, binding its towns and cities, limiting the profits on its farms, keeping its population, in comparison with more favored regions, stagnant.

"It is the wall of discriminatory freight rates.

"It was built when the railroads, competing with the Panama Canal, began to bid for business against coastwise water carriers. They were permitted by the Interstate Commerce Commission to extend favors to east and west coast centers at the expense of the land-locked Midwest.

"Then the Midwest began to slow up. The process was gradual, and only the passage of the years has made clear how heavy the blow has been.

"By inequitable freight rates the Midwest's agriculture, its business, its industry, are being constantly constricted and restricted, its growth stunted, its opportunities narrowed.

"And in the process the railroads themselves that serve this territory are drifting into insolvency.

"A crazy freight-rate structure with reference to livestock and dressed meats is building up packing centers on east and west coasts, although their natural home is the Midwest. Iowa hogs are shipped through Omaha to Los Angeles to be slaughtered and dressed. Western Nebraska cattle seek distant markets instead of the home market. It is cheaper to ship livestock, in spite of the expense of handling en route and the shipment of water, than to ship dressed meat.

"Sugar is produced by the ton in western Nebraska. But an Omaha factory, using sugar, was forced to move to Chicago to gain lower freight rates.

"The whole freight-rate system is based upon precedents established in the days of rebates, bears little or no relation to actual traffic costs, and is marked by discriminations against the Midwest in favor of the coasts.

"And we take it. We take it although it has blocked the natural growth of this vast and fertile area, with even, in many places, a dwindling of the population.

"We take it, although it penalizes our farmers and cripples our industries.

"We take it, although in the end it means doom of the railroads themselves.

"But we need not take it passively and without effective protest. This western empire must band together to fight for a fair deal in freight rates.

"It must fight with the railroads and the Interstate Commerce Commission in one field. And it must fight for river service and barge-rail competition in another field.

"If we don't fight and fight hard, we accept death by attrition."

If the West dies, if the South dies, then the Nation dies. Once again, a house divided against itself cannot stand; we cannot remain half rich and half poor; once again we cannot remain half slave and half free. If our Nation is to endure there must be that unity of our people which alone can come from all regions growing and becoming richer in all those things which please and prosper humankind. We must be a nation in our economy as well as in our geography.

During the past few years we have won notable victories for the removal of the interterritorial discriminations. When President Roosevelt became President the South had only 1 member of the 11 members on the Interstate Commerce Commission. President Roosevelt has given the South 4 members on the Commission and has publicly declared a deep interest in the removal of the discriminations. It was with sore regret that I witnessed the resignation of Mr. Marion Caskie from the Commission, but you may be assured that we, your Representatives in Washington, are insisting that the vacancy be filled by the appointment of a southern man who understands the interterritorial problem and who will be absolutely fair to the South. I have faith to believe that such a man will be appointed.

Recent decisions of the Commission, in which your association was an active participant, involved fundamental questions of the greatest importance to us and resulted in the prescription of equitable interterritorial rates on some of our most important commodities such as coke, sugar, stone, marble, coal and wood stoves, furnaces, cast-iron pipe, iron valves, fire hydrants, brass pipe fittings and valves, soapstone and talc, enameled iron and steel plumbing goods. As a result of these victories the manufacture of kraft paper, paper bags, wrapping paper, has become a major southern industry, and only recently the Commission approved, over the protest of northern manufacturers, a basis of interterritorial rates on these new southern products which were satisfactory to the southern manufacturers. The Commission declined to suspend a new and reduced basis on rates on lumber and other forest products, one of our basic industries, from all producing points in the South to all consuming points in the North, which did not exceed, distance considered, the rates within the North, although these rates were vigorously protested by northern producers. At present we enjoy equitable interterritorial rates on southern brick and clay products, lime, coal, and industrial alcohol.

The Commission in the so-called Governors' case decided that rates on certain articles from points in southern territory to points in official territory were unreasonable and unduly prejudicial to the extent that they were upon levels higher than would result from application of approximately the same levels of rates as apply on similar traffic within official territory. This decision of the Commission follows and affirms the principle which the amendments offered by Congressman RAMSPECK and myself wrote into the law.

Under these amendments requiring immediate investigations by the Commission and removal of the discriminations, if we of the South are diligent and faithful in the pursuit of our cause, we may look forward to the day when interterritorial discriminations will live only in the memory of the past.

If we will but continue to battle for the South, her economic shackles may be stripped from her; she may be permitted to enjoy the rich advantage of her natural resources; to gain economic balance between agriculture and industry; the damages and ravages of generations of adversity may be repaired; her land and her people be restored and the South in truth become the fairest and richest domain on the earth.

Praying for Peace

EXCERPTS FROM A SERMON BY RT. REV. JAMES E. FREEMAN, BISHOP OF WASHINGTON

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following excerpts from a sermon preached in Washington Cathedral by the Right Reverend James E. Freeman, D. D., LL. D., D. C. L., S. T. D., Bishop of Washington, on Sunday, September 8, 1940, on a day set apart by the President:

In the ancient prophecy of Jeremiah, the sixth chapter, fourteenth and sixteenth verses, are these words: "They have healed also the hurt of the daughters of my people slightly, saying 'Peace, peace,' when there is no peace. Thus saith the Lord, 'Stand ye in the ways, and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest unto your souls.' "

We assemble today under extraordinary conditions and in response to the President's call that this Sunday be set apart as a day of national prayer for world peace. The call implies that a stage has been reached in the life of the Republic that makes such a day indispensable. Extraordinary as the need for this day of prayer may be, it is but the normal way of men and nations to seek divine guidance in the time of emergency. Of old the psalmist said, "In the time of my trouble I sought the Lord." Men may forego prayer and be unmindful of God or the need of His direction in days of quiet and peace; they will inevitably turn to Him when human wisdom and strength fail and are of no avail. This, let us be reminded, is one of the weaknesses of our mortal nature. A nation called to prayer must be a nation sobered and made reflective.

We are compelled to inquire as to the cause or causes that have forced us to pray for peace. The tragic happenings of life proceed from conditions largely of our own making. There is logic in events, and what men sow they inevitably reap. Without due reflection upon the causes that have brought the world to this tragic impasse, or the recognition of the evils that have effected such a dire condition, our prayers must prove futile, even though they be sincere and reverent. We of America, in our cloistered security, freed from the horrors of the European strife, may not with smug complacency acquit ourselves of all blame for what has come upon the world. We are not impeccable, nor are we so blameless that we can think ourselves wholly immune to the ills that afflict the nations of the elder world. Any consistent appraisal of our life as a people discloses sins and weaknesses that, unchecked, must inevitably lead us to misfortune and disaster. Privileged and secure as we seem to be, such a day as this makes us conscious that we have departed from paths that were paths of rectitude, and from ways and practices that were wholesome, decent, and virtuous. Individuals and nations do not grow strong and survive because of their genius, their skill, or their prowess. They do not guarantee to themselves security and peace because of their strength in men and armaments. These latter have their place, and physical fitness and preparedness bespeak the wisdom of a statesmanlike course. We may consistently have a well-ordered constabulary on land and sea; this has been made more evident to us during these recent days; but something more is needed.

There are threatening evils in our world that must be resisted and repelled and it would be the part of folly to regard them with carefree indifference. On the other hand, it would be a greater folly to believe that men and armaments alone guarantee peace and security. There is such a thing as morale that plays a conspicuous role in the life of the individual or the corporate body. Without a sustained morale, without moral and spiritual courage, in fine without the strength that comes from deep religious convictions and a way of life in consonance with such convictions, we face a grave situation, unequipped and unready.

There is a widespread tendency today to hasty and unreflected action. We are in a mood to be stirred by our emotions and our fears. The atmosphere is charged with elements that tend to panic and to actions that are unreasoned, hasty, and hence without plan and design. It may be that a day of prayer, nay, days of constant prayer, may clarify our vision and free us from the nervous tensions that issue in the following of paths that are unjustified, unwise, and wholly foreign to our truest and best interests. We must not lose our poise or our capacity to decide our wisest course because of conditions that lie outside our own borders. We will reckon with them but we will not abandon the ways and practices that have led us to our present place of privileged distinction. This world cannot long be dominated or controlled by brute force. It takes something more than mechanized armies and arrogant dictators to change the whole course of nations and peoples. Life cannot be sustained by agencies, however strong, that lack moral strength and moral courage. A Godless crew cannot long occupy the place of power.

We of this great Nation may have our days of prayer, but they must be supplemented and made effective by consistent penitence and a resolve to return to ways that in our mad haste we have abandoned. "Where will God lead us?" asks Viscount Halifax, of England. "Not, we may be sure through easy or pleasant paths. That is not His way. He will not help us to avoid our difficulties. What He will do, is to give to those who humbly ask, the spirit that no dangers can disturb. The Christian message to the world brings peace in war; peace when we most need it; peace of soul. If we can really do our work, whatever it is, as well as we can in God's sight, it will become His work, and we can safely leave the issue in His hands. We shall go forward, seeing clearly both the splendor and the perils of the task, but strengthened by the faith through which, by God's help, as we try to do His service, we shall prevail."

Brave, heartening words these. They bespeak a quality of character that make a people who heed them, strong and invincible. It is such qualities as these words suggest that we of America need today. Beyond all that we may do to add to our armed forces on sea or land, we have a task here within our own confines, to which we must address ourselves with zeal and determination. It concerns our moral and spiritual life; our resources in men and women of high moral worth; our fitness to meet within our borders, evil tendencies and conditions that may prove more threatening than any armed forces from without. Internally we are not prepared, and no glamour of wealth or conceits of genius, or weight of arms can make us fit to stay maladies that may prove more harmful than a foreign enemy.

A day of prayer; yes, both wisdom and experience approve it, but more than prayer is needed. A strong, steady, persevering determination to better our way, to reform our habits, to bring more of consistency, and honesty and decency, and self-respect into every department of our life; these are resolves that will give warrant to a day of prayer. To ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and to walk therein—this is to find the true and enduring satisfactions of life, and to set forward the day of peace.

Latin America Ponders the Anglo-American Deal

EDITORIAL FROM THE BALTIMORE SUN

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, in my unanimous consent to speak on the conscription bill I am taking the opportunity of placing in the RECORD a splendid editorial in the Baltimore Sun of September 7, which ought to prove a convincing argument against the statements that have been made about South America's reactions to recent events. I think this is a splendid editorial and further evidences the power of the good-neighbor policy in the nations south of the Rio Grande.

[From the Baltimore Sun of September 7, 1940]

LATIN AMERICA PONDERS THE ANGLO-AMERICAN DEAL

The excerpts quoted in the Sun yesterday from the comment of the South American press on the recent American agreement with Britain for Western Hemisphere naval bases indicate that Latin American opinion is beginning slowly to crystallize, though it has by no means yet arrived at anything like a clear and settled judgment. According to the New York Times correspondent who collected the quotations, the predominant feeling in South America is that the new arrangement will have "far-reaching effects for all the American republics." Some editors, he says, express a certain apprehension as to the effects, but the majority are content simply to point out that the United States action is certain to influence foreign policy in Latin America.

It is Argentina, the most powerful of all the South American countries, which appears to be the most cautious in its discussion. And its press spokesmen are particularly interested in emphasizing the unilateral character of Washington's dramatic move and the corollary that "consequently the other American nations are in no way bound or obligated." This, of course, is an important point which our own State Department, as well as the Latin American foreign-affairs ministers, will have to take into account in future diplomatic dealings. It is linked with this country's recent efforts, especially at the Habana consultative conference, to collectivize the basic principles of the Monroe Doctrine, in short to gain Latin America's collaboration in making that doctrine a multilateral understanding. It is linked also with the reservations which Argentina made at the time and which Buenos Aires now reiterates as "justified" by recent events.

Of course, the South American nations will probably recognize in sober realism that the new agreements with Canada and with Britain constitute an implementation, a logical extension of the Monroe Doctrine's cardinal point regarding the defense of the New World's political and territorial integrity. They will realize that America's new position in the Caribbean strengthens the shield covering Central America and part of the southern continent.

At the same time, however, these nations clearly see that because of their special relationship with the United States and the United States' new relations with Britain (some of the South American papers call it an "axis," some an "alliance"), their own position in foreign affairs will be affected.

In brief, South America is pondering the many ramifying implications—for South America—of this new instrument of American hemispherical defense. And while our neighbors have not yet come to any final conclusion or defined their attitude we can be sure that their ultimate reaction, whether unanimous or divided, will, in its turn, have important implications for us and for our program of cooperation in the New World and mutual protection of its interests.

What Price Conscription of Wealth?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LELAND M. FORD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1940

ARTICLE FROM SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA BUSINESS MAGAZINE

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Southern California Business magazine, issued by the Chamber of Commerce of Los Angeles:

[From Southern California Business magazine]

WHAT PRICE CONSCRIPTION OF WEALTH?—WHAT DOES IT MEAN?

(By Dr. V. O. Watts)

If men are to be conscripted, why not wealth?

At first thought this seems a fair question. But to answer it one must ask: What is meant by conscription of wealth?

Does it mean:

(1) Conscripting wealthy men for the Army? or

(2) Paying for armaments and war by taxes on the wealthy? or

(3) A general property levy? or

(4) Government confiscation of mines, factories, farms, and equipment needed for producing war materials?

CONSCRIPTION OF WEALTHY MEN

There is no argument here. Rich and poor will be treated alike by any conscription plan adopted by the United States.

CONSCRIPTION OF LARGE INCOMES

Conscription of income, with specially heavy levies on the well-to-do, is an old story. Already tax rates in the United States are at wartime levels and further increases seem to be on the way. To what extent can this financial burden be placed on the rich?

Nearly 80 percent of the million-dollar incomes is now taken by direct taxation in the United States. Philanthropies and investments, which, like taxes, return money to the general public, reduce still further the share of the large incomes which the wealthy keep for their personal consumption.

According to United States Treasury Department figures for 1937, therefore, taxation of these incomes, even if carried to the point of complete confiscation, would yield no more than one-five-hundredth part (0.2 percent) of the cost of the present Federal Budget.

Or suppose we taxed away every cent of income over the $75,000 salary fixed by law for the President of the United States and taxed at present rates even what was left. The total yield of such taxation in 1937 over what we actually did get would have amounted to about 3 percent of the present Federal Budget. It would have made up only about one-fifteenth (7 percent) of the expected Federal deficit for this year.

If, in 1937, we had conscripted all incomes beyond the $10,000 salary of a United States Congressman, the total revenue obtained would have been about $2,400,000,000. Such taxation would mean a degree of communism which has never prevailed in any civilized country, not even in semicivilized Soviet Russia. It would constitute a Communist revolution with all of a revolution's conflict, chaos, and relapse into barbarism. Yet the revenue obtained would make up only about one-half of the Federal deficit this year, or less than one-fourth of the total Budget.

The Federal Budget should be balanced and balanced soon, by greater economy or increased taxes, or both. But insofar as increased revenue is needed, most of it must come from people of moderate and small incomes.

Approximately 80 percent of the national income goes to persons getting less than $3,000 a year, 85 percent to those getting less than $5,000, and 95 percent to those getting less than $25,000. After account is taken of taxes the proportion left to these lower income groups is even larger.

Therefore persons of comparatively moderate incomes must bear the principal financial burden of the United States arms program.

Virtual conscription of large incomes we already have. The next step must be a considerable advance toward conscription of small and medium incomes.

CONSCRIPTION OF PROPERTY

Some hopefuls believe, however, that costs of war or a defense program could be paid for, not out of income but out of property. They propose that the well-to-do should turn over to the Government, in proportion to their property holdings, large sums of money.

But where would this money come from? Most property does not exist in the form of money. Bank deposits cannot be greatly reduced without paralyzing business operations. And if every important property holder, in order to get money to meet the property level, had to sell part of his holdings—bonds, stocks, land, mines, or factories—who would buy?

Obviously, to prevent a disastrous panic and to keep up the value of the property, the Government would have to step in and do the buying. It would print money or give credit to pay the property-owners and the property-owners would immediately return it to the Government to meet the property levy.

In the end, therefore, the Government would merely have taken, not money, but the factories, mines, lands, and shops of producers.

CONSCRIPTION OF INDUSTRY

This would be the result of a general property levy. Many of those who advocate such a levy know this. Their purpose, therefore, is not to raise funds for Government expenditures. Instead they really intend that Government shall seize and operate the mines, factories, farms, and other means of production.

In this case conscription of wealth is merely another term for Russian communism, or state socialism.

When the American people realize this fact they will speedily repudiate both the proposal and its sponsors, for they know that such conscription of wealth also involves conscription of labor. Capital by itself produces nothing, just as labor by itself produces nothing. Capital and labor must work in combination with each other. To conscript a factory is a futile gesture unless labor and management are also conscripted. That is why communistic conscription of capital has destroyed all human liberty wherever it has been tried.

COMMUNISM IS INEFFICIENT

Much could be said for conscripting producers and commandeering their equipment if this were the most efficient way of getting things done.

All human experience, however, shows that conscription of producers brings only stagnation and inefficiency.

Soviet Russia has tried this slavery for 20 years. And Russia is the only important nation in the world which has made no economic progress during that period. Forced increases in production achieved in a few industries like steel and munitions were more than offset by decreases in other essential lines, such as food, clothing, and shelter.

France, under the radical "popular front" government, nationalized its aircraft and munitions industries before the beginning of the war. The result was that production was cut in half.

Germany and Italy have partial conscription of labor and capital. But this is not the secret of what military successes they have so far achieved. These successes have been due primarily to the fact that for the last 5 years Germany spent almost twice as much on armaments as Great Britain and France together.

The purpose of Nazi and Fascist conscription of industry is political rather than economic. It is a means not of securing efficiency in production but of suppressing opposition and sabotage. Far from increasing efficiency, regimentation has had the same depressing effects in Germany and Italy as elsewhere. For the sake of a brief spurt of political and military success, the totalitarian powers all alike are sacrificing the enterprise and creative genius necessary for lasting national greatness.

Such political suppression and industrial regimentation is totally unnecessary in the United States. The Nation's producers have shown their readiness to support an adequate defense program—the world's largest Navy, the greatest air force, and an enlarged and well-equipped Army. They need no dictatorship to compel what they are already volunteering.

PRIVATE ENTERPRISE WORKS!

The record of the aircraft industry in Los Angeles County demonstrates, moreover, the speed with which voluntary enterprise can achieve the defense program if given the green light.

Growth of aircraft manufacturing, Los Angeles County, 1939–40

Size of Fixed Plants

January 1, 1939, 2,000,000 square feet.
January 1, 1940, 2,714,000 square feet.
August 1, 1940, 3,836,970 square feet.

Number of Employees

January 1, 1939, 15,930.
January 1, 1940, 26,274.
August 1, 1940, 41,756.

Monthly Pay Roll

January 1, 1939, $2,000,000.
January 1, 1940, $3,638,000.
August 1, 1940, $6,175,280.

For the next 4 months, and again for the following 4 months, the expansion will be greater than the gains for the whole 12 months of 1939 and greater than the gains of the first 7 months of 1940. This expansion is now under way and proceeding on schedule.

Along with this expansion of output there has been a rapid improvement in quality unmatched by regimented producers in any other nation. Our planes are the world's best, and the same is proving true for other forms of equipment as we increase production. This superiority will continue, moreover, as long as producers possess the freedom and encouragement of voluntary enterprise.

Government can remove various obstacles to enterprise. It can and should stimulate greater competition. But a bureaucratic, dictatorial administration of industry paralyzes enterprise and stops progress.

The proposal for wholesale Government seizure of the means of production should be recognized for what it is. It is an attempt to establish Communist dictatorship under cover of a war emergency. In such a guise "conscription of wealth" would mean the betrayal of all that our Nation stands for.

Let's preserve intact America's greatest economic asset—the ingenuity and efficiency of a free people.

ARTICLE FROM THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS

Mr. EDMISTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington Daily News of September 6, 1940:

[From the Washington Daily News of September 6, 1940]

HERE'S WHERE WE STAND—CONTRACTS WORTH TWO BILLIONS SIGNED TOWARD ARMY OF 1,200,000 MEN

(By Mack Johnson)

United States defenses are stronger than they were a year ago, but real rearmament by 1940 standards—the $10,000,000,000 program for 35,000 airplanes and a modern Army of 1,200,000 men—will take well into 1942, and a two-ocean Navy will take 5 years.

Those are the basic facts that stand out in this detailed survey.

The story shows volunteers joining the colors in unusual numbers for peacetime, but still in numbers too small to fit the Army's views of what is needed.

It shows haggling over some contracts and on the other hand of contracts worth $2,187,312,000 approved by the Defense Commission (which handles contracts in excess of $500,000) since the first half of the ten billions was appropriated in June. In addition, the Army and Navy have awarded hundreds of smaller contracts.

PROGRAM

Congress was working on Regular Army and Navy appropriation bills when Germany invaded the lowlands and France in May. They were record peacetime bills.

Then, at the President's request, they were doubled to a total of approximately $5,000,000,000. That money became available in June.

UPPED TO TEN BILLIONS

In response to another White House request, a bill carrying another $5,000,000,000 plus is now nearly ready for the President's signature. Over-all total is $10,496,000,000. Roughly, two-thirds of it is for the Army, one-third for the Navy.

Big contracts for airplanes, tanks, and munitions are among those awarded. But that does not necessarily mean quick production. Existing airplane factories, for instance, already are working to capacity on both foreign orders, as well as planes ordered with money voted by Congress in 1939. Design and construction of new plants to handle the big present and impending orders take time.

INDUSTRIAL

The Army has a program for construction of a chain of about 60 crucial munitions plants, costing approximately $700,000,000 and capable of supplying a force of 2,000,000 men. Funds already have been appropriated for some of these, as indicated below. Private industry will operate the plants on a fixed-fee basis, but title will be held by the Federal Government.

New arms plants

The War Department has contracted for a $25,000,000 smokeless-powder plant at Charlestown, Ind., to be operated by E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., Inc.; a $25,000,000 powder plant at Radford, Va., to be operated by Hercules Powder; and a $14,215,000 ammunition-loading plant at Ravenna, Ohio, to be operated by Atlas powder. The War Department also has arranged with Chrysler Corporation to build and operate a $20,000,000 tank arsenal in the Detroit area. Negotiations are virtually complete with North American Aviation Corporation to build and operate a $6,500,000 plane factory at Dallas, Tex.

Defense plant loans

The R. F. C. has made loans totaling $409,538,000 to 21 concerns to help finance plant expansion, etc. Largest, $92,000,000, went to Wright Aeronautical Corporation to finance expanded aircraft-engine production.

Navy employment

Ten navy yards and seven private yards are working on warships. Navy yards reported employment on warship construction at 59,971 on July 1, 1939, and 87,181 on July 1, 1940.

Private yard employment was 24,490 on July 1 as compared with 16,073 on the corresponding day last year.

PRESENT STATUS OF ARMED FORCES

Here are figures that provide a quick survey, obtained in most instances from official sources; where exact data were withheld, best estimates by informed sources were used.

Army Air Force: Planes on hand, July 1, 1939, about 2,000; on August 15, 1940, about 3,200. Planes on order, 5,245.

Naval Air Force: Planes on hand, July 1, 1939, 1,648; on August 15, 1940, 1,897. Planes on order, 2,429.

Army: Regular enlisted strength on July 1, 1939, 174,074; on August 16, 1940, 289,000.

Navy: Combatant ships in commission on July 1, 1939, 364; on August 15, 1940, 408 (of which 50 destroyers are being turned over to the British). Warships under construction, 132. Enlisted strength on May 23, 1940, 136,164; on August 15, 1940, 147,513.

AIR FORCES

On August 15 the Army and Navy had approximately 5,079 planes on hand. Sometime in 1942 this figure is expected to be 35,000 (25,000 Army, 10,000 Navy). Planes on order under signed contracts total 7,674, distributed in this manner:

Army: Trainers, 2,731; combat, 2,514. Total, 5,245.

Navy: Trainers, 1,401; combat, 1,017; miscellaneous, 11. Total, 2,429.

In addition, 2,967 planes are considered tentatively on order, because manufacturers have assured the Federal Government of intention to make contracts as soon as the manufacturers are satisfied with congressional action on taxes and related matters.

On hand now

Of total planes on hand August 15, approximately 3,200 are Army craft, 1,897 Navy. The impending supplemental defense appropriation bill provides money for an additional 14,394 planes for the Army and 4,028 for the Navy.

Plane orders to date have been concentrated on training craft, so that the Army and Navy can have pilots to man the combat craft to come.

Production

Aircraft production rate now has reached 10,000 annually. It is expected to be 13,000 to 14,000 per year by January 1941; 24,000 by mid-1941; and 36,000 by early 1942.

Engines

Engine experts estimated the annual engine production rate (1,000-horsepower motors or larger ones) was 7,270 in January 1939; 19,280 in March 1940; and probably will reach 29,280 by the end of this year.

The Defense Commission has approved 7 aircraft-engine contracts. Largest is $160,000,000 for 17,000 Pratt & Whitney Wasp-type engines. A $44,000,000 order for 3,000 engines was given to Packard Motor Co., Detroit. In addition, the War Department has arranged to obtain 20,000 engines from Wright Aeronautical Corporation.

Pilots

The Navy is increasing its training facilities to build up a force of 18,500 pilots by July 1, 1942.

The Army has contracted with private schools for preliminary training of 7,000 pilots annually and is expanding its own training centers. The Army program also envisages training of 3,600 bombardiers and navigators.

NAVY

Until this week, the Navy had a total of 408 combatant warships totaling 1,344,000 tons. Before the deal turning 50 destroyers to the British Navy for naval bases, the Navy had 15 battleships, 6 aircraft carriers, 37 cruisers, 201 destroyers, 46 old destroyers that have been converted into different types of craft, and 103 submarines.

Warships ordered

Since May 10, the Navy has awarded contracts totaling $1,140,000,000 for 87 combatant ships aggregating 478,285 tons and 5 auxiliaries totaling 21,150 tons. The new contracts call for two 45,000-ton battleships, 15 cruisers, 4 aircraft carriers, 38 destroyers, and 28 submarines.

Since July 1, 1939, the Navy has commissioned 41 new ships—1 cruiser, 1 aircraft carrier, 19 destroyers, 9 submarines, and 11 auxiliaries. It has also put into service 110 World War destroyers for neutrality patrol and other work, and converted 31 privately owned ships into patrol boats, transports, and auxiliaries.

Navy speed-up

The following tabulation, showing the number of ships under construction, discloses the speed-up which has taken place in expanding the Navy during the past few months:

	May	August
Battleships	8	10
Aircraft carriers	2	5
Cruisers	8	21
Destroyers	40	57
Submarines	19	39
Total	77	132

The new appropriation being completed this week contains funds to start construction, as soon as facilities can be found, of 200 more warships to make a two-ocean Navy in 5 years.

Marine Corps

The Marine Corps now has 31,469 men, about 3,500 below authorized strength, as compared with 25,045 on May 23. Four highly mobile defense battalions of 750 men each have been organized. Two more are being formed. These are designed for quick transportation to any point of trouble in the Western Hemisphere. They are being equipped with special light tanks, antiaircraft guns, machine guns, landing boats, and other materials. Six destroyers are being converted into high-speed transports for them.

ARMY

The Army, which has an authorized strength of 375,000 enlisted Regulars, now totals about 298,000 men, as compared with 230,772 in May and 174,074 in July 1939.

Recruits are averaging about 8,000 per week.

Total force 672,772

If all the existing Reserve branches, including the National Guard, were mustered (the President now has the power to do so), the Army would have a total force of 672,772.

There are 120,000 Reserve officers, of whom 8,000 are on duty with the Regulars. The National Guard numbers 235,000, of which 60,500 have already been called for September 16. It is planned to increase the Guard to 325,000 through enlistments and eventually bring it up to full strength of 410,000 by adding conscripts. Four hundred thousand conscripts are due to be inducted in service by January.

The goal

The present Army consists of nine streamlined infantry divisions; two newly formed armored and wholly mechanized divisions; one complete and one partly complete cavalry division. When the goal of a 1,200,000-man army is reached, there will be 10 armored divisions using 700 tanks each, and 45 infantry divisions.

Can train million now

Gen. George C. Marshall, Chief of Staff, believes the Army has sufficient weapons on hand at least to train the projected 1,200,000-man army, but materials now available are largely old.

The Army is far deficient in new-model antitank guns, large caliber antiaircraft guns, new-type howitzers, ammunition, tanks, and aircraft-detection devices. The appropriation bill now being completed provides funds for complete equipment of a 1,200,000-man army with the most modern weapons of war, according to the Army.

Here is a tabulation of essential equipment on hand and on order:

	On hand	On order
Garand semiautomatic rifles	42,000	198,000
Springfield and Enfield rifles	2,000,000
.50-caliber antiaircraft guns	1,014	1,362
90-mm. antiaircraft guns		1,612
77-mm. artillery	3,000
75-mm. howitzers	60	120
Tanks	500	2,200
Armored cars	485	861
Combat cars	114	100
Motor vehicles	32,792	36,970
Gas masks	407,696	361,000

Plan 6,000 tanks

Largest tank now in service weighs 22 tons. The Army is hustling toward a goal of 6,000. It has ordered 1,000 from Chrysler, 1,156 from American Car & Foundry, and an undisclosed number from other sources. Baldwin Locomotive recently was given an order for heavy tanks believed to be 70 to 80 tons each, similar to the German land battleships.

SPENDING

Here is a compilation of actual military expenditures for the fiscal years 1914 through 1940, based on official figures:

Fiscal year:	Expenditures
1914	$253,000,000
1915	257,000,000
1916	277,000,000
1917	658,000,000
1918	7,014,000,000
1919	11,217,000,000
1920	1,657,000,000

Postscript: New statistics on the aircraft situation became available last night, showing the Navy now has 2,833 planes on order compared with 2,429 August 15.

A special memorandum on aircraft procurement prepared by Admiral John H. Towers, Chief of the Naval Bureau of Aeronautics, for Chairman CARL VINSON, of the House Naval Affairs Committee, showed that on September 3 the Navy had 2,533 planes on order and undelivered. Late yesterday the Navy ordered 300 scouting observation planes from Curtiss-Wright Corporation.

At the same time Gen. George C. Marshall, Army Chief of Staff, shed more light on the combat status of the Army air force. He told a press conference that the Army has about 1,500 tactical planes which could be used in war, although but 500 of them are up-to-the-minute designs with armor protection and self-sealing gasoline tanks. Of the 500, he explained, 300 are the "most modern combat types of bombers and pursuit ships."

ARTICLE BY GEORGE W. GRUPP

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by George W. Grupp, which appeared serially in the New York Post of August 22 and 23, 1940, entitled "How Much Per Vote?"

[From the New York Post of August 22 and 23, 1940]

HOW MUCH PER VOTE?

(By George W. Grupp)

Now that a political campaign contribution by a corporation, individual, or organization is limited to $5,000, and the total expenditures of a national committee must be kept within the bounds of $3,000,000, some may ask if the 1940 Presidential campaign will be less colorful than those when larger total expenditures were permissible.

The drill squads and torchlight parades of 1896 will not be repeated in 1940. A revival of such methods was a failure in 1916. However, there will be plenty of fish frys and large mass meetings where the air will vibrate with serious and amusing words, with brass-band music, with community singing, and with unrestrained shouting.

Most of the people, one must not forget, will be amused, educated, and persuaded by use of the press, radio, and television. These latter methods are less colorful than parades, but they do possess the advantage of reaching more people at a reduced cost.

Wendell L. Willkie made it known that he does not want direct or indirect corporate contributions or large contributions from individuals who wish to be rewarded with appointments to high public offices. Willkie is of the opinion that his nomination is a people's movement which should be supported by a large number of small contributions. He wants to keep his campaign costs at a minimum. All this is commendable, good business practice, effective campaign propaganda, and sound political strategy.

The Democratic National Committee failed to elect Douglas with an expenditure of $50,000 in 1860, but it did reelect Franklin D. Roosevelt at a cost of $5,651,118 in 1936. The Republican National Committee suceeded in electing Lincoln at a cost of $100,000 in 1860, but failed to elect Landon at a cost of $8,892,971 in 1936.

A study of past national campaign costs reveals that the national committee with the largest total campaign fund, and the committee which spent the most per voter, won every Presidential election from Lincoln down to the present, with the exception of Wilson's reelection and Franklin D. Roosevelt's first and second elections. And the national committee which spent the most per vote received by its Presidential candidate won every election since the time of Lincoln, except both elections of Woodrow Wilson and Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The cost per voter of the Republican Party fluctuated between the low of $0.02138 in 1860 to the high of $0.2425 in 1896. In comparison the Democratic National Committee cost per voter fluctuated between the low of $0.00773 in 1872 and the high of $0.1951 in 1892.

With the exception of the Presidential campaigns of 1884, 1892, and 1912 the Democratic National Committee cost per voter lagged behind the Republican National Committee cost per voter.

An examination of the cost per vote received by the Democratic Party reveals that it rose and fell between the low of $0.0176 in 1872 and the high of $0.4230 in 1892. On the other hand, the cost per vote received by the Republican Party Presidential candidates during the period 1860-1936 fluctuated between the low of $0.0497 in 1868 and the high of $0.5331 in 1936. It was only in 1884, 1892, and 1928 that the cost per vote received by the Democratic Party exceeded that of the Republican Party.

No one should be shocked or amazed by these costs. Millions of dollars are spent each year to sell and advertise commercial services and commodities. Millions of voters cannot be cultivated, educated, and persuaded to vote for a particular Presidential candidate on the budget of a push-cart merchant.

The following table shows the record of Republicans and Democrats since 1860:

Year	Republican			Democratic
	Total amount spent	Cost per voter	Cost per vote received	Total amount spent	Cost per voter	Cost per vote received
1860	$100,000	$0.0213	$0.0535	$50,000	$0.0106	$0.0363

Reasons Why I Opposed Peacetime Conscription

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MARTIN F. SMITH
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 7, 1940

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I have voted for every national-defense measure requested by President Roosevelt, including authority to the President to mobilize the National Guard. The Burke-Wadsworth bill provides for peacetime conscription and if I thought it was necessary or advisable, I would not hesitate to support it. However, after giving the proposal deep study and thorough consideration, I am convinced that it is neither necessary, nor advisable, and I desire to state briefly the reasons for the conclusions I have reached:

First. I consider this legislation a step toward entry in the war to which I believe our people are as much opposed as I am.

Second. It is very significant to me that neither Canada, nor any of the British Dominions have resorted to conscription, even after having been at war with Germany for a year. Canada is now putting into effect very limited compulsory military training for 30 days only and calling only 30,000 men per month, and the law specifically provides that they shall not be required to serve outside of Canada. We now have in our military forces 919,807 men, and by the close of this year they will approximate 1,000,000 men. The Navy does not need additional manpower; in fact, has a waiting list of 7,000 and volunteer enlistments far exceed the requirements. Pursuant to the law we recently enacted, authorizing mobilization of the National Guard for a year of active service with the Regular Army, the size of our Military Establishment will be doubled. According to the testimony adduced before the committees of Congress, the Army cannot properly equip, train, and coordinate the first body of 400,000 men proposed to be drafted within the next 12 to 18 months. Indeed, William S. Knudsen, of the National Defense Council, testified before a Senate committee: "It will be 1942 before there will be complete equipment for 750,000 men." Gen. George C. Marshall, Chief of Staff, has testified that these men will be without proper housing, that barracks have not been built; that they will be without Army overcoats or blankets this winter, that there will not be enough tanks, antitank guns, mortars, combat planes. I, therefore, conclude that this measure is unnecessary and premature, especially in view of the fact that men are now volunteering at the rate of over 40,000 per month, much faster than they can be armed, trained, and equipped.

Third. I reiterated to my constituents, as soon as this bill was proposed, my pledge, which I have repeated in every campaign during the past 8 years, that I would never vote to conscript, even in wartime, manpower and the flesh, blood, and immortal souls of our young men, unless we, at the same time, conscript corporations, profits, property, and wealth. We do not do that under this bill or any other measure likely to be enacted in this session. The Smith amendment offered by our colleague from Connecticut, which is preferable to the Vinson amendment, as well as the Russell-Overton amendment adopted in the Senate, are merely gestures in that direction, but do not begin to accomplish the purpose I have in mind. In the last World War we lost the lives of 120,000 young men, and gained 40,000 new millionaires—one new millionaire for every three young men who made the supreme sacrifice. We do not want to repeat that crime and tragedy in the next war in which we are called upon to participate, and I intend to keep my pledge to the people who have elected and reelected me to Congress.

Fourth. I voted for the Fish amendment, calling for voluntary enlistments of 400,000 men during a period of 60 days, and if the number called did not respond, conscription to go into effect. I voted for this amendment in order to render the bill less objectionable if passed, and then voted against the bill on final passage. I wish to point out the fact that the drive for voluntary enlistments started in the middle of May 1940. Only the records of 2 complete months are available. In June, there were 23,400 voluntary enlistments, and in July, 31,400. According to incomplete returns, the number was 35,633 in August. It is estimated by the War Department that it will be the middle of September before the returns for August are complete, but it is expected that they will exceed 40,000. If this proves to be correct, then the voluntary enlistments in August 1940 will be higher than in any single month in the history of the United States, either in peacetime or wartime. Bear in mind that this is in peacetime. What would they be in the event we were threatened by invasion, or in wartime?

Fifth. I call attention to a very dangerous proviso in this legislation, which is urged as an emergency national defense measure and that is the proviso that it shall be in effect for 5 years; and it further provides for 10-year service in the Reserves. It lays down a permanent policy for our Republic and is contrary to our American traditions for 150 years. In an effort to discredit peacetime volunteering, the false claim is asserted that volunteering failed in the Civil War and in the World War. The truth and historical fact is that over 2,000,000 volunteers served in the Union Army and only 46,347 conscripts. In the last World War, despite the fact that volunteering was rendered practically impossible after the draft went into effect, 1,163,048 volunteers served. The proponents of peacetime conscription as a new national policy for the United States contend that we should profit by the example of the democracies in Europe. Their contention is untenable, for France, Belgium, and Holland had peacetime conscription and utterly collapsed in the war. Great Britain, which alone is withstanding magnificently the onslaught of the axis powers, abhorred peacetime conscription. I, therefore, question very seriously the need and certainly the wisdom of our fastening for a period of 5 years, probably permanently, enforced military training in peacetime upon the free and liberty-loving people of the United States.

Sixth. To some it may seem a matter of minor importance, but to me it is not entirely without consequence. I voted for the Schaefer amendment to include Members of Congress, the State legislatures, and other public officials under this legislation, so that they would be subject to draft the same as anybody else and not be exempted. It seems to me that this is only plain consistency, for if we are convinced of the need and advantages of this legislation, we ourselves should be subject to its provisions. I cannot consistently vote to conscript my constituents, their sons, brothers, and husbands, and vote to exempt myself and my colleagues in public life.

Seventh. Briefly stated, the foregoing are the main reasons why I voted against the peacetime conscription bill, known as the Burke-Wadsworth bill. As I stated at the outset, I have given this entire matter deep, earnest, and serious thought and consideration, and, as a result, reached these conclusions. I am confirmed and fortified in my belief that I have reached the correct conclusion by the fact that some of the largest and most important groups of citizens in the land and their leaders have also expressed themselves in opposition to this legislation. I have time to quote only a few of them.

Raymond J. Kelly, national commander of the American Legion, whose loyalty and Americanism is beyond question, has stated that "conscription should not be put into effect until all other avenues have been exhausted." As we have already noted, all other avenues have not been exhausted, and more volunteers are enlisting in the Army and Navy now than can be readily assimilated.

Harry H. Woodring, former Secretary of War, under President Roosevelt, states:

> I am an advocate of adequate defense, but I will never stand for sending American boys into Europe's shambles. There is a comparatively small clique of internationalists who want the United States to declare war and get into the European mess with everything we have, including our manpower.

William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, said:

> In providing an adequate army for defensive purposes, the American way should be followed first. A voluntary enlistment program should be launched by the Government designed to create an army of 1,500,000 men. This would be putting voluntary action before compulsion. American labor would respond to such a program wholeheartedly and enthusiastically.

Dr. Francis E. Townsend has denounced peacetime conscription as "unnecessary at this time, and un-American."

John L. Lewis, president of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, said:

> I wonder if in our zeal to protect our country from the shadow of Hitler we are not using some of Hitler's methods that will in the end proscribe our civil liberties and create social confusion and unrest to the point that will bring about the very conditions we are trying to escape.

The Railroad Labor Executives Association, and 4 standard railroad brotherhoods, representing 1,000,000 railway workers, issued a statement opposing conscription at this time, in which it was said:

There has been no demonstration that the voluntary method will not furnish the necessary manpower.

Speaking for the archbishops and bishops of the administrative board of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, Msgr. Michael J. Ready told the House Military Affairs Committee:

This legislation is too important to be rushed through Congress until all other possible programs have been examined.

The Methodist World Peace Commission, representing 8,000,000 members, said:

Military conscription at this time is not essential to national defense. We refuse to believe that the United States, in order to preserve its own way of life, must cease to be a democracy and become itself a totalitarian regime.

Many more extracts from testimony, statements, and similar expressions of opposition to peacetime conscription could be quoted. But these will suffice to establish the substantial and widespread opposition that exists among all classes and groups of citizens.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1940

RESOLUTION OF THE GENERAL WELFARE FEDERATION OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have printed in the RECORD with my remarks the following resolution of the General Welfare Federation of Southern California:

HUNTINGTON PARK, CALIF., August 25, 1940.—Our President of the United States, Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt, in one of his recent national broadcasts, said:

"There is nothing in our present emergency to justify a breaking down of our old-age pensions or unemployment insurance. I would rather see the system extended to other groups who do not now enjoy them."

The Honorable ROBERT L. DOUGHTON, chairman of the Congressional Ways and Means Committee, has been quoted as recently saying:

"I agree fully with my associates on the committee, Mr. MCCORMACK and Mr. DINGELL, in their statement to the effect that the bill you are pressing, the General Welfare Act, H. R. 5620, is by far the best pension bill in the field. What we members of the committee appreciate about it the most is that it has been handled as a piece of legislation and not as a political football for vote-getting purposes."

Believing that these two endorsements of the fundamental principles of a sound, common sense, adequate national old-age pension, backed by the signatures of 201 Congressmen and a congressional steering committee of 80 Congressmen, this act, H. R. 5620, is worthy of the most earnest consideration of every Congressman of the 48 States; this southern California general welfare mass meeting, representing all of the congressional districts of southern California assembled this 25th day of August 1940 hereby

Resolve, That we sincerely and most earnestly appeal to every Congressman who has not yet signed the Magnuson petition, No. 15, to bring H. R. 5620 out of the Ways and Means Committee to the floor of the House for a full discussion and a vote, to immediately sign this petition as one of his duties in advancing the cause of national defense by insuring to the citizens of this Nation the moral and economic stability necessary for the fullest possible support; and be it further

Resolved, That in the name of the millions of elderly citizens who have spent their lives in helping to build this United States of America to its present world supremacy, in the name of the millions of the mothers and grandmothers, in the name of the millions of the youth of the Nation who are now without employment, and in the name of the millions of innocent young children, and the millions yet to be born, we appeal to you from the very depths of our hearts and souls to do this patriotic duty and sign this discharge petition today.

Passed by unanimous standing vote and a heartfelt prayer that the good Lord will answer this appeal.

Signed by:

THOMAS C. ROBERTS,
President, Southern California General Welfare Mass Meetings, South Gate, Calif.

S. HOWARD LEECH,
Secretary and Publicity Director, Baldwin Park, Calif.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE WILLIAMS

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. MILTON A. ROMJUE, OF MISSOURI

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith a copy of an address made by Hon. MILTON A. ROMJUE, of Missouri, chairman of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee of the House of Representatives, at St. Louis, Mo., August 21, 1940, before the national convention of rural letter carriers, at which convention there were in attendance representatives from 46 of the 48 States.

The address is as follows:

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Combs, gentlemen of the convention, and members of the Rural Carriers Association, it is indeed a pleasure for me to be here this afternoon and to have this opportunity to meet you. Many of you I know personally. Some of you I have known for a great many years. I wish I could know you all personally, and I wish I could have the opportunity to sit down and visit with you individually.

I want to take this opportunity to say that I appreciate the very kind remarks which your chairman has made in regard to myself and to your post office committee. I have known Mr. Combs quite some time. I have found him a very excellent gentleman, a man of good, sound judgment, a man who always approaches the problems that he presents with reason—and that is the only way to approach any problem—and it has been a delight to know him and to work with him and to help him and those whom he represents whenever your committee has been able to do so. I do not claim the credit which he seems to give me. We have a wonderfully fine committee of about 25 members, some Republicans and some Democrats. When I became chairman of the Post Office Committee I conferred with each of these members individually, many of those who knew me before, had served on the committee with me for some years, but to the new Members coming in, I said very frankly to them, "Without regard to your politics, even though you may be a Republican and I be a Democrat; even though I might feel like you ought not to be a Republican, that is perfectly all right and your privilege, but in this committee our business is to legislate for the best interests of our country, dealing fairly on all problems that come before the committee for consideration." And I feel that there is no committee in the House of Representatives that has a finer membership than the Post Office Committee, the chairmanship of which I happen to hold at this time. I have found the Republican members working diligently, member by member, like the Democrats, interested in solving the problems in what we believe to be the fairest and most reasonable way. So it happens that a very distinguished Congressman from Alabama, who does not happen to be on the Post Office Committee, but who is very familiar with its work, during this session paid our committee a very high compliment, in which he said: "Whenever any legislation comes out of the Post Office Committee, you can be assured of this, that it has had a most careful study and analysis." Fortunately, and due largely to the sound judgment of my fellow members on that committee, more so perhaps than to myself, they have been ready to counsel on any problems, and during the last regular session of Congress, of the 18 bills that have come out of that committee, every one of them had a unanimous report, no division, no political, and no party division. Which would indicate to you that our members without regard to politics were trying as best we knew to solve these problems right. During this session of Congress I am not quite sure just how many we have reported out, possibly 12 or 15 bills, and every one of them up to this time has had a unanimous report of the committee. When we found that we sometimes differed on minor problems, we held the matter up and conferred further until we finally found that we were all in accord.

I am very grateful to be here this afternoon, and I appreciate the fine work that Mr. Combs has been rendering to the Post Office Department, and especially the Post Office Committee, and I would be remiss in my duty if I did not avail myself of this opportunity to say to you that I regret very much that General Farley is to leave as head of the Post Office Department. [Applause.] My work as chairman of the Post Office Committee during a large part of the time that he has been at the head of the Department has been most pleasant and most excellent from his standpoint. I wish I could tell you people and impress upon you how highly he regards the individual rural carriers of this country. He understands much better than you know how well you men have been discharging your duties. He believes, as I believe, that there is no finer body of men in the world than the rural carriers of this country. [Applause.]

I came in here yesterday afternoon quite tired. Last night I came down and mixed around among the crowd and met a good many people. A great many of them I did not know, and I am going to tell you the truth, I have got this sort of philosophy of life: A man should always tell the truth or not say anything. If that don't solve his problems, go to asking questions as fast as you can. That will get you along very well. But you know, Mr. Combs, I was delighted when I looked over in the lobby of this hotel yesterday evening and saw this fine body of men. I knew a lot of them were fine fellows, but I hadn't seen you all, and when I went back up to my room I said to my wife, "I don't believe I ever attended any convention, political or otherwise, where there was a finer looking lot of men than I see here in this rural carriers' meeting." She agreed with me. [Laughter.] Of course, the first thing I was doing was looking you men over, you understand, because I knew you were the carriers, you were the men in the service, the men behind the gun, so to speak, in this great service. Then this morning I went down and I looked around and my wife was with me, but I began looking at the women [laughter], and, bless your soul, I want to confess to you it was a surprise to me, after looking you fellows over and making up my mind like I had, as good looking as you were, intelligent as you seemed to be, when I went back to my room with my wife, I said, "How in the devil did those fellows get as good looking women as they have got?" [Laughter and applause.] But here was the evidence which I cannot dispute. Well, there is no better class of people than the rural carriers, and among them I have had a lot of wonderfully good friends.

I want to say in addition to what I have said about General Farley—and I can't emphasize too much what a great service he has rendered this country—he has made the best Postmaster General this country ever had [applause], but he would not claim that he had made that all by himself. I have talked with him on many occasions, and he knows it has only been possible for him to do that because of the fact that he had a very efficient Postal Service from the top to the bottom, all the way down the line Of course, once in a while rural mail carriers go wrong, like a Congressman does. [Laughter.] They make mistakes now and then. But the Postmaster General has always had a sympathetic heart, has had good men under him, Mr. Purdum, Mr. O'Connell, Mr. Black, and all of them have been very efficient in their procedure. I understand Mr. Purdum is here at this convention, or will be before it is over, a most excellent gentleman who has been promoted to Second Assistant Postmaster General. By the way, a man that many of you know, Mr. Myers, has been made Fourth Assistant Postmaster General. I do not know Mr. Myers so well yet, but I am sure he is wise enough to get along all right. I was thinking about him last night. A few days ago he went into a restaurant there in Washington and bought himself an order of oysters, and in eating those oysters he found a pearl in one of them, which I understand, if the newspapers are to be believed, he sold for $200. Well, when I read that, I thought to myself, a Congressman has got just as much right to find a pearl as an Assistant Postmaster General, so that afternoon I went downtown and I ordered 18 oysters. I commenced on those little blue points, which are small, as you know, the smallest oyster there is. I chewed those oysters up, but I didn't find any pearls. Another Congressman was with me, and I said to him, "I haven't found any pearls yet. I believe I will get the next biggest oysters." So when the waiter came up I said, "What is the next largest oyster you have to these? I haven't found any pearls in these." He said, "The next ones are what we call Chincoteagues." So I said, "Bring me half a dozen Chincoteagues." He brought them in and I ate those, and still I didn't find any pearls. After a while the waiter came back and said, "Do you want any more?" I said, "Yes; bring me half a dozen of the biggest you have got." So he brought me in what they call Lynhaven, pretty nearly as big as your hand. I got about four of them down and that was about as far as I could go, but I didn't find any pearls. So I took a paper napkin and wrapped up the other two and put them in my pocket. [Laughter.] Then I went over to the Post Office Department to see Mr. Myers. I figured I couldn't eat the other two, and I thought I would take them over for him to eat and see if he couldn't find a pearl.

Unfortunately for me, perhaps, he was not in, so I couldn't give them to him. Well, anyway, I am not telling this to you folks in order to get you to eat more oysters. That is entirely with you, but I want to say that every once in a while I get a letter from somebody who is not a rural carrier, who will write me and say: "Our rural carrier here is drawing down big pay. He is not earning what he gets. I will take that job a lot cheaper than he is doing it, and I want to get a bill passed through Congress so you can let this out at public bidding and let the lowest bidder have the job. Our carrier is a very nice fellow, I guess, but he has been drawing a pretty good salary, and I don't think it is worth that." Then he will point out some sunshiny day when you fellows go around in your automobiles and get back a little early, and he argues that that shows what an easy job you have. But he never says anything about the snowstorms that you get caught in, and he never says anything about the mud that some of you have to go through. Then, of course, he will point out that you have hard-surfaced roads to travel over all the time, which is true, of course, to a considerable extent. Well, I remember a few years ago when they had that proposition up, some fellows were advocating that the rural carriers are getting paid too much money, and some of them were before our committee testifying that all you fellows did was to get out and drive around for 3 or 4 hours and come back on hard-surfaced roads. I listened to a few statements of that kind and then I said: "Did you ever stop to think about this, my friend, that the hard-surfaced roads don't run in circles?" [Laughter.] Well, he looked at me in amazement and he said, "How's that, Mr. Congressman?" I said, "Did you ever stop to think—now you are charging that these rural carriers ride on hard-surfaced roads all the time, but did you ever stop to think that the hard-surfaced roads don't run in circles? They build hard-surfaced roads through States on the most direct line. They try to find usually the shortest distance between two points. It is true that sometimes some of these carriers have a little more hard-surfaced road than others, but while I haven't stopped to figure it up I think I can take my district in northeast Missouri, and I will venture to state that the rural carriers of my district don't travel over 3 or 4 miles on hard-surfaced roads in that district." That was about 4 years ago. I checked up on it after that and I found that the actual figure was about 3 miles or 3½ of real hard-surfaced roads. That is all that the rural carrier has to travel on. He crosses hard-surfaced roads. Sometimes he follows them for a mile or two and then off he goes. Well, this critic hadn't thought about that, and after the hearing was over he came to me and said: "Congressman, you told me something I had not thought about. I never thought about the hard-surfaced roads running straight through a State." I said, "They certainly do. In Missouri, route 36 starts at Hannibal and goes right directly across to St. Joe. It don't deviate more than a couple of miles on the whole way. So if you have got the idea that a carrier starts out and travels halfway to St. Joe, and then comes back [laughter], you just don't understand the job that the carrier has got."

Sometimes I wonder if the most difficult problem we have in this life is to see the other man's problem. If we could ever stop to think about what the other fellow has got to do, and try just for a short time to put ourselves in his place, we would be more sympathetic with his viewpoint. I suppose it is all right that the Creator made us so that we would be more or less selfish. I think that is all right, to be somewhat selfish, because if some people are not made a little bit selfish, they would be too lazy to do anything. [Laughter.] That is a fact, they would not do anything. So God Almighty was rather wise after all. He kind of fixed it up so we would all be a little selfish. It puts us on the road to success, to try to do something.

I remember very well the first term of school I taught, I taught for $20 a month and rode 14 miles every day And those were the happiest days of my life—that is, till after I got married. [Laughter.] Everything has been going all right since then. Of course, I started out early in the morning and got there in time to perform what I thought was my duty. Well, in the afternoon after school was out, when I got home I had nothing to do, so I always carried a good book with me, which is about the best companion any young man, or women either, for that matter, can have, and I always carried a good book with me, and as I would ride along coming back the 7 miles home, I would read that book. I didn't have anything else to do, and I was just getting myself a little better prepared for the problems I would meet in future life. And, as I say, a man never had a better companion, perhaps—that is, in material things, outside of human individuals—than the companionship of a good book.

Now, I am not going to talk a great length of time because I know you have got quite a program here. How long have I got to talk?

President COMBS. Go right ahead, Congressman.

Mr. ROMJUE. Two hours? I never talk over 2 hours. [Laughter.]

I have had a lot of experience with rural carriers. I have a lot of good friends among them, and I appreciate them. Of course, sometimes a rural carrier will go wrong. The Post Office Department is very generous but always demands good service, looks into any complaint very carefully and acts firmly as it ought to, but you know you would always rather—that's human nature, you know—you would always rather see your enemies suffer than your friends. That is natural.

A few years ago I had a very delightful carrier friend—he is retired now—a very delightful, very intelligent fellow, a very fine fellow, I think. He was carrying the mail on a rural route, and while he was not supposed to take a hand in politics, he would always kind of nose around and try to help me. Of course, I didn't have anything against that. [Laughter and applause.] Well, one day he wrote me a letter, or rather, one of his friends who knew him perhaps better than I did wrote me a letter and said: "This fellow"—I would call him "Smith," but I am afraid there are too many of you fellows here by that name, so I will call him "Mr. A." Some of his friends wrote me about Mr. A. and they said: "Mr. A is your friend. He is a rural carrier and is a good fellow. Everybody likes him except one or two. He is in a little difficulty, and if you can help him out, we will appreciate it."

Then as they got a little further along in the letter, they told me what the trouble was, that he had been charged with getting tight. Of course, you fellows can figure out what that means. [Laughter.] Well, I don't know. I never saw him take a drink of liquor in my life, and I wondered when I came in here and saw this sign up here "Milwaukee," I wondered how you fellows came to put that up there. [Laughter.] When we all know what made Milwaukee famous. [Laughter.]

Anyway, getting back to Carrier A, he wrote me about it, and I went down to see about it. I knew this fellow, knew he was a fine chap, knew that everybody loved him except probably one or two. Maybe somebody wanted to get his job. I understand that once in a while they try to do that. Well, I went down to the Post Office Department and they got out the papers and I saw what they had him charged with—which I already knew—and they said, "We have got him charged with getting tight." Well, I said, "I never heard of it until I got this letter. If he gets tight, I don't know it, and what about it? Have you ever had any trouble with him before?" "No; this is the first charge we have had." We talked it over and I said, "Well, I'll tell you, I've got a lot of letters from his friends, and they finally sent me a long statement signed by everybody on his route, I think, but two, endorsing him." They said, "In view of that, of course, we will have to reprimand him." I said, "That's all right. He had no business getting caught." [Laughter and applause.] So they reprimanded him, but they said they were going to let him stay, but he had no business doing that. Of course, I don't know whether he did or not, but suppose he did just this once, every man is entitled to one mistake. Every dog from a legal standpoint is entitled to one bite, and a man ought to have the same rights, until he gets to be a nuisance, and then you have got the right to sue a man to make him pay for it. Well, they said, "We are going to excuse him this time, but we are going to admonish him."

That was all right. When I got back home he came to see me and told me more details about it, and I told him: "Now, listen, I'm not going to lecture you at all, but if you must get a little tight, don't get tight on duty. Don't get tight any time, for that matter. And if you do, do it in a place where you are not going to get caught." [Laughter.] I just told him what I thought about the plain horse sense of it. Time went on and he performed fine until next election, when he would get out, you know, and work for me. I didn't have to ask him to do it. And then after 2 or 3 years they charged him again with getting tight. I looked up the file, and I says, "Well, this is the second time the old boy has got tight." Maybe he had got tight more than that, but this was the second time he had been caught at it [laughter], so I went down. I wanted to help him, of course, for two reasons: First, everybody in the neighborhood nearly was his friend, and, most of all, he was my friend. [Laughter.] So I talked to him again, and, of course, the Post Office Department talked pretty straight to me and said, "Now, Mr. Congressman, this is the second time for this same offense." I said, "Well, if he ever took a drink, I don't know it. Maybe he did. And, of course, as I said before, he is entitled to one mistake." "But," they said, "this is twice." I said, "Now, wait a minute. Most every man in his lifetime makes two mistakes." [Laughter.] Most everybody does. I don't know whether you ever did or not, but awhile back I was driving down Pennsylvania Avenue in my car, driving faster than the law allows. They didn't pinch me, didn't stop me, but I came to the realization myself that I was violating the law. I have done that several times, but fortunately the policeman never caught me at it.

"Well," I said, "can't you look over it again with this fellow? Everybody likes him. Everybody is for him out there except one or two." You know, I never did know up to that time what one of these fellows was sore about. I found out later, but I didn't know it then. Well, they said, "Now, Congressman, we can't tolerate that." I said, "I'm not trying to find fault with the way you run the Post Office Department, but if, in view of the fact that everybody on his route is for him and everybody likes him except one or two men, I wish you would not hold this against him. Give him one more chance, and I will never come back to you again on this proposition. I won't approach you again on it." "Well, then," they said, "in view of that, we are going to keep him in." So they did, but they said they were going to reprimand him stronger this time than ever, and they said, "If this ever occurs again, he is going out." They wrote me a letter on the subject and I sent it to him.

Well, when I came back home my friend came in to see me. In the meantime another election had come on and he had gone out and worked for me. So I told him, "Now, listen, I can't go with you on this any longer, because I promised them this time, in order to keep you in, that it wouldn't occur again, so you will just have to cut it out, because I'm not going on with a proposition like that any more, so don't ask me." He said, "I won't ask you again."

Well, time went on, 3 or 4 years, and then they sent in another complaint against him. In the meantime he had gotten up to pretty nearly where he lacked about a year of being retired. Some of you old fellows are about up there now; some of you are trying to get up there—not that you are trying to get old faster, but you are getting up there anyway. Well, about 3 years went by and this carrier wrote me a letter and said: "It looks like I'm up against it this time. I hoped to never have to appeal to you again for help, but this is pretty serious. They have got me charged with kissing a widow [laughter] and if you can only help me out of this, I will promise you I will never bother you again. As a matter of fact, I told you I would never appeal to you any more, but of course, they had me charged then with getting tight. This is different." [Laughter.] Well, pretty soon here comes a long petition signed by everybody on his route except two. So I took the petition, stuck it in my pocket, and walked down to the Post Office Department. They got out their files and they said: "Congressman, we can't do anything about this." I said, "What's the matter?" They said, "Well, don't you remember, we talked about this before, and the last time you were in here, 2 or 3 years ago, you said you would never approach us on this matter again?" I said, "That's right. I'm not denying it nor excusing it. That is the truth, but you must remember no charge like this has ever been brought against him before. I am seeing you now on an entirely new case." [Laughter.]

Well, they wouldn't promise to do anything except hold it up a while. I said, "Won't you investigate it? I will investigate it, too, and if you will hold it up till I get back home and find out the real truth about the matter, I will write you or come and see you." They promised to do that and they did.

Well, I came back home and got hold of my friend and talked with him, and he said, "Now, I'll tell you the truth about that. Of course, you may not believe it," and he looked at me and grinned, and of course, you can interpret it like you please. "I did stop at this widow's house. It was snowing like the dickens, and blowing, and the thermometer was down to zero, and people on my route often give me a cup of coffee in bad, cold weather." I expect lots of you fellows have had a cup of coffee on a cold day on your route. [Laughter]. Whether it went any further than that I don't know. [Laughter.] That's none of my business, and I don't care.

Well, he says, "You have been mighty kind to me, and I wouldn't lie to you, so help me God, and all there is to that is that when the weather was cold, down to zero, that woman always when I come with the mail calls me in for a cup of coffee. Other people on my route do the same. Sometimes I drink 8 or 10 cups of coffee on one round [laughter], and I'll tell you what the real truth is. You will observe that that petition was signed by every patron on the route except 2. These two fellows are old bachelors. They have about lived their time out without marrying, and they are jealous of me. They want the widow. Of course, I haven't got any use for her. I have got one wife, but just because I stop there and drink a cup of coffee with her on a cold day they think I am courting her, which I am not."

So I was armed with that statement, and I believe he told the truth. I went back and talked to the Post Office Department, and I said, "I have investigated this and here is the story the man tells me, and everybody on the route except two old bachelors are his friends, and these two old bachelors are jealous of each other and both of them are jealous of anybody that stops at this widow's house." [Laughter.] And I said, "Of course, I will admonish him, if you keep him in the Service; I will admonish him that he ought to be awfully slow about drinking coffee at a widow's place." [Laughter.] "Well," they said, "in view of that, Congressman, we will excuse him this time, but don't come back to see us any more, either about a drink or a widow." [Laughter.] Anyway, about a year after that he was retired and I have never heard any complaint one way or the other since.

Well, anyway, we have got a lot of problems to think about in this country. The Post Office Department is registering the aliens in this country. I don't know of any law against any of you fellows furnishing the Post Office Department with any information about aliens. You don't have to register. I have got great respect for an alien that is a gentleman and comes to our country and conducts himself properly, but, of course, I am an American and couldn't be anything else, because in my family on both sides of the house all the way back my ancestors were here before any government was established, before the Revolutionary War was fought. I don't descend from anybody that came to America after the Government was first founded, so I suppose I might be called an American. Anyway, we can treat other people right, but this country belongs to Americans. [Applause.] We hear a lot of people talk about free speech. That's all right, but the man that is most insistent about having free speech, and the newspapers that demand free speech, always want to criticize everybody else. Once in a while we have a bunch that bobs up in the United States Senate or in Congress and raises the devil if the President says one word that they think he ought not to. Well, fortunately, or unfortunately, this country provides for the election of only one President at a time, and about the biggest job any man has got when he is elected or appointed to any office, just like a rural carrier has got, is to attend to his own business first. That is his job. Not try to run everybody else's job; not try to be President, United States Senator, and Congressman all at the same time. No man can do that.

President COMBS. Go right ahead, Congressman.

Mr. ROMJUE. I enjoy being here with you people, but I am not going to talk much longer. I would be very glad to hear from you any time on any problem in which you are interested. I have known Mr. Combs so long and so well; I know his standing in the Post Office Committee up there, and I know that any problems in which you are interested always receive most careful and prompt attention. I want to thank you rural carriers for the fine spirit which you have shown since the European war broke out. You realize, as well as I do, what great problems we have to deal with at this time. As I said a moment ago, I suppose it is all right for people to be a little bit selfish, but, unfortunately, what is troubling us most now is that so many people in the world, not only in Europe but elsewhere, have got so selfish that they have adopted the rule that they want to do something to somebody instead of doing something for somebody. [Applause.]

I grew up a poor boy. I haven't got much yet, but I have always petition signed by everybody on his route except two. So I took been busy and always worked. Three or four days ago I went over to the office of another Congressman in the House Office Building, and after I had left the Congressman's office I started down on the elevator, and a stranger had stepped up and rung the bell to go up just before I rung the bell to go down. I didn't know him, but, of course, when I got on the elevator the elevator boy knew me but he didn't know the stranger, and he said to me, "Mr. Congressman, did you say go down?" I said, "Yes; but take this gentleman up first." Well, he didn't know the stranger, and I didn't either. It might have been his first visit to town, so far as I know. The stranger said nothing, and I said, "Take this gentleman where he wants to go first." The elevator boy said, "I thought maybe you might be in a hurry. Of course, this office building is your office building for you Congressmen." But I said, "Go ahead and take him up," and he did take him up, and coming down he said to me, "I would have been glad to take you first," and I said, "No; I didn't want you to do that. If it had been an emergency, if someone in my family had been sick and I was hurrying for a doctor, I would have told you to take me down quick, but that was not the case and I was not in a hurry." "Well," he said, "you are different from some people." I said, "I don't know whether I am or not, but it is perfectly all right with me, and it didn't take but a minute of my time." And I said, "Young man, I appreciate the fact that you talk to me like you do, and let me tell you something. You are a young man working here on this job and no doubt going to school." He said, "Yes; I'm going to night school, trying to get an education." I said, "That's fine. Now, always remember this, that the cheapest thing you can have, that costs least and pays the biggest dividends is kindness and courtesy." [Applause.] Nobody in the world knows that better than you rural carriers, especially if you have been on your route very long. Everyone of you have got some people on your route that you couldn't satisfy at all, no matter what you did, but I am sure most of the people are not that way.

Now, I am not going to take any more of your time. I am glad to be here, glad to meet you. I wish that I knew you all individually, and personally I want you to know that when any problem comes before the Post Office Committee in which you are interested I will make it my duty to give it special attention. I will be glad to hear from you and help you whenever I can. [Great applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1940

SPEECH OF MILO PERKINS

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, no man is thinking more clearly today on the whole matter of real national welfare and on the practical solution of the apparent problem of so-called surpluses than Mr. Milo Perkins, Director of Marketing of the Department of Agriculture. It is with a great deal of pleasure that I include his speech herewith:

It doesn't mean much any more to say that a person is a liberal or a conservative. In all America today there are only two kinds of folks; those who know they're living in a new and utterly different sort of world, and those who do not. Those who do not still speak in nineteenth-century platitudes; those who do have little time to speak. They are engaged in action to meet the difficult problems of a world which has been shaken to its very foundations.

We all know that good wages in the cities mean broader markets for the American farmer; and we also know that a prosperous agriculture means greater rural power and more employment in the towns. That basic interdependence is so well recognized that it's a waste of time to do more than mention it.

The problem, of course, is what each group can do to lift the living standards of the other. As a beginning, labor leaders can't do too much by way of informing farm groups of the special problems facing workers in this new world situation. Similarly, farm leaders can't do too much by way of informing labor groups of the special problems facing agriculture because of war in the world. Before they can work together, they must understand each other.

In agriculture alone, for example, an export market which has been running $800,000,000 a year for the last 10 years, is now virtually choked off by war in the world. Thus far farm income has been protected by commodity loans and surplus purchases; more important than that, however, is the fact that we've got the machinery to use most of those surpluses right here at home if any sizable part of the foreign markets remains lost to us. Through our cotton-mattress program, our food-stamp plan, our cotton-stamp plan, and our school-lunch program, the low-income folks of this country now have a chance to use the surpluses pending the time they can get work and buy them.

That's important for national health defense. If we want to know just how important it is, we can ask our local recruiting officers about the thousands of boys from relief and other low-income families who are unable to qualify for military service because of health reasons. They've been living on an average of a nickel a meal at retail prices, and many of them are physically unable to defend their country. By way of contrast, the Army has a food allowance of 15 cents a meal a person at wholesale prices. If civilians in low-income families had half that much to eat, the surplus problems of the American farmer would be solved overnight for all but a few of our crops. We'd have to produce more dairy products, more poultry products, more meat products, and more of most of the fruits and vegetables to meet the demand. Better than half of the farm problem stems from underconsumption in our cities.

Underconsumption, in turn, is primarily due to a lack of purchasing power.

In 1936 two-thirds of our families—comprising 80,000,000 persons—were living on an average cash income of only $69 a month for a whole family. They couldn't buy enough to give the wheels of industry more than a turn or two, and they couldn't buy enough in many cases to give our farmers the cost of production.

They needed at least twice that much income for a minimum American standard of living. There's mighty little skimping the Nation can expect of our housewives and our mothers who are trying to bring up children at any such level of income. As a matter of fact, skimping would injure farm income. Our farmers need broader markets, not narrower ones; and our growing children in these families need more food and a greater variety of it—not less.

It's worth while to figure what would have happened to farm income in 1936 if every family making less than $100 a month had made $100 a month. We won't try to estimate the indirect benefits, but we do know in terms of simple arithmetic how much additional food the farmer would have sold. It would have added $2,000,000,000 a year to the national food bill. Farmers would have spent their part of that money to buy city goods, and a great many of the unemployed would have gone to work.

The real reason that farmers and factory workers have not gotten closer together in the past is because both of them have had to get along on too little. They'll never get as close as they should be as long as 80,000,000 people have to live in families whose average cash income is only $69 a month. The reasons are obvious. The city family might want to see farm prosperity, but there's so little in the family budget for food that it must be bought as cheaply as possible. Even though the food dollar goes 20 percent further than it did in 1929, there's still not enough for food for growing youngsters, and that's that.

The farm family might want to see city prosperity, but crops are selling for considerably less than they did in 1929, and there's so little in the family budget for city goods that they must be bought as cheaply as possible, even if it means low wages in our factories. Farmers bitterly resent the injustice of their getting only 11 percent of the national income when they make up 25 percent of the population—and there we are.

The root of the trouble, of course, lies in the fact that the pie has been too small. Now that we're moving toward fuller employment under the stimulus of the defense program, however, there ought to be a bigger pie, a bigger national income, and more nearly enough for everyone. That will give farmers and laborers a chance to get closer together than they ever have been in the past. It's the chance of a lifetime. If both groups take advantage of it, if they honestly fight each other's battles for higher real income, and not only their own, they can build up a joint purchasing power which will be great enough to keep our factories running full time. Along that road lies a more industrious and a more prosperous America for everybody.

The Nation is buckling down to the job of national defense. Both labor and agriculture may well be proud of the fact that they are fully prepared. We might almost say that they are overprepared. Our farmers are ready for any emergency. They have built up great reserves of food and fiber in their ever-normal granaries. They have also built up the fertility of their lands and can quickly meet all production demands.

Labor also is ready—more than ready—with a great reservoir of manpower prepared to staff industrial production. In fact, millions in its ranks are standing by, waiting eagerly for the word to report for work. It has been estimated that the Nation is losing 80,000,000 man-hours of productive labor every day simply because these men cannot yet find jobs. The dictators learned 10 years ago that the one thing they dared not waste was their manpower. We're beginning to learn that it's the key to Budget balancing, among other things; that, as a matter of fact, the Budget can't be balanced until we have full employment.

If industry can gear itself up to meet our immediate and extraordinary defense needs and then stay geared up to meet our full needs for consumption for the long pull, we can have the balanced economy so necessary to our national welfare. Wages must be high enough to absorb the output of a technological civilization, however, and farmers must have a profit over the cost of production. In no other way can we preserve industrial capitalism. Labor will then be able to earn and buy; agriculture will be able to sell at a profit and buy; business will be able to run its factories full time and make money; and taxes will be easier for all of us to pay. Otherwise they will be intolerable.

We are going to hear more and more during the next year about solving the surplus problems of the American farmer by feeding and clothing the unfortunate peoples of continental Europe. So far, most of the discussion has been on a charity basis. Later on it may even be proposed that we lend money to make such purchases possible. Appeasement proposals will be sugar-coated, of course, to make them as palatable as possible. After the last World War we made such loans, but that was before we had machinery like the stamp plans and the school-lunch program through which we could distribute our surpluses right here at home. Most of the loans were not repaid, and the sales turned out to be gifts. America is not likely to forget that lesson.

All of us are horrified at the possibility of starvation abroad. I hesitate now, as I did 6 months ago, to suggest that charity should begin at home, because I agree that it should not end there. If we have tears to shed for the hungry of the world, however, we ought to shed them first in our own back yard. After that, we can cry to our hearts' content about the tragedy of hunger in other lands, and I, for one, intend to be concerned about it.

Nine million under-nourished children right here at home, however, are eligible for our free school lunches. Last year we provided lunches made in whole or in part from vitamin-rich surplus foods for 3,000,000 of them. This coming school year we hope to reach 6,000,000. The following year we ought to reach all 9,000,000 as a matter of national health defense, and I believe the Nation will want it done. If we can afford several hundred dollars a year to educate a child, we can afford $10 a year to keep that child physically fit for study. A full stomach is the best possible personal defense against "fifth column" poisons.

Today, more than 2,000,000 members of low-income families are eating farm surpluses which they get at their corner grocery store through the Department of Agriculture's food stamp plan. Their food-buying power has been increased by 50 percent; they have 7½ cents to spend for each meal rather than the 5 cents a meal they were spending before. That's less than half as much as the Army ration, but it's half again as much as they formerly got, and that helps a lot. The splendid and unanimous support of merchants throughout the country has made this work an outstanding success We expect that 5,000,000 persons will be receiving the benefits of this program by Christmas. About 20,000,000 persons, however, are getting some form of public assistance, and would be eligible to eat these surpluses if we could expand the stamp plan to reach all of them.

Before we look at this problem of continental European hunger through a telescope, therefore, we ought to look at the problem of under consumption right here at home through a microscope. The remaining 15,000,000 persons should have their chance to eat the surplus through the food-stamp plan pending the time they can get jobs in private industry at good pay and have a decent diet. It's a matter of building up a country strong enough to defend itself before we build up a continental Europe strong enough to attack us. At the moment, of course, the British blockade prevents our sending food to the Continent anyway, and a final British victory naturally would modify our position.

We've got to think in terms of a Hitler victory as well as in terms of a British one, however. After the last World War, thousands of underfed and half-starved German boys were brought back to health in Dutch and Scandinavian homes. Under a Nazi leadership which gave them no alternative, they returned in less than 20 years to conquer the very countries that gave them life itself when they were helpless children. We in America must remember that. Our heads must rule our hearts. So long as the German people are enslaved by the Hitler regime, we must not repeat the mistake of the Dutch and Scandinavians. This is a new and utterly different kind of world, and parts of it are unbelievably brutal.

We are spending billions to defend ourselves with guns so that we can have peace through preparedness. We can afford the extra few hundred millions it will take to build up our health defenses. After that, and not before, we can see how charitable we dare to be with a potential enemy. After that, and not before, we can see to it that we get as much foreign trade as world conditions permit. Even then, we should see to it that it is profitable to us and that it is conducted on our own terms, and not on those of Mr. Hitler. We can be attacked more successfully by economic weapons than by military ones; especially in the beginning. We're going to need old-fashioned Yankee horse trading more in the next few years than we've ever needed it in our whole history.

This does not mean that we should permit starvation abroad if we can stop it safely, nor that we should turn our backs on foreign trade if we can make money out of it. Quite the contrary. It only means that internal strength must come before external generosity and that we must put first things first in a world where the strong are cruel to the weak. If we ourselves intend to survive, we must be hard-headed enough to make our own health defenses impregnable; only then we can safely help to lift the heavy burdens of those who are suffering because of Nazi brutality in other lands. Self-protection is a basic instinct of peoples as well as of individuals.

We have machinery now that we didn't have in 1919 to distribute our sorely needed surpluses right here at home. We've got the programs going now through which we can feed and clothe America first. That kind of action, improving diets and agricultural income at the same time, will do more to bring about unity between farmers and workers than a thousand well-intended speeches.

The permanent prosperity of the American people depends upon a full utilization of our resources. We're moving toward that now and toward fuller employment. While we're reaching it, however, it makes sense to use the surpluses that nature has given us; it makes sense to keep them moving into consumption so that huge inventories will not wreck producer income. It makes sense to expand work like the cotton mattress program, the food-stamp plan, and the cotton-stamp plan and the school-lunch program so as to cushion the shock of lost foreign markets. An adequate diet for our low-income families is the very cornerstone of national defense. Fortunately, it's the least expensive part of it.

Higher living standards, however, won't just happen because we're American citizens and believe in the American way. They can only be brought about by direct and concrete action which deals with specific problems by definite programs. We've got the programs going under which we can feed and clothe America first. We intend to expand them. The Congress has appropriated money for that purpose. Business, labor, and agriculture want it done and we are going to do it.

America Will Never Be Conquered, but America May Commit Suicide

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL T. CURTIS

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1940

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, serious-minded men and women in all parts of the country and in every walk of life are today concerned for the future of our Republic. As we see the lights of liberty and freedom go out in many places in the world, our appreciation of the great heritage that is ours increases.

In the past several months every Member of Congress has given serious attention to the national defense of our country. That is desirable; it should be improved. We are for national defense. In this study of national defense no military expert has appeared and contended that an invading army could conquer continental United States. Yet our Republic is in danger, and that danger is from within.

Let us consider some of the trends wherein the danger lies. In the first place there has been a definite trend in the last 7½ years toward a centralization of power in the Federal Government and toward a one-man government. Let us look at what one-man governments have done for Europe. If there were no one-man governments in Europe it is doubtful if there would be any war there now. Here in this country a subservient majority in Congress has made our Government a one-man government. That man made a desperate effort to destroy the third branch of our Government—our Supreme Court. No party, whose leadership would destroy or dominate the courts of the land, where the rights of free men are determined and protected, is worthy to rule. That party moved further toward a one-man government by violating that American tradition and nominating a man to serve more than two terms as President.

In the second place, we must realize that foreign communistic elements have destroyed great countries. During the past 7½ years communism and other subversive doctrines have been enthroned in the United States. Adherents to those foreign philosophies hold high positions in our Government, and none of them have been discharged. This one-man government refuses to clean its own house.

A third evil that besets us is a growing class consciousness. In the last 7½ years the Government of the United States has by overt actions set class against class, thereby destroying both liberty and equality.

A fourth point to be remembered, is that if our Republic becomes bankrupt, there is great danger that inflation, bloodshed, and revolution may follow. Other forms of government have been totally destroyed in this manner. America can afford to take care of her worthy destitute and to spend for sound internal improvements, but she cannot afford a huge, costly, bureaucratic government, corruption, waste, dishonest bookkeeping, and unsound fiscal policies.

In the fifth place, it is well for us to remember that the doctrine that the State is supreme is absolutely contrary to the American idea that a government exists only with the consent of the governed. During these last few years our Government at Washington has tried to assume a position of being omnipotent, all powerful, all wise, and supreme. The individual has been regimented and debased. God has been pushed into the background and the laws of nature flagrantly defied. An eminent divine in the city of Washington has declared, "We have supplanted the word government instead of God in the twenty-third Psalm." We have been taught, "The Government is my Shepherd, I shall not want." Instead of boasting that "We planned it that way," we should return to the admonition of William McKinley who said, "Our faith teaches us that there is no safer reliance than upon the God of our fathers, who has so singularly favored the American people in every national trial, and who will not forsake us now so long as we obey his commandments and walk humbly in his footsteps."

Aside from any theorizing that we might do, the proof of the pudding lies in the eating. After this period of wild experiment and blind trial and error we find that the depression is still with us. Millions of young men and women throughout the United States have never known what it is to have a job in private enterprise. The American people must turn aside from one-man government, radicalism, class hatred, the road to bankruptcy, and the pagan doctrine that the State is supreme.

These are the things that are shaking the very foundation of our Republic. If we are strong within no nation can conquer us, but unless we place our own house in order America may commit suicide. Individual American citizens must give time and attention to the problems of maintaining good government.

HON. LELAND M. FORD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1940

LETTER FROM HON. LELAND M. FORD OF CALIFORNIA

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., September 9, 1940.

Mr. RALPH L. EMMONS,
United States Attorney, Northern District of New York,
Binghamton, N. Y.

MY DEAR MR. EMMONS: I beg to refer to previous correspondence with you in respect to affidavit filed by me under date of June 5, 1940, calling for the revocation of citizenship granted to Fritz Julius Kuhn. I have received several mere acknowledgments, but in no letter written by you have I received any information as to what action has been taken on the affidavit proposing the revocation of citizenship granted to Fritz Julius Kuhn under fraudulent and perjurious statements.

It is now September 9, over 3 months since this affidavit was filed, and I therefore think the time has come when we should receive some information as to action on the affidavit in the United States courts. I therefore will appreciate hearing from you on this matter.

I shall also appreciate your giving me the date on which Fritz Julius Kuhn's prison term expires. I shall await hearing from you.

Very truly yours,

L. M. FORD.

The Flood-Control Program Should Move Forward

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL T. CURTIS

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1940

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, there is considerable domestic legislation that should have the attention of Congress. One of the more important items that ought to be considered and passed is the 1940 omnibus flood-control bill. This is an authorization bill for flood-control works in all parts of the United States. This bill has been favorably acted upon by the Flood Control Committee of the House of Representatives but has not been called up on the floor of Congress because it is waiting the "Go" signal from the President of the United States.

The Army engineers; the Flood Control Committee, of which I am a member; and the individual Members of Congress have done all they could do to advance this bill. The responsibility now lies with the administration that controls the program of this House. This bill has been before the House since May 7, 1940.

Included in this bill is an item for the construction of an on-river dam on the Republican River near Republican City, Nebr. This item for the Republican City Dam was placed in this omnibus flood-control bill at my request. This was done early last spring. I am for this dam. It is very important that this dam be constructed. It will bring flood protection to a great territory in Nebraska and in Kansas. It will provide irrigation for portions of the counties of Harlan, Webster, Franklin, and Nuckolls in Nebraska, and in some portions of Kansas. The irrigation provided for by this construction is of supreme importance in view of the persistent and severe drought that has prevailed throughout that territory.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that the leadership in this House can prevail upon the administration to give this most worthy bill an opportunity on the floor of the House.

The Free State of Maryland Is Determined To Rid Itself of Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS D'ALESANDRO, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1940

Mr. D'ALESANDRO. Mr. Speaker, the time has come in America for Americans to awake to what is going on about them. We who love freedom of opportunity, religious liberty, and political rights must realize that within and without there stands powerful forces that would destroy our American institutions. Little do some of us realize the insidious foreign influences and propaganda that are active all about us. The Communist Party, professing Americanism, but accepting its orders and instructions from Moscow, has been boring from within. The Communists have entered the teaching role in our schools and colleges. Diligently the "red" agitator has been spreading his teachings of class hatred and strife.

Everything that we have been taught from infancy to hold dear is held up to scorn, ridicule, and hatred. The family and the home, the Communist would destroy. Were the Soviet to succeed from without, or triumph by a successful revolution from within, Christianity would be banished from American life. The religions of our fathers—Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish—would meet the fate religion has met in Soviet Russia. The churches would be turned into halls for riotous living. The holy men and women of religious vocations would be violated and butchered.

In the words of a distinguished religious leader and citizen of Baltimore, the purpose of communism is not to keep the poor contented and happy but to create discontentment and to keep it steadily growing. The worst possible thing in the world for Communists is contentment. They breed on discontent.

There is no room for communism or any other "ism" in America but true patriotic Americanism. I am happy to say that the Free State of Maryland is making strenuous efforts to rid the State of the Communist Party, as shown in the following articles from the Baltimore Sun:

[From the Baltimore Sun of August 24, 1940]

LEGION GROUP VOTES BANS ON REDS, BUNDISTS—MOTIONS SEEKING DISFRANCHISEMENT OF BOTH PASSED UNANIMOUSLY—HARMAN AND TABLER VIE FOR DEPARTMENT COMMANDER POST

(By John C. A. Watkins)

CUMBERLAND, August 23.—Resolutions seeking the disfranchisement of both Communists and Nazis in Maryland were approved unanimously here this afternoon by the resolutions committee of the American Legion's twenty-second annual State convention.

Both resolutions, one aimed directly at the Communists and the other at "certain semimilitary organizations designated as bunds and otherwise," will be submitted to the convention as a whole at its final business session tomorrow morning. They are expected to pass without difficulty.

The anti-Communist resolution incorporates an original recommendation calling for the barring of the Communists from the ballot and a later suggestion by William C. Walsh, the attorney general of Maryland, that the purpose might be achieved more definitely by a law requiring publication of the names and addresses of signers of petitions for the appearance of candidates on general election ballots.

MAY BE UNCONSTITUTIONAL

Mr. Walsh had suggested that legislation aimed specifically at the Communists might be unconstitutional, and that a general law requiring that all political groups publish their petitioners' names and addresses would be legal and would do the job just as well. In other words, that the light of publicity would bar the timid from the Communists' petitions and would expose the forgeries that the veterans charge have been committed in their petitions.

The resolutions committee, headed by Benjamin Wolfson, decided it would make certain that the anti-Communist legislation would be put across one way or the other by incorporating both ideas in the one resolution, and then approved still another aimed specifically at Nazi sympathizers in the State.

The anti-Communist resolution says that "the Communist Party in the United States is understood to be sponsored and controlled by a foreign power" and that its "avowed purpose is to change our form of government and that it advocates the use of force and other unlawful means to accomplish this."

BANS RECOMMENDED

So, says the committee's Communist omnibus bill, the Maryland department of the Legion "recommends that legislation be passed prohibiting the placing of the names of members of the Communist Party and of similar organizations on the ballot in Maryland as candidates for any elective office; we further favor the passage of legislation making it illegal for any Communist or member of any similar organization to hold any office by appointment or otherwise in the State of Maryland."

Since this was the part that Mr. Walsh thought might be unconstitutional, the committee added for good measure the following:

"And be it further resolved, That should such legislation be found to be unconstitutional, or its constitutionality seriously questioned, legislation be passed requiring that the names and addresses of all persons signing petitions for the nominations of any candidates for public office under the laws of the State of Maryland be published."

JUST TO MAKE SURE

That takes care of the Communists and the bundsmen alike so far as politics is concerned, the veterans feel. But, just to make certain there will be no misunderstanding about its attitude, the committee recommends the adoption of a resolution requiring the publication of the names of all members of the "certain semimilitary organizations designed as bunds and otherwise and having sympathies with foreign powers whose systems of government are opposed to the American system of government."

Officers of the Legion say that the convention will adopt both resolutions without serious question. The temper of the delegates is running high on the question of the loyalty of certain groups toward the United States. As was indicated clearly this afternoon by the experience of a peddler of patriotic pins and other souvenirs of the "God bless America" type on Baltimore Street, the main thoroughfare.

USHERED OFF STREET

This man was wearing a costume which resembled that of the Legionnaires as closely as he could legally and is a member of a group of traveling peddlers who work, what the Legionnaires call, "a racket" all over the State. They received a license to ply their trade here through an oversight on the part of the city government, and their presence is meeting violent objections from the delegates to the convention.

Any way, this particular member of the group apparently had "one too many" this afternoon and began forcibly halting people on the street. If they refused to buy his 10-cent pins, he made scurrilous remarks about the Legion and finally began shouting anti-Semitic accusations, directed toward the organization of which he was pretending to be a member.

He was ushered off the street by a couple of Gentile Legionnaires. He barely escaped arrest. As a matter of fact, a non-Legionnaire resident of Cumberland already had called the police and was preparing to charge him with disorderly conduct.

Other than the routine sort of resolutions usually recommended, there was little business today of more than a purely technical nature, except the drum and bugle corps contests in Fort Hill Stadium and the big parade held tonight before cheering thousands from several States.

DRUM AND BUGLE CONTEST

Baltimore outfits won five of six cash prizes in the contests.

Top prize of $200 was won by the Baltimore District Drum and Bugle Corps in the senior division. It also won the senior color-guard contest and the James Bruce trophy that went with it.

The Baltimore Drum and Bugle Corps was unopposed, as the Francis Scott Key Post Drum and Bugle Corps had non-Legionnaires in its membership and could not compete. The latter group, from Frederick, was awarded $125 in a special contest, however.

The Hamilton Post No. 20, of Baltimore, won the drum and bugle corps contest in the junior division, and received $165. The corps scored 94.3 points on a basis of appearance and performance.

It won fifth place in the national championships at Chicago last year and will go to Boston next month to compete again.

TAKES SECOND PRIZE

Maccabean Post No. 32, of Baltimore, scored 88.6 points and took second prize of $103.

Dundalk Post No. 38 took third place money, $80, with 87.4 points, and Flanders Post No. 65, Baltimore, scored 84.8 points for fourth place and $52 prize money.

Hamilton Post No. 20 also won the junior color-guard contest and the Harry Nice trophy. It scored 191.3 points to beat Flanders Post No. 65, which finished second with 179.3 points.

Federal Post No. 19, of Baltimore, won the silver trophy offered by the Fort Cumberland Post No. 13 for the best Negro drum corps.

Tomorrow is the last day, but practically all of the important business, including that of the election of officers and the approval of the anti-Communist, and so forth, resolutions has been deferred until then and will take place in the morning.

Robert McCullough, of the Snyder-Farmer Post, No. 3, of Hyattsville, withdrew his candidacy tonight for department commander. It was understood his support was thrown to George Harman, member of the Baltimore & Ohio Post, No. 81, of Baltimore, and vice commander of the Baltimore district, giving considerable impetus to the latter's campaign.

Only other candidate for the office is W. Ray Tabler, of Jeff Davis Post, No. 18, Centreville, and past department vice commander.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEEMAN

For national executive committeeman the candidates are:

J. Bryan Hobbs, the incumbent.

Godfrey Child, past department judge advocate and member of Worchester Post, No. 93.

Other candidates may be renominated from the floor in the morning, since the Legion has not gone through the nominating formality. The auxiliary finds itself with only two candidates for the office of department president to succeed Mrs. Joseph C. Shallenberger. These are:

Mrs. William Goldman, of Maccabean Unit, No. 32, of Baltimore, now junior rehabilitation chairman.

Mrs. George Rodock, Jr., of Frederick, a member of the Francis Scott Key Unit, No. 11, and vice president of the auxiliary's western Maryland district.

The auxiliary did its nominating this morning.

FRAUD EVIDENCE FOUND BY DIES GROUP AGAINST BALTIMORE COMMUNISTS—MANY "SIGNERS" OF BALLOT PETITIONS DISAVOW SIGNATURES, WHILE OTHERS CHARGE REDS MISREPRESENTED FACTS TO OBTAIN THEIR NAMES

WASHINGTON, August 28.—Evidence purporting to show widespread fraud and misrepresentation by the Communist Party of Baltimore and its officials in the preparation of petitions to put its candidates on the Maryland ballot in November was disclosed here today in the records of the Dies committee investigating un-American activities.

This evidence is embodied in several hundred letters—mostly from Negroes—some flatly denying that their authors had ever signed the petition and others asserting that the writers had put their names on the document because they were told dozens of varied stories about its purpose.

SUBMITTED OVER SWORN STATEMENTS

The original of the petition in question is on file in the office of the Secretary of State at Annapolis, and was submitted over the sworn and notarized statements of Baltimore Communists and party officials that they personally knew the signers to be registered voters, and that they personally saw these signers whom they knew inscribe their names.

The petition, which contains approximately 2,200 names, has been photostated by the Dies committee for inclusion in its files. It pledges the signers to vote for the Communist candidates the petition puts in nomination.

In its investigation of the petition, which produced the alleged fraud and misrepresentation evidence, the Dies committee wrote to every person whose name was signed to the document.

ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-EIGHT DENY SIGNATURES

The results of these inquiries up until a few days ago were:

Of 2,180 letters addressed to the supposed signers of the petition, 186 were returned to the committee as unclaimed.

Of 302 replies that were received, 148 persons denied that they had signed any such petition.

Sixty-seven said the petition had been misrepresented to them.

Twenty asserted the purpose of the petition either had been misrepresented or their names appeared without their consent.

Twenty-nine said they signed because they believed the Communists had a right to appear on the ballot.

Thirty-two said they had put their names on the petition without reading it.

Four said they had signed it as a favor to a friend.

Two of those who replied said their names had been obtained while they were intoxicated.

WOMEN AS WITNESSES

A majority of the signatures, according to the records, were submitted and sworn to by Sophie Kaplan and Mrs. Dorothy Rose Blumberg, wife of Dr. Albert E. Blumberg, Communist candidate for the Senate, against whom charges of being in contempt of the House of Representatives still are pending in Washington. Dr. Blumberg was cited for contempt for refusal to answer questions before the Dies committee.

The Kaplan woman's address is given as the Free State Book Shop, 207 West Franklin Street.

Others who took oaths that the signatures were those of persons known to them as registered voters included Sam Banks, regional secretary of the Young Communist League; William C. Taylor, State chairman of the Communist Party; Richard Broune, Paul J. Jarvis, Dora Braverman, Minnie Stambler, Oscar Rabovsky, Elmer French, Joseph Kralik, Walter Potrzuski, Benjamin Davis, Alexander E. Munsell, Louise Ellen Munsell.

The affidavits of all who took oaths that they personally had solicited and obtained the signatures were taken by Florence K. Schwartz, a notary public, whose address is given in the Maryland State Manual as 1905 Eutaw Place. The various pages of the petition bear dates in March 1940.

The oath to which they subscribed before the notary was as follows:

"I, ——, do solemnly declare in the presence of Almighty God (or affirm) that each of the persons whose names are signed to the above certificate of nomination are known to me to be registered voters of the district or precinct in which they respectively reside, and that I personally saw each of said signers sign such certificates of nomination."

CRIMINAL LIABILITY

Maryland's election laws hold the person who subscribes to the oath criminally liable for the veracity of the petition.

This section of the law (art. 33, sec. 85) which permits State-wide candidates to be placed on the ballot upon the filing of 2,000 or more bona fide signatures of registered voters, reads, in part:

"Each signer shall append to his signature his residence, occupation, and place of business, and every such paper shall be accompanied by an affidavit or affidavits made before a justice of the peace by one or more persons known personally to the justice and so certified by him and signed by the affiant or affiants to the effect that the signers are known to such affiant or affiants to be registered voters of the district or precinct in which they respectively reside and that the said affiant or affiants personally saw the signers, in regard to whom he or they make oath, sign such paper, and any willfully false statement in such affidavit or affidavits or affirmation shall be deemed a misdemeanor and shall subject the person making the same to the fines and penalties prescribed by the law of this State for the crime of perjury."

TEXT OF PETITION GIVEN

The text of the petition, as it shows on the copies filed with the secretary of state, reads as follows:

"We, the undersigned, voters in the State of Maryland, do hereby certify that we do nominate Earl Browder, who resides in the State of New York, whose address is 7 Highland Place, Yonkers, N. Y., whose occupation is a journalist, for the office of President of the United States of America; and we do further certify that we do nominate James W. Ford, who resides in the State of New York, whose address is 35 East Twelfth Street, New York, N. Y., whose occupation is a building-trades worker, for the office of Vice President of the United States of America; we do further certify that we nominate Albert E. Blumberg, who resides in the State of Maryland and whose address is 2523 Forest Park Avenue, whose occupation is a teacher, for the office of United States Senator for the State of Maryland; we do further certify that we do nominate the following eight voters of the State of Maryland, to wit: Alexander Sylvester, who resides at 127 Aisquith Street, whose occupation is a clothing worker; Alexander Boone, who resides at 1416 Division Street, whose occupation is a laborer; Sam Banks, who resides at 115 West Mulberry Street, whose occupation is a food worker; Dorothy Rose Blumberg, who resides at 2523 Forest Park Avenue, whose occupation is a typist; Walter Potrzuski, who resides at 406 South Regester Street, whose occupation is a clothing worker; William C. Taylor, who resides at 1525 Druid Hill Avenue, whose occupation is a writer; Alexander Munsell, who resides at 919 North Charles Street, whose occupation is a technician; Isadore Samuelson, who resides at 3942 Reisterstown Road, whose occupation is a woodworker, as the Presidential electors for the Communist Party of the State of Maryland.

INTENT TO VOTE ASSERTED

"We do further certify that we and each of us intend to vote for the said persons nominated hereby; we do further certify that the said candidates so nominated are hereby the candidates of the Communist Party."

The law requires that a nominating petition be filed with the Secretary of State at least 10 days before the primary preceding the general election in which the candidates are to appear on the ballot. In the case of the election to be held November 5, a valid nominating petition must have been on file at least 10 days before May 6 in order for the candidates nominated in such a manner to appear on the ballot.

VARIOUS GUISES CITED

In addition to those who flatly denied ever having signed any paper at any time, and who expressed surprise at receiving a "follow-up" letter from William C. Taylor, State party chairman, many whose names were on the petition informed the committee of many guises under which they say the document was presented to them.

Several wrote that they were told it was a petition to get a traffic policeman stationed at a particularly dangerous school crossing.

Three informed the committee that they were led to believe they were signing a protest against the showing of Gone With the Wind, because it pictures Negro people in an undesirable manner.

FROM LYNCHING TO JOBS

Others revealed that they were advised the petition was in support of antilynching legislation, better housing, jobs for unemployed, getting Negro candidates on the Maryland political tickets and for the commutation of the death sentence of a Negro woman murderer to life imprisonment.

A few of those who acknowledge having signed something protested that they did so believing they were joining the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; there were others who asserted they were told the petition had to do with the establishment of a new church in their neighborhood.

One man said he had signed "for peace and old-age pensions." Another said he had been told his signature was to get his "relief" stipend increased.

THOUGHT IT WAS CENSUS

A great number, since the senatorial primary campaign was in progress when they were approached, were led to believe, they said, that the person soliciting the signatures was taking a census of voters.

Virtually everyone who denied being a signer, and those who said they had signed because of misrepresentation, urged that their names be stricken from the petitions.

Some promised cooperation in the prosecution of those responsible for the unauthorized use of their names.

BLIND WOMAN "SIGNS"

One elderly Negro woman told the committee in a letter written for her by someone else that she was blind and did not see what she placed her mark on; another said she could neither read nor write and had only made her mark.

Similar charges of fraud made against the Communists of Pittsburgh and in two adjoining Pennsylvania counties—Beaver and Westmoreland—are being investigated by the Dies committee.

So far the committee has not indicated whether it will—because the petition involves a Federal election—seek any action on the evidence it has with regard to the Baltimore Communists, or simply make what data it has available to State officials.

Prosecutions in Pennsylvania were undertaken by State officials following publication of the names of signers of nominating petitions and the subsequent denial of persons who were listed that they had signed the document.

In Allegheny County (Pittsburgh) 43 Communists are under indictment for fraud in connection with the Pennsylvania petition. They will be tried next month.

In Beaver County two Communists were found guilty of fraud and conspiracy by a jury and sentenced to jail as the result of the investigation.

Four others have been charged with fraud in Westmoreland County.

UP TO THE COURTS

Under the procedure that has been followed in Maryland, the State law department, unless the validity of the nominating petitions are questioned, is called upon only to pass upon the legality of the form of such documents.

Only the courts in Maryland are competent to pass upon the facts of such petitions.

Any voter, however, may bring the matter before the courts on allegation of fraud, or the State, through an executive order of the law department, may take the petitions into court to test their validity.

[From the Baltimore Sun of August 30, 1940]

MANY "SIGNERS" DENY AFFIXING NAMES TO COMMUNIST PETITION—DIES COMMITTEE MAKES PHOTOSTATS AVAILABLE FOR STATE ACTION—GOVERNOR REQUESTS PROSECUTORS TO INVESTIGATE ALLEGED FRAUD

Photostatic copies of all the evidence in the files of the Dies committee purporting to show fraud on the part of the Communist Party in Baltimore in the preparation of nominating petitions will be turned over today to the State's attorney's office.

Arrangements for the copies of the evidence were made last night with Representative MARTIN DIES (Democrat, Texas) by Thomas N. Biddison, assistant State's attorney.

Meanwhile, more than a score of persons whose names were turned in at Annapolis by the Communists as signers of the nominating petition—and previously had advised the Dies committee that they had not signed the papers—reiterated their denials.

ALMOST ALL NEGROES

A check of the Dies records in Washington disclosed that nearly 100 percent of the names listed on the petition filed with the secretary of state were Negroes.

Governor O'Conor took the initiative in requesting the State's attorney not only of Baltimore but also of Anne Arundel County to make an immediate investigation looking to the prosecution of anyone responsible for fraud in the preparation of the petition.

WELLS CUTS VACATION TO ACT

J. Bernard Wells, the State's attorney, of Baltimore, cut short a vacation in order to confer with Mr. Biddison and dispatch him to Washington. Marvin I. Anderson, who is State's attorney of Anne Arundel County, was asked to cooperate, since the petition was filed in that county.

The Governor also asked the two State's attorneys to take the matter up with Bernard J. Flynn, United States attorney, to discuss possible Federal angles involved in the probe.

Through its treasurer, Sam Banks, the Communist Party issued a statement denying any fraud in the petition and asserted that the party will "take all necessary action to defend our place on the ballot."

TWO THOUSAND TWO HUNDRED SIGNATURES

The petition, supposedly bearing about 2,200 bona fide voters' signatures, was filed before the May 6 primary to get the names of the Communist candidates for President, Vice President, and that of Dr. Albert E. Blumberg, senatorial candidate, on the November ballot.

Banks alleged that the Dies revelations concerning the Maryland petition are part of a Nation-wide campaign to discredit the Communists and keep them off the ballot.

Under the Maryland law, responsibility for the factual veracity of the petitions is placed upon persons who attest, under oath, that they personally know the signers to be voters and personally saw them inscribe their names on the document.

TWO WOMEN ATTEST MOST

A majority of the names on the Maryland petition were attested to by Mrs. Dorothy Rose Blumberg, wife of the Communist senatorial candidate, who still faces charges of contempt for refusing to answer questions of the Dies committee, and Sophie Kaplan, who is listed as the manager of a bookstore at 207 West Franklin Street.

Others who subscribed to the oath on the petitions included William C. Taylor, secretary of the party, and Banks.

Violations of the petition statute of the elections law are punishable under the law on perjury.

The comment of some of the persons whose names appeared on the petition yesterday denied that they had ever signed any document to put the Communists on the ballot—or pledged themselves to vote for the Communist candidates so nominated—follows:

"I'M A REPUBLICAN"

Mabel Cromwell, Negro, 1108 Sarah Ann Street: "I wouldn't sign that Communist petition for anything. I'm a Republican, and I mean to stay one!"

Sarah Frey, Negro, 1110 Sarah Ann Street: "I didn't sign—no, indeed! There were two men here a long time ago—a white man and a colored man—but I told them I didn't know anything about it. They said they would fine me if I didn't sign, but I didn't think that was right."

E. T. Kennedy, 3328 Frederick Avenue: "I absolutely did not sign it. I have never even seen this petition, but I would like to get a look at it to see how they got my name on it."

SHE WAS THANKED FOR JOINING

Ella Jennings, Negro, 1034 Sharp Street: "I have never signed anything to do with politics in my life, but one week I got a letter thanking me for joining the Communist Party and inviting me to a party. I don't know where they got my name. No; I didn't go to the party."

Sarah Farrington, Negro, 1133 Sharp Street: "I didn't sign anything. A letter from Washington was the first I heard of it."

Ella Thompson, Negro, 816 Sharp Street: "A man came around about a month or two ago with a petition, but I wouldn't sign it."

"I DIDN'T SIGN ANYTHING"

Julia Mitchell, Negro, 802 Sharp Street: "I don't know what all this Communist stuff is. I didn't sign anything."

Isabella Hall, Negro, 811 Sharp Street: "I don't fool with that kind of stuff; no Communists for me. I never put my name on it."

Susie Douglas, Negro, 909 Leadenhall Street: "I don't know where they got my name from, because I didn't sign any petition."

Samuel Hall, Negro, 837 Leadenhall Street: "No, indeed, I didn't sign it or know anything about it. They had my name as 'Harry' and that proves that it wasn't me who signed."

Fredel Johnson, Negro, 1122 Leadenhall Street: "I haven't signed anything for the Communists. I don't know where they got my name."

DOESN'T REMEMBER IT

Johnnie Pearson, Negro, 155 West Cross Street: "If I did sign it, I don't remember anything about it."

Harry Hall, Negro, 1113 Race Street: "Just like I told 'em at Washington; I didn't sign anything. A man came around and asked my wife to sign something to keep her out of slavery but she didn't sign it, either."

Bertha Thompson, Negro, 103 West York Street: "Somebody asked me to sign a children's playground petition. I didn't sign because I couldn't read it. I haven't signed a thing."

Julia Harmon, Negro, 624 West Lee Street: "It must have been somebody else. I have never signed anything like that in my life."

"DON'T KNOW ANY COMMUNISTS"

Warner C. Jones, Negro, 2432 Madison Avenue: "I don't know anything about the petition. I never signed it, and I would like to know who put my name on the list. I never heard of it until I got the letter from Washington. I don't even know any Communists that I know of. I don't belong to any organization of any sort, not even a union."

Harold E. Thompson, Negro, 2323 Madison Avenue: "I don't know anything about it, if I signed it it was done under false pretense. The only thing that I signed was a petition to bring the antilynch bill up again. It was someone on the street who was going around to get people to sign this paper to bring up the antilynch bill. I think it was a woman, but I did not read the paper. I certainly wouldn't sign any such Communist petition, since I work for the Government."

Adelaide Jenkins, Negro, 2527 Salem Street: "Some white woman came around and said there was a bridge that they had just completed out in Chicago, and they wanted to get up a petition to have some man go to the convention at the opening of the bridge. The writing at the top of the page was just the same as the story she gave me, and I signed it when I saw that other people had too. The top just said where the convention was to be held."

FOR THE SCOTTSBORO BOYS

Margaret Carter, Negro, 815 Forrest Street: "Two men came by one Sunday morning talking about the Scottsboro boys and told us they had saved the Scottsboro boys, and we signed the paper. I just signed the paper because I was busy cooking breakfast, and I thought they were just people doing something for the colored race. I didn't know who they were until a neighbor told me that they were Communists. Neither my husband nor I read the petition—we just signed it. After we got the letter from Washington, we got a letter from the Communist gang on St. Paul Street asking us to pay no attention to it, if we got a letter from Washington, and not to let anyone do us out of our rights, and to come to a meeting. My husband wrote right back and asked them to scratch our names off, that neither of us were Communists."

DENIES SIGNING PETITION

Harry E. Cook, Negro, 927 Rutland Avenue: "A lot of people around the neighborhood said they talked to a man circulating a petition to sign, but I did not see him. When a letter from the Dies committee came, I wrote back that I had signed nothing like they talked about."

Lillian Kittrell, Negro, 1729 East Eager Street: "A man came to see me one night last winter. He asked me if I believed in stopping lynching and mobbing. I thought it was a good thing to stop, but I did not know he was a Communist. It was dark, and I can't see good enough to read after dark, so he explained what I was to sign, only about lynching and mobbing, and I signed it because I thought it was good. The Government wrote me a letter and I wrote them back that I hadn't signed anything about communism. I am the mother of an 18-year-old boy, and I am against lynchin' and mobbin', because if he gets in trouble I don't want him to be lynched. I'm in favor of the law. The only thing I belong to is the church."

Michael Kublitzky, 129 North Lakewood Avenue: "I don't belong to any organizations, nor did I sign any paper circulated by the Communist Party. That's all I will say."

CAN'T WRITE ENGLISH

George Paidas, 1724 Eastern Avenue (through his waitress, Miss Katie Pappas, acting as interpreter): "I did not sign any paper. I don't write or read English. A letter came from the Government, and Mr. Paul Farb, a painter, who lives next door replied to the letter for me, saying that I had not signed anything of that sort. Someone else must have signed my name to the petition."

Mammie Haines, Negro, 408 South Dallas Street: "I don't know nothing about no paper or communism business. I can't read or write. I can't spell my own name. I got a letter from the Government and I sent it back."

Mrs. Estelle Novak, 2008 East Lombard Street: "I don't believe in that sort of stuff—communism. I'm sure I did not sign any petition of any sort. I received a letter from the Dies committee, but I don't know how they got my name."

Lloyd Hazleton, Negro, 643 George Street: "I didn't sign any petition, and I'm against communism."

Agnes Nance, Negro, 505 North Pine Street: "I never signed any paper since I been here, except for the Housing Authority."

Loma Hawkins, Negro, 557 Dolphin Street: "A man asked me would I sign a paper to save Axe Rosie from hanging, and I did. He didn't say anything about communism."

Cora Boyd, Negro, 511 Dolphin Street: "I signed a paper to support an antilynching bill, but I never signed a Communist petition."

Carrie Hill, Negro, 1207 North Stricker Street: "I don't know anything about the Communist Party, I'm not interested in politics, and I never signed anything."

Rev. Helen Brown, Negro, 1015 Argyle Avenue: "I haven't signed anything. A lady came here one night and asked me who lived here—that must be where they got my name."

FOR GOVERNOR NICE

Annie Wise, Negro, 813 Harlem Avenue: "After registration a man and a woman came around, asking if I were going to vote for Governor Nice, and I gave them my name."

Leanora McGuire, Negro, 1311 Riggs Avenue: "I don't know anything about the petition, and don't recall signing anything. I wouldn't sign for the Communist Party."

Effie Chapelle, Negro, 1417 West Lanvale Street: "A man came around and asked me if I would sign a petition for an antilynching bill. He didn't say anything about the Communists. After I got a letter from Mr. DIES, a Mr. Taylor and another Communist came to see me. And after I had signed the antilynch petition, I got a letter from Mr. William C. Taylor, which thanked me for signing the Communist petition, and inviting me to a picnic at Liberty Park on July 4. That was the first I knew that it was a Communist petition."

Mary Moorehead, Negro, 2232 Druid Hill Avenue: "A woman came here pretending to have a petition for freeing the Scottsboro boys. I signed this, and then I got a letter from the Communist Party thanking me for signing the petition to put their candidates on the ballot. That was the first time I knew that it was a Communist petition."

"TO GET A POLICEMAN"

Grace Buchanan, Negro, 2405 Etting Street: "Just after I moved into the neighborhood a lady came around and asked me would I sign a petition to get a policeman on the corner of North Avenue and Cumberland Street. I signed it, but there was no writing on the paper. The lady said they would get the names together and then put the petition in above them. I didn't know nothing about it being a Communist petition."

Phillip Vaughn, Negro, 1939 Madison Avenue: "I don't know anything about any petition. Nobody called on me."

Hattie Roane, Negro, 320 West Preston Street: "I never signed any Communist petition. A lady came here just before election and asked me to register at City Hall. I never did, but I gave her my name. I guess that's where they got it."

Gladys Lee Halley, Negro, 2455 Druid Hill Avenue: "I never signed a Communist petition that I know about. A woman came by who told us (she and her mother) that they wanted to get some colored men in office. She had another petition about a picket line in Washington on the movie Gone With the Wind, but I didn't sign it because I never saw the picture. I signed the other because I thought she was doing something to help the colored people. I am a registered Republican. My mother, Lee Halley, signed the same one as I did. Later on I received a letter from the Communist Party asking me to a meeting July 4. I didn't pay any attention to it."

Elizabeth Henson (Negro), 2521 Salem Street: "I never signed any sort of petition that I know of. A white woman came around, and I signed my name, but I don't know what it was for. She was going from door to door. I generally read things, and I don't know what made me sign my name without reading it first. I'll never do it again."

Joseph Renaudo, 330 North Gay Street: "I didn't know anything about it. When I got that letter from the Dies committee I was the most surprised person in the world. I thought somebody was playing a joke on me. I've got three children and I don't want to be implicated in anything like that."

"BUNCH OF DAMNED 'REDS'"

Oscar Wiley, 4018 Evans Chapel Road: "I never signed any sort of a petition and I haven't any idea of how they got my name. I am a painter by trade, but not even a member of a union, so they couldn't have gotten my name from an organization. I've been a Democrat all of my life. They're just a bunch of damned 'reds.'"

Charles C. Hall (Negro), 730 Dolphin Street, chairman of the executive board of the City-Wide Republican Club: "I never signed a Communist petition. The first I knew of it was when the Communist Party wrote me a letter thanking me for signing their petition. I represent Americanism. I think a neighbor, who is a Communist, must have put my name on the petition. I was a delegate to the State Republican Convention on May 18. The Communist representatives came to see me after I wrote a denunciation in reply to their letter thanking me and I denounced them personally. For 35 years I have been active in the Seventeenth Ward Republican Club."

Matthew H. Carter (Negro), 556 Dolphin Street: "I didn't sign anything."

SIGNED FOR PLAYGROUND

Annie Dennis, Negro, 540 Johannsen Street: "A man came here one day and he wanted to know if I would sign to make safe playgrounds for the children. He said the Governor wanted to get names of people who want safe playgrounds. I was dumbfounded when I got a letter from Washington. I don't know anything about the Communist Party. I've always been a Republican."

Joseph Trubman, 2120 North Pulaski Street: "I'm well known where I live and there are a great many Communists around there. They must have used my name. I never signed any petition and I am not in any way sympathetic with their cause."

FOR PRESIDENT

Wilma Graham, Negro, 603 North Bethel Street: "Last fall a woman stopped at my house. She asked me to sign a petition for the election of somebody for President, I don't remember who. She said everyone was signing. I told her she could put me down. I did not sign the paper."

John Washington, Negro, 17 North Washington Street: "One morning last March, I was coming from an employment office when a man stopped me and said he was starting a labor party. A lot of people around there were signing and I signed, too."

Charles Williams, Negro, 1134 East Lombard Street: "I know just what you're after. I ain't no Communist and I ain't signed nothing, but I know who did. It was that man from the Daily Worker. He said he had a petition and that he was going to put my name down. I told him not to, but he laughed and went out."

SHE IS SURPRISED

Alice Kane, Negro, 1729 East Preston Street: "I was really surprised when we got the letters from the Dies committee. Neither I nor my mother (Addie Skurry) signed any papers. I don't know how the committee got our names."

Ella V. Ellis, Negro, 1017 North Washington Street: "I received a letter from the Dies committee about me signing a petition about communism. I have never heard anything about any petition and so I didn't sign anything. Naturally I wouldn't sign a Communist petition because my husband works on W. P. A."

Osie Hersey, Negro, 1643 Barnes Street: "The only thing I remember signing was for the antilynch bill. A man came around to the house with a paper. The letters from the Dies committee must have referred to that."

REGISTERED DEMOCRAT

Annabelle Lee, Negro, 1008 North Gay Street: "No one has ever asked me to sign anything. I am registered as a Democrat and, of course, would not sign anything like a Communist paper."

Grace Chappell, Negro, 1427 East Biddle Street: "I haven't any connection with the Communist Party and I don't want any. Of course I haven't signed anything. I can't imagine how the Dies Committee got my name unless somebody maliciously gave it to them."

Mary Kelly, Negro, 864 Vine Street: "I don't remember signing anything. I don't know anything about the Communist Party. When I vote, I vote Republican."

Irving Gaby, 2210 Presstman Street: "The only connection I ever had with the Communist Party was when I tried to sell them a typewriter in February. I don't know anything about any petition."

Legal Basis For Conscription

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EWING THOMASON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1940

ARTICLE BY MAJ. CLAUDE B. MICKELWAIT

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from a recent issue of the American Bar Association Journal:

[From the American Bar Association Journal for September 1940]

LEGAL BASIS FOR CONSCRIPTION

(By Claude B. Mickelwait, major, United States Army, Office of the Judge Advocate General, Washington, D. C.)

The story of the Selective Draft Act of 1917 as recorded by the decisions of the courts now draws to a close. (See United States ex rel. Bergdoll v. Drum, 107 F. (2d) 897, December 1939.) However, the interest of the public in the general subject of compulsory military service has been aroused by the recent introduction in Congress of the so-called Burke-Wadsworth bill for selective service. Although the political aspects of this subject are the principal items of current debate, nevertheless, an examination of its legal aspects is regarded as timely. Whether we speak of conscription, draft, or selective service, we have in mind, in this discussion, the compulsion of service in the land and naval forces, as contrasted with voluntary enlistment therein, and it is in regard to the compulsory feature of past laws and of the current proposals that the debates, legal as well as political, are chiefly concerned. In like manner, this discussion of the legal basis for conscription will deal largely with the compulsory feature of that subject.

The conscription of manpower for military service is not to be regarded as a modern invention of sovereigns, be they kings, dictators, or the rulers of democracies. Many examples of the antiquity of this device could be given, but it is sufficient to note the following views of publicists as an indication of its past recognition in the field of customary and appropriate methods for raising military forces:

"Every citizen is bound to serve and defend the state as far as he is able. Society cannot be otherwise preserved; and this union for common defense is one of the first objects of all political association. Whoever is able to bear arms must take them up as soon as he is commanded to do so by the one who has the power to make war." (Vattel, Book 3, ch. 2, sec. 8.)

"Since every citizen or subject is obliged to serve the state, the sovereign has the right, when the necessity arises, to conscript whom he pleases." (Vattel, Book 3, ch. 2, sec. 9.)

"In a word, we must give him [the sovereign] the power of levying troops, enlisting soldiers, and obliging them to perform the most dangerous duties even at the peril of their lives." (Burlamaqui, The Principles of Politic Law, ed. 1791, pt. IV, ch. 1, sec. XII.)

Considering briefly the history of compulsory military service in the United States, it may be pointed out that, prior to the adoption of our Federal Constitution, the drafting of men for military service was sanctioned and practiced both in the Colonies and, after the Declaration of Independence, in many of the States. The constitutions of nine States during the Revolutionary War period recognized the principle of universal military service.[1] An equal number of States enacted draft laws to recruit the Continental Army. However, it is well known that, under the Articles of Confederation, the National Government was limited to making requisitions upon the States for military personnel. These requisitions were fortified upon several occasions by resolutions recommending drafts by the States from the militia.[2] However, the impotence of the National Government in its dependence upon the whims of the States was recognized by the Commander in Chief, and on August 20, 1780, in a letter to the President of Congress, General Washington stated that a peremptory draft was the only method of providing soldiers.[3] Hamilton also recommended that for common defense the Nation should have power to raise armies without limitation since experience had shown that the Articles of Confederation were defective in this regard.[4] Proposals restricting the national power to require military service of citizens were offered by several States[5] in the Constitutional Convention, but were uniformly rejected. The rejection of these limitations indicates that the makers of the Constitution intended to include in that instrument the power to draft. It may, therefore, be concluded that the principle of compulsion was recognized in this country prior to the adoption of the Constitution and, further, that the lack of power in the National Government under the Articles of Confederation to raise armies and provide for defense was a defect intended to be remedied by the Constitution itself.

The legal questions involved in present-day conscription by the National Government arise, therefore, from a consideration of the constitutional powers of the Federal Government rather than from a general denial that the power of conscription for military service is inherent in the sovereign. Implicit in the question of the constitutionality of Federal statutes providing for conscription are those clauses of the Constitution which give Congress the power "to declare war," "to raise and support armies," "to provide and maintain a navy," and "to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces." And to this enumeration must be added the general authority of Congress "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers."[7] Furthermore, one of the stated purposes of the Constitution is to "provide for the common defense" (preamble).

The first Federal statute involving the application of the principle of conscription was enacted during the Civil War.[8] It may be noted, however, that during the War of 1812 Mr. Monroe, the Secretary of War, recommended to Congress the enactment of a law providing for compulsory military service under the Federal Government.[9] A bill was introduced for that purpose, but the advent of peace eliminated the apparent necessity for such a measure, and it was never enacted.[10] Following the Civil War no statute involving Federal conscription is to be found until the enactment of the so-called Selective Draft Act of 1917.[11] This statute, with amendments, like the Civil War Draft Act, was a wartime act, effective during the then existing emergency. Thus it appears that during two wars in which this country has been engaged Federal troops have been raised by conscription, and, as may be expected, the constitutionality of these laws has been considered by the courts.

Concerning the constitutional validity of these wartime conscription laws it may be said at the outset that, so far as the writer is aware, no decision of a Federal or State court has held that such laws are beyond the power of the Congress. The specific clauses of the Constitution set forth above are generally regarded as basis for this power although the general obligation to serve expressed by writers and other authorities has supported the favorable construction of these clauses. For example, in the Selective Draft Law Cases supra, the Court said, at page 378:

"It may not be doubted that the very conception of a just government and its duty to the citizen includes the reciprocal obligation of the citizen to render military service in case of need and the right to compel it."

Similar views were expressed in United States v. Schwimmer (279 U. S. 644, 650).

Proceeding from this general duty of the citizen toward the sovereign the validity of conscription when authorized by the Congress as a necessary and proper measure in the exercise of its enumerated powers has been sustained in numerous cases. An early elucidation of this principle is to be found in Kneedler v. Lane (45 Pa. St. 238), where Justice Agnew expresses the court's views in the following passage at page 322:

"The constitutional authority to use the national forces creates a corresponding duty to provide a number adequate to the necessity. The duty is vital and essential, falling back on the fundamental right of self-preservation, and the powers expressed to declare war, raise armies, maintain navies, and provide for the defense. Power and duty now go hand in hand with the extremity until every available man in the Nation is called into service, if the emergency require it; and of this there can be no judge but Congress."

See also McCall's Case (Federal Cases No. 8669, p. 1225 (1863)), to the same effect.

In passing it may also be noted that the draft laws of the Confederate States, enrolling the citizens directly into the service of the National Government, were likewise held to be valid, the courts relying upon constitutional provisions similar to those of the Federal Constitution. The specific grant of power to the Congress of the Confederate States "to raise and support armies" authorized the conscription of national forces as distinguished from the militia of the several States, without limitation as to the mode or manner of exercising the power.[12]

In like manner the general validity of the Selective Draft Act of 1917 as a constitutional method of raising armies was upheld by the courts. Any doubts on this score were effectively dispelled by the Supreme Court in the Selective Draft Law cases, supra, and later cases affirming the views expressed in that case.[13] Later it was said in United States v. Macintosh (283 U. S. 605, 622–623), a naturalization case, that the power to raise armies "necessarily connotes the like power to say who shall serve in them and in what way," and that "whether any citizen shall be exempt from serving in the armed forces of the Nation in time of war is dependent upon the will of Congress and not upon the scruples of the individual, except as Congress provides." We may, therefore, conclude that it is the settled law of this Nation that compulsory military service is a constitutional method for raising armies in time of war.

Current consideration of a conscription law, involving, as it does, the question of enforcing military service in time of peace, suggests the question whether the powers of the Congress in this regard are lessened by the fact that the country is not at war. So far our national experience has brought forth two conscription laws, each enacted in time of war and each limited to the duration of the emergency. It does not seem open to serious doubt, however, that peacetime conscription is equally valid. The underlying necessity of national self-preservation exists in time of peace as well as after war has been declared. In fact, the current trend as evidenced by recent events in Europe and Asia indicates a tendency to engage in war without the customary notice of a declaration. In such a case we ought not to lose our ability for self-protection by any rigid or mathematical determination that conscription is based principally or solely upon the constitutional power of Congress to declare war. Certainly there are other enumerated powers, equally efficacious, even if we fail to perceive the necessary connection between preparation for war in time of peace and the power to declare war. In the course of his opinion in the case of the peacetime enlistment of a minor, Justice Field said:

"Now, among the powers assigned to the National Government, is the power 'to raise and support armies,' and the power 'to provide for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.' The execution of these powers falls within the line of its duties; and its control over the subject is plenary and exclusive. It can determine, without question from any State authority, how the armies shall be raised, whether by voluntary enlistment or forced draft, the age at which the soldier shall be received, and the period for which he shall be taken, the compensation he shall be allowed, and the service to which she shall be assigned." (Tarbles Case, 13 Wall. 397, 408.)

Justice Harlan spoke in similar language in Jacobsen v. Massachusetts (197 U. S. 11, 29):

"* * * and yet he [a person] may be compelled, by force if need be, against his will and without regard to his personal wishes or his pecuniary interests, or even his religious or political connections, to take his place in the ranks of the army of his country, and risk the chance of being shot down in its defense."

Other cases of like tenor involving peacetime service may be mentioned:

In re Grimley Petitioner (137 U. S. 147, 153).

United States v. Williams (302 U. S. 46, 48).

In the last cited case the court said, at page 48, "In virtue of its power to raise and support armies, to provide and maintain a navy and to make rules for the government of the land and naval forces, the Congress may require military service of adults and minors alike."

The foregoing views, when considered in conjunction with the decided cases upholding the validity of the wartime conscription acts, justify, it is believed, the prediction that a law providing for peacetime compulsory military service will, if the occasion arises, be regarded by the courts as within the power of Congress.

Before leaving the general subject of constitutionality of Federal conscription laws, certain features of the principal argument against the validity of such laws are of interest. This argument proceeds from the militia provisions of the Federal Constitution which give the Congress power "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections and repel invasions," and "to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the militia and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress."[14] It was thought by some that the grants of power to the Congress in respect of declaring war, raising armies, etc., were modified by the foregoing provisions thus requiring the exercise of the war powers by way of calling forth the militia. Undoubtedly, this view grew out of the restrictions upon national power in this regard in the Articles of Confederation, and the subsequent laws of Congress providing for the training and organization of the militia, of which the act of May 9, 1794,[15] is an early example. That this question had not been settled when the Civil War Draft Act was passed is illustrated by the views of the various justices in Kneedler against Lane, supra, which were largely directed toward resolving the troublesome question of whether the Federal Government was supreme in the field of providing Federal forces or must exercise this power through the States by a call for the militia. Likewise, in the draft cases arising in the Confederate States the principal argument against the national power was based upon the supposed limitation derived from similar constitutional provisions relating to the militia. However, the courts of both the Northern and Southern States were unanimous in refusing to recognize the militia clauses as a limitation upon the power of the Nation to raise armies by conscription or draft. Finally, in the selective draft law cases, supra, the Supreme Court of the United States held that, despite the militia clauses of the Constitution, the Congress has complete and dominant power to raise armies, saying, inter alia, at page 381:

"When the Constitution came to be formed it may not be disputed that one of the recognized necessities for its adoption was the want of power in Congress to raise an army and the dependence upon the States for their quotas. In supplying the power it was manifestly intended to give it all and leave none to the States, since besides the delegation to Congress of authority to raise armies the Constitution prohibited the States, without the consent of Congress, from keeping troops in time of peace or engaging in war" (art. I, sec. 10).

Further consideration was given this question in Cox v. Wood (247 U. S. 3), where the contention was made by Cox, a soldier drafted during the first World War, that in view of the restrictions upon the employment of the militia, i. e., "to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions," the petitioner was not liable to serve in a foreign country. Again the court said that the plenary power of Congress to declare war and to raise armies was not subject to the limitations of the militia clauses and "knew no limit deduced from a separate, and for the purpose of the war power, wholly incidental, if not irrelevant and subordinate, provision concerning the militia, found in the Constitution." Thus did the highest court of our land settle, in no unmistakable terms, the time-honored argument concerning the supremacy of the independent and plenary Federal power to raise armies and use them according to necessity.

[14] Art. I, sec. 8.

[15] 1 Stat. 367.

In numerous cases suitors made specific constitutional objections to the Selective Draft Act of 1917 and the courts uniformly dismissed these contentions as untenable. For example, the act authorized the President to prescribe regulations which, from necessity, were numerous and detailed. Accordingly, the objection was made that the act was void for unwarranted delegation of legislative authority. This contention was rejected by the courts.[16] Similarly, it was held that the act did not deprive the conscript of his liberty without due process of law, there being no universal right to the judicial process,[17] nor of his property since a person has in a proper sense no property right in his office or employment.[18] Nor was the requirement of compulsory service in contributing to the defense of the Nation regarded as the imposition of involuntary servitude.[19]

Any law affecting the lives and fortunes of large numbers of our residents is bound to raise interesting and vital questions concerning specific classes of persons. In our discussion thus far we have proceeded upon the assumption that the laws relating to conscription subject citizens to liability for military service. The essence of the obligation is undoubtedly the tie of allegiance binding the citizen to the sovereign.[20] Out of this allegiance arises the duty to his country when called.[21] If the duty is based upon allegiance, it ought to adhere to the citizen wherever he may be. Apparently the Congress in 1863 as well as in 1917 was of this view since the liability of citizens to serve was not specifically qualified by any reference to place of residence.[22] Although the writer is not aware of any decided case which may be regarded as a complete answer to this question, it is of interest to note the case of United States ex rel. Feld v. Bullard (1923) (290 F. 704, cert. den. 262 U. S. 760), wherein the petitioner, a citizen of the United States, after registration under the 1917 act, sailed to Brazil in July of that year and remained there until July 1919. During his absence he was drafted by virtue of a notice mailed to him at his address in this country, which he failed to answer although a partial reply to the questionnaire of the local board was submitted by his father. Upon his failure to report as required in the notice he was recorded as a deserter. After his return to the United States he was arraigned for trial by court martial for desertion, and his petition for release from the Army authorities was denied in the case just cited. Certainly the decision is authority for the view that the liability to serve of a citizen who has registered is not terminated by his absence from this country when called. In this connection the following quotation is of interest:

"Every sovereign has a right to call home those of his subjects who are in an enemy's country, or in any other country, when he thinks their presence necessary to the defense of the state" (Von Martens, book VIII, ch. II, sec. 6).

Note also the strength of the tie of allegiance announced by our Supreme Court in Cock v. Tait (265 U. S. 47) (power to tax a citizen resident in a foreign country) and in Blackmer v. United States (284 U. S. 421), wherein it was said, at page 437:

"Nor can it be doubted that the United States possesses the power inherent in sovereignty to require the return to this country of a citizen, resident elsewhere, whenever the public interest requires it, and to penalize him in case of refusal."

Consider also the case of an alien in respect of liability to serve. Reference is made to the pertinent provision in this regard contained in the Civil War Draft Act, "persons of foreign birth who shall have declared on oath their intention to become citizens," and the similar provision in the Selective Draft Act of 1917, "male persons residing in the United States, not alien enemies, who have declared their intention to become citizens." That a declaration of intention does not change the status of an alien to that of a citizen seems clear.[23] Nevertheless, an alien, whether or not he has declared his intention to become a citizen, may be subjected to compulsory military service by the country of his residence.[24] However, the force of municipal law, which is the basis of this power, is naturally confined to the jurisdiction of the enacting sovereign unless another tie than mere physical presence gives it strength.

What is the rule under international law as to subjecting aliens to military service? It is generally said that military service is a duty incumbent upon citizens alone,[25] and that an alien may not be compelled to render military service without violation of international law.[26] This view was also expressed by Mr. Bayard, Secretary of State, on February 3, 1888, in a communication to Mr. Bell, Minister to the Netherlands, with the qualification that in times of social disturbance or of invasion the services of aliens in police or home guards may be exacted.[27] It should be noted, however, that certain writers in the field of international law have recently expressed doubt that the liability for military service is limited to citizens[28] upon the basis of certain obligations of resident aliens with particular reference to declarant aliens.[29] Be that as it may, the diplomatic correspondence of the United States reveals a general attitude of conceding a right of exemption to aliens, particularly upon appropriate representations by foreign countries or upon renunciation of declarations of intention.[30]

Despite the apparent recognition by our Government of the qualified right of aliens to exemption from military service the fact remains that aliens were drafted during the first World War and further, as noted above, that courts were disposed to uphold the legality of this compulsion. The basis for these decisions was that the Selective Draft Act of 1917 made persons of the prescribed ages subject to draft unless exempted or excused by the designated authority. Accordingly, it was necessary to claim and receive exemption from the local board and if a fair hearing had been granted by the board the decision of that body was regarded as final.[31] Although the statute limited the liability to serve to declarant aliens, nevertheless nondeclarant aliens were held to service.[32] In the case last cited it was said that limiting liability for military service to citizens and declarant aliens did not exclude from the draft any who were not so obligated but were, nevertheless, required to register.

At this point it is interesting to observe the attitude of the courts as to treaties exempting aliens from military service. For example, in Ex parte Larrucea (249 F. 981) four citizens of Spain who had filed their declarations of intention to become citizens of the United States sought release from detention for evading the Conscription Act, claiming that the treaty between Spain and the United States proclaimed April 20, 1903,[33] exempted them from compulsory military service in the United States. Certainly the words of the treaty were apt to confer exemption. Nevertheless, the court held that these aliens were not entitled to release on the basis of nonliability and grounded this decision upon the recognized judicial rule that a treaty occupies no position of superiority over an act of Congress but is, under the Constitution, on a parity with other expressions of legislative will and in the event of inconsistency the latest in time will control.[34] Accordingly, the claimants were remitted to the political head of the Government for appropriate relief under the treaty. For similar conclusions under the Selective Draft Act of 1917, as to nondeclarant aliens, see Summertime v. Local Board, Division No. 10 (248 F. 832); Ex parte Blazekovic (248 F. 327).

In the administration of any law for compulsory military service perplexing problems are bound to arise. The Selective Service Regulations of 1917 provided for the mailing of a notice to the selected registrant requiring him to report to the local board or, in special cases, to report to the Adjutant General of the State. The notice specified the day and hour the registrant would be in the military service. Suppose the registrant failed to report as required. Actually he had never served in the military forces. However, the effect of law and regulations transformed the recalcitrant registrant into a deserter under military law. Section 2 of the Selective Draft Act of 1917 provided, in part:

"All persons drafted into the service of the United States * * * shall, from the date of said draft or acceptance be subject to the laws and regulations governing the Regular Army."

Of course, the laws governing the Regular Army included the Articles of War which then provided in article 2 thereof[35] that the following persons, among others, shall be subject to military law:

"* * * all other persons lawfully called, drafted, or ordered into, or to duty or for training in, the said service (military service of the United States), from the dates they are required by the terms of the call, draft, or order to obey the same."

Hence, the registrant was subject to punishment as a deserter if he refused to obey the summons.[36] Furthermore, the use of the postal service in giving notice by mail was deemed sufficient in law, actual personal notice not being required.[37]

Finally, it is of interest to note that the latest case involving the validity of the Selective Draft Act of 1917 and the regulations issued pursuant thereto reaffirms the previous decisions of the courts that the act in question was a valid and constitutional method for filling the ranks of the military forces of the country.[38] With the denial of certiorari in this case by the United States Supreme Court on June 3, 1940 (No. 974), we see at once the conclusion of a case of long standing interest and an indication of the current views of the highest court of our land on the legal basis for conscription.

Bonneville-Coulee Transmission Line Appropriation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER M. PIERCE
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 10, 1940

STATEMENT BY HON. WALTER M. PIERCE, OF OREGON, BEFORE HOUSE DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS SUBCOMMITTEE

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement which I made yesterday before the House Deficiency Appropriations Subcommittee:

Mr. Chairman and members of the House Deficiencies Appropriation Committee, I appear in behalf of the pending Bonneville-Coulee Transmission Line appropriation in order to give some basic information on the Budget submission before you.

You, no doubt, remember that both Bonneville and Grand Coulee were initiated under P. W. A. grants. A short time thereafter the United States Supreme Court handed down a decision in the Parker Dam case, which in effect stated that constitutional dams had to be covered by congressional authorization. As a result of this decision Congress authorized both dams, and in the act authorizing Grand Coulee (49 Stat. 1028, act of August 30, 1935) it was stated that the operation of the Grand Coulee project was entrusted to the President acting through such agents as he might designate. By letter of January 29, 1936, the President designated the Secretary of the Interior, acting through the Bureau of Reclamation, as his agent for this purpose.

Within the past few days you may have noticed that the press release given out by the White House covered an amendment to the original agency designation. This recent amendment embodied in an Executive order coordinates the power facilities at Grand Coulee and Bonneville by designating the Bonneville Power Administration as the agency for marketing the power generated at Grand Coulee.

Further authority is given under section 2 (b) of the Bonneville Act of August 20, 1937, which I quote, as it contains broad provisions of congressional policy:

"(b) In order to encourage the widest possible use of all electric energy that can be generated and marketed and to provide reasonable outlets therefor, and to prevent the monopolization thereof by limited groups, the Administrator is authorized and directed to provide, construct, maintain, and improve such electric transmission lines and substations, and facilities, and structures appurtenant thereto, as he finds necessary, desirable, or appropriate for the purpose of transmitting electric energy, available for sale, from the Bonneville project, to interconnect the Bonneville project with other Federal projects and publicly owned power systems now or hereafter constructed."

It will be noted in this section of the Bonneville Organic Act that Congress directs the Administrator to interconnect the Bonneville project with other Federal projects and publicly owned power systems now or hereafter constructed in order to encourage the widest possible use, to provide reasonable outlets and to prevent monopolization by limited groups.

THE COLUMBIA RIVER

Your committee has been considering appropriations in connection with other rivers and I think it advisable for purposes of record to point out the reason why the Columbia River is in a class by itself as a power producer. Forty-five percent of all the charted, potential prime hydro power in the United States is found within the area marked by the Columbia Basin.

The average river, which has been discussed before you has certain characteristics which may be briefly stated in terms of seasonal flow and fall.

These rivers have high peak spring flood flows and low summer flows during the crop-growing season, tending to make what the hydrologists call "flashy streams." The ratio of water volumes occurring during the peak and low periods and the average practical fall determines the economic power possibilities of any stream.

Nature is compensating in the distribution of its benefits. Sections of our country rich in fuels generally have extremely flashy streams with flat gradients. Those sections devoid of natural fuels have been given streams with either low-cost storage reservoir sites, steady high flows, or great falls. The Columbia is a natural power producer with high volumes, great falls, and low-cost reservoir sites.

With these characteristics the Columbia can produce the lowest over-all cost power in America. This Columbia power, due to its location; does not come in competition with fuel-burning generators, or affect fuel-producing employment. The Columbia power fits into our Nation's picture as a conservation measure. In House Document 103, first session of the Seventy-third Congress, the Army engineers reported that the Columbia River and its tributaries were capable of being developed into the greatest low-cost power system in America.

RIVER FLOWS

Aside from the Mississippi at its mouth, the long-time record shows that the Columbia drops more water into the sea than any other river on the North American Continent. Its mean long-time annual flow exceeds the Mississippi at St. Louis, the Ohio at Paducah, the Missouri at its mouth, and the St. Lawrence at Ogdensburg. This mean annual flow is much more than the Colorado, the Tennessee, or the Yukon. It has a greater fall than any of our sizable streams—about 1,400 feet from Coulee Lake to Bonneville. The mean annual flow at Coulee is five times as great as the Colorado at Boulder Dam.

In addition to these large volumes and the high heads, the Columbia is a remarkably steady-flow stream. This results from the heavy snowfalls on the Rockies, the Selkirks, the Bitter Root, Blue, and Cascade Ranges.

In steadiness it is only exceeded by the St. Lawrence, which owes its small range of flows to the balancing effect of the large reservoirs of the Great Lakes. The heavy moist clouds from the Japan current and the Pacific drop their burdens on these mountain ranges, which cover a wide range of climatic changes extending from British Columbia to Utah, Nevada, and Wyoming. The high flows of the Columbia resulting from melting snows occur during the summer months or growing season when most of our other rivers are at their lowest stages. Widely distributed snow storage is similar to the balancing effect of the Great Lakes.

THE COLUMBIA RIVER DRAINAGE BASIN

This drainage basin covers an area of 259,000 square miles, or about 4 times the size of all the New England States, and includes parts of British Columbia, nearly all of Oregon and Washington, and substantial parts of Montana, Wyoming, Utah, and Nevada. It rises in the Columbia Lake in southeastern British Columbia at elevation 2,650. The upper Columbia above Coulee has a drainage area of 74,100 square miles, of which 39,000 square miles is in Canada. The Clark Fork originates on the west side of the Rockies near Butte, Mont. Its largest tributary, the Snake, rises also near the same source, which is close to the headwaters of the Missouri. The high and deep mountain snows, glaciers, and lakes, under a wide seasonal temperature range, have a remarkable regulatory effect, causing high flows in the months of June and July, which condition is particularly advantageous, both to irrigation and power.

The Grand Coulee Lake will have a storage capacity of around 10,500,000 acre-feet, or one-eighth of the mean annual river flow at the dam site. This is 4¼ times the volume behind Norris Dam. Out of the 80,000,000 acre-feet flowing annually at Coulee, the estimated maximum irrigation diversion, with 5 feet depth on each acre irrigated, will only amount to 6,000,000 acre-feet, leaving the balance for river regulation and power. Coulee Reservoir will double the low flow below the dam site. All of these facts will show why the Columbia is in a class by itself, and cannot be directly compared with other average streams.

SUPPLEMENTAL USE OF BONNEVILLE AND COULEE

Bonneville is a run-of-the-river hydro, without storage. The water flowing at the site, with the exception of pondage, either goes through the turbine or flows unused to the sea. Bonneville plant has been sized by the Army Engineers to use the lowest regulated flow. Its maximum construction has been substantially set by minimum flows. I covered this phase over 3 years ago before the Rivers and Harbors Committee at the time the Bonneville Act was under consideration. Power reduction at Bonneville results from head decreases resulting from high tail water during floods. Approximately this head loss, during very short periods, represents about one-third of its installed capacity. During these short periods Coulee is at maximum production and when tied into Bonneville will "firm up" its capacity. Bonneville's maximum production occurs when the natural flows at Coulee are at the lowest point.

At Bonneville alone this "firming up" represents about 155,000 kilowatts, with 10 units installed. The difference in sale price between primary and secondary power is $5 to $8 per kilowatt-year. At Bonneville alone this "firming up" represents about $850,000 per year increased revenue. If the increase at Coulee is added plus peak sales possible due to water storage and keeping irrigation pumping off the daily peak, the revenues will be increased over $1,000,000 per year. It is good business to tie these plants together to secure maximum utilization and power revenues. One plant supplements the other. Columbia power, unlike T. V. A. power, does not require steam auxiliaries.

AVAILABLE PLANT CAPACITY

Six units have been authorized at Bonneville. Two totaling 86,400 kilowatts are in service and are loaded, without the Aluminum Co. load which starts up next month. To satisfy the Aluminum Co. the dump-power loads will have to be temporarily dropped. Two more units totaling 108,000 kilowatts will be operating in December of this year and units 5 and 6 will be brought in during the latter part of 1941. At that time Bonneville capacity will be 302,400 kilowatts. Coulee unit No. 1 of 108,000 kilowatts is scheduled for operation in the early summer of 1941. No. 2, of the same size, will be in operation in September 1941, and No. 3 in the latter part of 1941. Aside from the existing 100,000-kilowatt transmission tie between Bonneville and Coulee no outlets have been provided for this large amount of Coulee power available next year.

DEFENSE POWER SHORTAGE

It will be remembered that Congress failed to enact the Bonneville organic legislation early enough, and two generation units were completed without outlets, which resulted in 2 years' delay in marketing Bonneville power. I interpret the request before you as a move to prevent the repetition of such a condition.

On March 3, 1939, I anticipated the present load conditions and possible defense requirements and addressed the House at length and in detail on this subject. A late check of data from the Power Commission and other reliable sources confirms my early prediction.

Let me stress this point, which I have made a matter of record. One of the serious bottlenecks of our defense program will be a power shortage in large sections of the country. Modern warfare is founded on an adequate supply of electrolytic metals, which require large quantities of electricity. The Northwest has the largest pool of available low-cost power in America. It has the strategic and necessary ores. In these critical times Congress cannot afford to take the responsibility of making such power ineffective.

POWER COSTS

There has been considerable confusion injected into the controversial power question as to the relative costs of steam and hydro power. I have spoken at length on this subject and I might summarize a few factual conclusions.

Niagara, as we all know, is also a natural power producer. On June 15, 1939, I pointed out the actual industrial billings of the Niagara Power Co., which averages 3.1 mills per kilowatt-hour. Boulder power is contracted on a falling-water basis for 1.63 mills per kilowatt-hour, and when the plant amortization, maintenance, and operating charges are added the bus bar cost is about 2.1 mills per kilowatt-hour. Delivered at the concentrated load center, 270 miles from Boulder, the current costs about 3.7 mills per kilowatt-hour.

The lowest over-all-cost steam plant in America, as far as I know, is the Long Beach plant of the Southern California Edison Co., which is located on top of gas and oil wells, and is free from coal handling, first and operating costs. Scattergood has testified that the over-all costs of this plant, from which his system buys power, is over 4 mills per kilowatt-hour. The private and public systems are buying Boulder power. The contracts speak for themselves and show that delivered Boulder current is below the lowest cost steam power. The Pennsylvania Railroad, the largest coal hauler in America, operates its electric trains with 3 mills Susquehanna hydro power. If steam power could be produced lower with its natural transportation facilities, the Pennsylvania would not be using Susquehanna power.

The over-all steam costs here in Washington in the new Buzzards Point steam plant is close to 5 mills per kilowatt-hour, derived from data furnished by the District Commission. Most large metropolitan steam plants produce current from 5 to 7 mills per kilowatt-hour. For example, the official over-all steam costs of the Hell Gate Station, New York, is about 7.7 mills per kilowatt-hour. Bonneville delivered current sells for 2 mills, and bus-bar current for 1.65 mills. Coulee costs will be a trifle less.

Let us translate these costs into metal prices. It takes about 22,000 to 24,000 kilowatt-hours per ton of aluminum, or 11 to 12 kilowatt-hours per pound. One mill difference in current price makes a difference of 1.2 cents per pound of metal. Steam power costs will add 3 to 4 cents per pound to the cost of such metal. Unless we want to penalize the taxpayers for this metal-price difference we cannot afford to use steam power for such electrolytic metal production. Let me emphasize this point. When we authorize costs above 3 mills per kilowatt-hour we are penalizing the taxpayer. This is the breaking point. Is it not obvious that both economics and necessity demand early utilization of this largest pool of low-cost power we have? No private company in the country can deliver such quantities of power at double the cost of the Columbia power. Bonneville is selling delivered power to the Portland General Electric Co. for a price lower than bare fuel costs at their steam plants.

JUSTIFICATION

I need not go into the details and justification of the request. These have already been presented. There is enough flexibility in the items presented to make an initial start on defense connections. I will venture a prediction and that is new defense industries will go east of the Cascades.

POWER SHORTAGE

There is a definite power shortage in the Northwest. Aside from the Diablo plant of Seattle there has been no new plant construction since the depression while usage has increased approximately 50 percent. Price determines usage. Lower the price, greater the use. If current price levels were reduced to the Tacoma base increased normal consumption would soak up this authorized capacity, regardless of any defense industries. For example, Spokane is larger than Tacoma, and both cities use nearly the same kilowatt-hours per year. From official reports for the same use Spokane citizens pay about $900,000 more per year to the Washington Water Power Co. than the people of Tacoma pay to their city plant for equal amounts of current. Tacoma has operated for years under the lowest rates in America and under these rates has paid for or paid off over 80 percent of its actual plant cost. If rates were lowered to Tacoma levels consumption would increase 25 percent. Under such an increase eastern Washington and Oregon could early use up the output of one Coulee generator.

By 1945 the Spokane area alone will be short nearly 100,000 kilowatts in capacity, the Puget Sound area 130,000 kilowatts, the Portland area 270,000 kilowatts, and the western Montana area 175,000 kilowatts.

REPAYMENT

The Bonneville Act requires repayment on all power facility investment, with interest, and, to insure this, rates are required to be revised every 5 years. The interest rate has been set at 3½ percent and the amortization period 40 years. Any defense transmission expenditures will be repaid fully with interest. This request is strictly a business proposition and involves no donation or subsidy.

Support of President Roosevelt by Albert H. Ladner

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, September 10 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY THOMAS P. O'NEIL

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a newspaper article under the heading "Ladner Supports Roosevelt—Hits Willkie on draft."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LADNER SUPPORTS ROOSEVELT—HITS WILLKIE ON DRAFT—G. O. P. PRIMARY CANDIDATE URGES VOTERS TO REELECT F. D. R.

Albert H. Ladner, who polled 230,000 Republican votes in the Pennsylvania senatorial primary in the spring, last night announced his support for the reelection of President Roosevelt.

WILLKIE'S ACTION A FACTOR

Wendell Willkie's opposition to the conscription of industry for national defense was a major factor in Ladner's decision to bolt the G. O. P.

"Though an independent Republican of long standing," he said, "I announce my support of President Roosevelt for reelection. This action is taken only after giving serious consideration to the great crisis which now faces the United States.

"I am a parent, like many of the millions of Americans who must make a vital decision on November 5. I have two sons, both of whom hold commissions in the National Guard of Pennsylvania. I am willing, and I believe it to be just, that if my country needs my sons—and I expect them to be called—they should and will be ready to make whatever sacrifices are necessary. How, then, can I conscientiously give my support to a candidate for the Presidency of the United States who places more value upon the dollars contained in the money bags of Wall Street than he does in the value of the blood that flows through the veins of my children?

YOUTH VS. MONEY

"Those are but a few of the pertinent facts I have pondered over for many weeks. As an American interested in the future of our country and as a parent, I cannot and will not support the candidacy of Wendell L. Willkie.

"He cares not how many of the youth of America are sacrificed in the defense of the country as long as its vested wealth is left alone. His idea of prosperity would be a repetition of the World War days of profiteering.

"Moreover, it would be most tragic to change administrations at Washington during this historic and critical period. President Roosevelt has demonstrated his capacity for leadership. He is the one real figure in all the democratic countries who has stood up as a great leader. We can thank God for that leadership.

"Every clear-thinking, honest, and liberal-minded person, whose vote is not controlled or directed blindly by a political machine, should work unceasingly between now and November 5 to defeat the forces of reaction which have seized control of what was once a people's party—the Republican Party—and selfishly used it for the realization of their desires and profit as opposed to the interests of 130,000,000 decent American citizens.

URGES PEW-COOKE PROTEST

"The more than 230,000 men and women who supported my candidacy for the United States Senate in the recent Republican primary registered their protest against the Pew-Cooke leadership. I am certain that most of these 230,000 independent Republicans in Pennsylvania will join with me in a concerted movement in support of the candidacy of President Roosevelt and the repudiation of the present Republican machine leadership.

"We cannot intelligently, and should not be bound by narrow party lines at a time when the world is crumbling about us. Political creeds never have been nor ever should be set above the good of the Nation.

LEADER OF PEOPLE

"Franklin D. Roosevelt even though he be the leader of the Democratic Party, has shown by his actions that he is the President of all the people of the United States. He has not bound himself by the limits of party lines in his choice of those best equipped to properly prepare our country for the shocks which are spreading about us today. We, too, must approach this problem in just as broad and intelligent a manner.

"We must reelect Franklin D. Roosevelt as President and elect those who we are confident will support him in his endeavors to keep the terrors of war from approaching our shores."

Conscription and the Clergy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES A. SHANLEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 7, 1940

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, one of the noblest of historical writers has said that—

> It was the Stoics who emancipated mankind from its subjugation to despotic rule and whose enlightened and elevated views of life bridged the chasm that separates the ancient from the Christian state and led the way to freedom.

It was they also who taught that there is a will superior to the collective will of man.

In the reverse of this, the dignity of man and his pursuits, the humblest of men said on His last visit to the temple, 3 days before His death, "Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's and to God the things that are God's."

It has been said that this divine utterance gave to the civil power, under the protection of conscience, a sacredness it had never enjoyed, and bounds it had never acknowledged. It was the repudiation of absolutism and the inauguration of freedom.

Under that philosophy civilization has made its most important gains. Under it the most forceful member of the Ghibeline Party, Marsilius, of Padua, was later able to say in thoughts that sound like an American statesman:

> Laws derive their authority from the nation and are invalid without its assent. As the whole is greater than any of its parts, it is wrong that one should be bound by laws made by another, but in obeying laws to which all men have agreed, all men, in reality, govern themselves. The monarch, who is instituted by the legislature to execute its will, ought to be armed with a force sufficient to execute its will, to coerce individual, but not sufficient to control the majority of people. He is responsible to the nation and subject to the law; and the nation that appoints him, and assigns him his duties, has to see that he obeys the constitution, and has to dismiss him if he breaks it.

With all these advances it seems utterly incongruous and equally at variance with our history to see the method of handling the church in the Burke-Wadsworth bill. It seems to me that we are surrendering a heritage in attempting to place the church and its eligible individuals under military control.

I note with delight a press report that the other body has wiped out that thought and we will not revert to our traditional practice. These clergymen and their friends who championed this method of approach may rest assured that they have obtained a victory for a principle broader than life itself.

Christopher Dawson has said in the introduction to his Religion and the Modern State:

> Christianity is bound to protest against any social system which claims the whole of man and sets itself up as the final end of human action, for it asserts that man's essential nature transcends all political and economic forms. Civilization is a road by which man travels, not a house for him to dwell in. His true city is elsewhere. Yet for all that Christianity does not maintain, like some oriental religions, that life has no meaning—that man is caught in the endless round of time and change, like a mouse in a wheel. It asserts that there is a purpose in history and that this purpose is a social one. Against the cities and empires of man which are founded in violence and injustice and have no end but their own power and wealth, it stands for a spiritual society, a divine commonwealth, which is founded in faith and built up in charity, until it realizes all the spiritual possibilites that are latent in the life of humanity.

Poll Taxes and School Revenue

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEE E. GEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE NASHVILLE TENNESSEAN

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, oftentimes one will hear the poll tax as a prerequisite to voting defended on the grounds that it supplies revenue for the schools. It is an old American custom to tie an unpopular tax up with a worthy cause in order to make it more palatable to those who must swallow it. By this device all the teachers of the State who see their salaries and the chances of education for the young threatened, they think by talk of abolition of this source of revenue immediately rise in defense of another wise, vicious system. They are usually joined by parents and others, uninformed, who believe in a good public-school system.

The Tennessean, published at Nashville, Tenn., prints a timely editorial debunking the sort of propaganda we have described above. We must compliment this publication for its patriotic stand on this all-important question.

We might add that much such information is contained in the hearings on the Geyer anti-poll-tax bill that were held before a subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee. To date, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Congressman WALTER, chairman of the committee, has not had these hearings printed. As he ordered this to be done once and then recalled them from the Government Printing Office, we wonder what prompted the change of heart. It is hoped that these will soon be available to all.

All will be interested in reading the fine editorial that follows:

[From the Nashville Tennessean]

EDUCATION FOR WHAT?

The editor would like to reply to a letter to the Tennessean. The letter was printed in the forum Sunday over the signature Wanta Noe, which to us suggests a person seeking information. Wanta Noe is a young person, not old enough to vote and hence has made acquaintance with the poll tax only through hearsay. Wanta Noe does not believe the poll tax is such a much as a menace. Wanta Noe believes it goes to pay for the education of the young. Wanta Noe wonders why anyone should object to paying the poll tax that is used for the education of the young.

This young person deserves an answer.

Well, Wanta, for 60 years the politicians behind the poll tax have been kicking up this same smoke screen about the poll tax paying for the education of the young. The screen has become more and more transparent as the population of the State has grown. Don't let anyone kid you.

The poll tax provides in Tennessee something less than 3 percent of what it costs to run our schools. It would provide just about what the W. P. A. provides in hot lunches. As a revenue producer it is a shame and a sham, and it was never intended to be a revenue producer, no matter what the history books record or the benighted apologists say.

It was intended to disfranchise, and that it does to perfection, commonly turning two of every three of our adult people from the voting place. It is waiting to turn you away, Wanta, as soon as you bump into it.

They will tell you, dear correspondent, that everybody should pay some taxes to support the schools, and hence the poll tax. You can throw that one back in their teeth with the percentage just cited. For additional force to your fling you could point to the obvious fact that not one person in ten against whom the law lays the poll tax ever pays it anyway. (They surrender their franchise instead.)

We always are going to pay taxes to support public education, and, of course, we should and do not begrudge it. But, in the name of democracy, let's not defend on these grounds a tax which deprives the man of the right of citizenship for whose proper exercise our educational efforts are supposed to train the child.

In Davidson County poll-tax revenues add up to approximately 4 percent of the elementary school fund. They will tell you, Wanta, that the percentage is much higher in smaller counties—that loss of the poll-tax revenue would seriously embarrass the schools.

Robertson County, Wanta, has no metropolitan area; yet its population is not sparse. Of the school funds in Robertson County, 4.5 percent come from poll taxes. Note that Robertson annually levies about $14,000 in poll taxes but never collects more than $4,000. This means (1) that the majority of the people of Robertson County don't give a hang whether school keeps or not, or (2) that the majority of the people know danged well school is going to keep whether or not they or anyone at all pays the poll tax, and/or (3) that there is flagrant nonenforcement of the poll-tax law.

Of course, there is flagrant nonenforcement. You pay the poll tax if you own real property because you have to, and few others ever bother.

Incidentally, Wanta, in Smith County, where the population is sparse, the poll tax supplies approximately 1.5 percent of the school fund.

Dear friend, the Tennessean has declared war to the end on the poll tax for the simple and sustainable reason that we believe in democracy and want to see popular rule restored in our State. We believe the ballot is too precious to be hawked at a price—even at the insulting bargain price of $2 a head. Generations of men fought and died to wring from tyrannical masters the right to cast the ballot freely, as they pleased, and without let or hindrance of color, race, creed, or property qualification. We are for the free ballot because we believe the decision of the majority will be in the long run sanest, wisest, and best for our cities, counties, States, and Nation. Hence we denounce the poll tax which delivers us to the rule of only a majority of a minority.

Above all, it is difficult for us to understand how any true believer in democratic rule can countenance the poll tax because it extracts a pale fraction of the funds that support our schools. Even if it supported the schools entirely it should not be tolerated. The poll tax was tied to the schools by clever politicians who knew that some day people like you would rise to defend it for that very reason. It was and is a base trick.

The schools don't need the poll tax, and its existence defeats the very purpose of education in a democracy.

Kill the poll tax.

HON. JOHN G. ALEXANDER

OF MINNESOTA

LETTER AND PETITION FROM MRS. V. GORDON

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, last evening when I reached my office after the close of yesterday's session, I found the enclosed letter from Mrs. V. Gordon and the following resolution which supports and further carries out the statements made in my radio address entitled "Conscription," and which is carried in today's proceedings in the House.

The letter and petition follow:

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., September 5, 1940.

JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
Representative, Minnesota.

DEAR MR. ALEXANDER: Enclosed please find copy of a resolution drawn up by the presidents of five units of the Mothers of American Sons at a joint meeting. We would like to have it brought out on the floor of the House if it can be done. We mothers feel it is very necessary at this time. We wish to commend you on your stand.

Sincerely,

Mrs. V. GORDON,
President, Unit No. 2.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., September 1, 1940.

DEAR SIR: We the Mothers of American Sons of the State of Minnesota, meeting on this 31st day of August 1940, do hereby submit the following resolution to the several Members of the House of Representatives:

"Whereas we feel that under article 14, section 1, of the Constitution of the United States, the present conscription bill really abridges citizenship privileges accorded citizens of said State; and

"Whereas we feel peacetime conscription is a despised form of regimentation; and

"Whereas war should be initiated by public authority, and not by any private person; and

"Whereas America has no moral right to engage in war with any nation because a war declared for expediency is an immoral war and no Christian citizen could in good conscience take any active part in such a war; and

"Whereas Christians should be horrified at the mere suggestion to be called into a human slaughter on fields of battle; and

"Whereas up to this time neither the President of the United States nor any officer thereof has definitely told the people that we are in imminent danger of invasion, expediency being the only reason given us for this conscription, which constitutes an immoral war; and

"Whereas mothers constitute the greatest institution in this Nation under God for its welfare:

"Resolved, That ours being a representative form of government, our Representatives in Washington, D. C., whom at a great sacrifice are paid, through taxation, individually a salary of $10,000 a year and a possible upkeep of $20,000 to $25,000—a total of $35,000 in all—is a definite reason why they should represent the people on this issue instead of listening to a voice from without to deprive our boys of their citizenship rights, which all agree the conscription bill definitely does."

Mrs. ELISABETH WEST.
Mrs. KATHRYN MCGEARY.
Mrs. G. C. KNOLL.
Mrs. ELLEN CANNON.
Mrs. VICTOR GORDON.

While Yet There Is Time To Think

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DEWEY SHORT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

EDITORIAL FROM THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Saturday Evening Post of September 7:

[From the Saturday Evening Post of September 7, 1940]

WHILE YET THERE IS TIME TO THINK

In a kind of hypnosis, produced partly by propaganda designed for people who believed themselves to be cynical and immune, partly by a sincere crusading evangel carried on by those whose emotions, as we think, have overcome their reason, but mainly by a Government whose foreign policy, to call it such, has been compounded of a spirit of moral grandeur, international heroics, delusions of a military power not in being, false premises and panic, this country now goes where it does not look and looks where it does not go.

If it should come awake one morning to read in the newspaper headlines, or hear by the radio, that it had walked backward into war, it would take it, no doubt, as having been somehow inevitable from the first, and yet nobody would be able to say quite how or why it happened.

As the hagfish enters the body of its victim unawares and slowly displaces it by devouring it, so it is that ideas that were clear and virile in the beginning have been devoured by new meanings, with no change of the word "shells," until now you may be called anti-American, a "fifth columnist," or an appeaser if you doubt that the only way to keep America out of the war is to get into it, that to save ourselves we have, first, to save the British Empire, or that our first line of defense is and always has been the English Channel.

The Post's position cannot be misunderstood. Before the blitzkrieg started we said: "What we need for practical security is first of all a new word. The word is 'impregnability,' or state of supreme defense. We need more than a bigger Navy. We need two, one for the Atlantic and one for the Pacific, each incomparable. We need an impervious antiaircraft wall. We need to be able to meet not any aggressor but any combination of aggressors. Then we may be sure that the principle of free institutions as a basis of modern civilization shall have, beyond the solace of words, a time yet to live in this world."

And that is our position still.

Now the Congress has voted a two-ocean Navy; for this proper sea power, for an approach to adequate air power, and for an army of 2,000,000 men, it has voted in a few weeks extraordinary appropriations rising to $10,000,000,000. We are not interested in the sums. We shall have to spend a great deal more than ten billions to create a power of defense equal to the power of aggression that has made this all at once a pirate world without law, the lean and hungry nations, as Mussolini says, out to take what they can from the fat ones by force. That, too, we have said.

It is defense we are thinking about, not war. And what concerns us now is that this distinction is becoming blurred.

What are we preparing for—defense or war?

Either the Executive Government itself does not know or it is unwilling to clarify the situation with a few positive words. We suppose the reason why it cannot do this is that it is already too much involved in its own confusions. Pursuing the insidious formula of measures short of war, conceived, to begin with, on a gross underestimate of the aggressor's power, it was carried headlong into acts of physical intervention for the consequences and implications of which the country was in every way unprepared, to say nothing of the fact that it acted without the consent of Congress and beyond the awareness of the people.

In his message to France on June 15, the President said: "The Government of the United States has made it possible for allied armies to obtain, during the weeks that have just passed, airplanes, artillery, and munitions of many kinds, and * * * this Government, so long as the allied governments continue to resist, will redouble its efforts in this direction."

That was the United States Government speaking, acting, pledging itself to assist in the war against Hitler to the utmost, short only of an actual declaration of hostilities. It was already too late to save France. Moreover, nothing we had been able to send her, even our total military power, including the Navy, could have saved her, which was a trifling reality the Government was unable to comprehend.

Only 6 weeks later, the Secretary of War is saying to the House Committee on Military Affairs, in support of the conscription bill, that there is very grave danger of a direct attack upon the United States by Hitler. He is asked how long it will take to prepare a suitable defense. He says: "We will not have it in time to meet the first possibility of invasion."

The Secretary of War, of course, is speaking directly for the administration. He is saying what it thinks. The administration thinks there is very grave danger of an invasion of this country by Hitler before we can be ready to meet it. But this is the same administration that stripped the American defense of rifles, artillery, munitions, and airplanes, and sent them to the Allies. It is the same administration that would have delivered to the British Admiralty the whole of our mosquito fleet in building if the Congress had not found a law to stop it. It is the same administration that has ever since been trying to find a way to deliver United States Navy destroyers to the British. If what it thinks is true—that there is grave danger of an invasion of this country by Hitler before we can get ready—then we have not a rifle, a gun, an airplane, or a rowboat to spare, nor any industrial capacity. On the day the Secretary of War was making his statement before the House committee the New York newspapers carried pictures of National Guard men training with imaginary machine guns devised by plumbers out of gas pipe.

We can imagine circumstances in which the highest strategy would call for taking the war to the enemy. We cannot conceive of circumstances in which it is permitted in sanity to slap danger in the face before you are ready to meet it—to name an enemy who has not named you, to attack an enemy who has not yet attacked you, before you are ready to fight him.

Our enemies, the administration keeps telling the people, are Germany, Italy, and Japan, naming them. Not one of them has made a gesture of war toward us. For all we think and feel about Hitler, he has not attacked us. He says he does not intend to. We do not believe him. Nobody in the world now believes him. Very well. But the American Government has attacked Hitler, first by words, then by measures short of war, then by giving pledge to his enemies to assist them by all physical means to the utmost.

In June the American Government entered the war against Hitler by acts of physical intervention, all the worse because they were futile.

In July that same Government is telling the people they are in grave danger of being attacked by Hitler before they can get ready to meet him. "Hitler does not wait," said the Secretary of War to the House Committee on Military Affairs—and the National Guard men in New York training with gas-pipe guns.

What a triumph for statecraft. What strategy.

What a face for a great Nation.

These are the conditions under which there has been created in the country a war psychosis, misled by cries of "Stop Hitler Now" and "Defend America by Aiding the Allies." We had nothing to stop Hitler with in Europe. A government that either did not know that or made believe it was not so now is saying that if he decided to invade the United States soon, as there is very grave danger that he may, we are not ready to stop him here. Nevertheless, it goes on to declare against him an economic war—a pan-American economic bloc against his European bloc—for which also it is unprepared, not having thought it through, not having calculated the cost.

We do not believe that an invasion of the United States by Hitler is among the imminent possibilities. The word of the Government for it does not greatly impress us. A government that had been so wrong about his power to overcome in Europe and about the power of France to resist could very well be wrong again. Nor do we believe that 50 or 60 destroyers from the United States Navy would save the British Empire. That would be but another futile act of futile intervention, much more likely to infuriate an enemy we are not prepared to meet than to save a friend.

We are bound to be emotionally torn by the spectacle of the British Empire fighting for its life. That is a feeling that lies deep in us and is shared even by those who still can think in a realistic manner. The fall of the British Empire would be a mighty human disaster. Yet we part with those who say, or who believe, it would mean the end of American civilization, and part with them again when they would in any degree weaken the American defense to repair the weakness of Great Britain's, for which Great Britain, not we, are responsible. We add here two reflections—first, that Great Britain would be stronger if she had stood alone; second, the enemy is governed by logic, not emotion.

We stand, therefore, in our first position. Let us jealously mind our own defense in the great manner of a great people, resolve to be let alone. Let us build at any cost a dreadnought defense power such as no aggressor, nor any combination of aggressors, will dare to challenge. Thus we forfend war.

And meanwhile, for this will take some time, let us look very hard at a state of facts. The German thing has conquered Europe. That will be still true whether the British Empire stands or falls.

Who is going to put the German thing backs? The British? They are not able.

Shall we do it? Unless we are willing to go to Europe and destroy it there, we may as well make up our minds now that we shall have to live in the same world with it, maybe for a long time, whether we like it or not. None the less, for that reason, only all the more, we should, we must, create on this continent the incomparable power of defense. After that we shall see. For after that we shall be again as we once were, safe and free and dangerous.

ARTICLE BY CLAYTON RAND, OF GULFPORT, MISS., AUTHOR OF "INK ON HIS HANDS"

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following interview with Mr. Clayton Rand, of Gulfport, Miss., which appeared in the Bethesda Journal, of Montgomery County, Md., on August 30, 1940, as follows:

[From the Bethesda (Md.) Journal of August 30, 1940]

Clayton Rand, country editor from Gulfport, Miss., dropped in this week on his way to New York to read proof on his new book on country journalism, Ink On His Hands.

The talk led from one thing to another until it reached the Chicago convention which nominated Mr. Roosevelt. We were surprised to hear a Mississippian's comment that any good historian of Roman times, or even William Shakespeare, three centuries ago, wrote up the Democratic convention in Chicago last month. He said that a study of Caesar is timely right now. Caesar was born in wealth. His mother was of a distinguished family, and when his father died his mother trained him for a political career. Caesar was a pampered child, reared in the lap of luxury. He was celebrated for his extravagance and political intrigues. When the masses were enfranchised, Caesar played to the crowd and became a popular idol. He joined forces with radical parties, and as soon as he came into full power the Roman Constitution ceased to exist. Caesar spent tax money lavishly, providing public entertainment and sponsoring many projects to "relieve unemployment."

Caesar proposed a digest of all laws, founded libraries, drained marshes, built dams, enlarged harbors and dug canals. He made financial proposals for the relief of debtors and in "a great emergency" he took steps to restore agriculture. He even changed the calendar. As his spoils system spread throughout the republic, he became so popular with the people that the Roman Senate granted him the sole right of disposal of funds from the public treasury—blank checks as it were—and finally gave him full power to declare war and make peace.

Caesar preserved his writings for posterity in a special vault. He feasted and feted the people with prodigal extravagance until they called him "the great humanitarian of his country." Caesar's person was declared to be sacred and even divine and, of course, he could not appear in public debate with any common mortal.

In Caesar's fifty-seventh year, he aspired to be king in name as well as in fact. As Shakespeare described it: Antony set a crown upon his head. When Caesar put it by, Antony offered it to him again; then he put it by again. But there was a columnist present named Casca who was keen sighted, and Casca reported: "To my way of thinking he was very loath to lay his fingers off it. And then it was offered the third time and as he refused it again the rabble shouted, and clapped their chapped hands, and threw up their sweaty nightcaps." And Casca went on to say that he durst not laugh out loud.

We made a resolve to read our history and Shakespeare again.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I was not present when two of our congressional brothers—the gentleman from Ohio, Brother SWEENEY, and the gentleman from Kentucky, Brother VINCENT—mixed it up on the floor of the House the other evening, but if I had been I would have said to them, "Shake hands, boys, you are both right." If I understand the controversy that led to this spectacular exhibition of polemics, the gentleman from Ohio, Brother SWEENEY, declared that President Wilson was reelected in 1916 on the slogan, "He kept us out of war," and in the following April he—the President—led us into war, in which categorical asserveration the gentleman from Ohio, Brother SWEENEY, was factually, chronologically, and eminently correct.

If, furthermore, I understand the cause of the disturbance of the peaceful equilibrium of the gentleman from Kentucky, Brother VINCENT'S ordinarily placid mind, it was what he construed to be the implied intimation that President Wilson deceived the American people by pitching his campaign on the "he kept us out of war" issue in 1916, when it was his intention and forethought to lead the country into war after the election.

In this connection, I desire to tell a story which has never been told and which shows that President Wilson had nothing to do with adopting "He kept us out of war" as the slogan of his party in 1916, and that, as a matter of fact, it was adopted over his strenuous and unyielding opposition.

In 1916 and 1917 and for many years before and after, I was a member of the press gallery at Washington. The string of daily newspapers I represented was a long one, stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific, or 14 to be exact. Jim Preston, superintendent of the Senate press gallery in those days, used to wise-crack that I represented all of the papers in the United States the Associated Press did not. Among my favorite connections was a newspaper in Louisville, Ky., presided over by that brilliant journalist of the South, Richard W. Knott. That connection drew me into very close and intimate relationship with Senator Ollie M. James who, in addition to being America's premier political orator, was Woodrow Wilson's most intimate friend and spokesman on Capitol Hill. I was an habitue of Senator James' office on the first floor of the Senate Office Building, just off of the northwest entrance, and many were the Sunday afternoons, as well as weekday occasions, I spent with him there, listening to his charming conversation and enjoying the brilliant radiance of his remarkable mind. On these occasions it frequently happened that President Wilson's intimates and members of his kitchen cabinet also were present. When Senator James liked a person very much, indeed, he called that person "Old Feller," never "Fellow," but "Feller." I was in the "old feller" class. Whenever he wrote a speech for a momentous occasion he "tried it on the dog" before delivering it. I had the honor and distinction of serving as "the dog."

In due course of time and in the selective process of eliminating others who stood high in the list of availables, Senator James was chosen as the permanent chairman and keynoter of the Democratic National Convention that was to renominate Woodrow Wilson for President at St. Louis the coming June. No better selection could have been made. Senator James was a giant, weighing more than 300 pounds, with a leonine head, a booming voice, and a gift of real eloquence that made him the leading platform orator of his time. From the standpoint of popular appeal, I doubt whether America has ever produced a greater.

Meeting Senator James in the marble room one day, he asked me to join him at his office at 4 o'clock that afternoon, as he had something he wanted to talk over with me. I had an intuition that I was to serve again as "the dog," and the intuition was correct. At the appointed time I was at his office, and he produced from his desk a mass of typewritten sheets, which proved to be the keynote speech he intended to deliver in opening the Democratic National Convention. He read it to me, with all of the beautiful periods and climaxes delivered and stressed just as he would on the rostrum. When he had concluded he said:

Well, what do you think of it, "old feller"?

It is great—most impressive. It will sweep the convention off its feet—

I said, and indeed I thought so, for it was truly a remarkable effort.

Now I am going to tell you something that will surprise you—

The Senator said—

I took this speech to the White House and read it to the President, and he doesn't want me to deliver it. He doesn't want me to give him so much credit for keeping America out of war. He doesn't want the campaign pitched on that issue, and he is emphatic about it. I can't understand him.

I told the Senator that in my opinion his speech was sound, sensible, and politically wise; that the people of the United States certainly were not war-minded; and that I believed his address would make a tremendous appeal to the voters.

"I am going to make this speech nevertheless and notwithstanding," he said.

And he did. He delivered it with such artfulness and effect that to the survivors of those who were assembled in the St. Louis Colosseum on July 15, 1916, when he took over the gavel, it will always be an indelible memory. When he told the convention how the Wilson administration had kept the country out of the bloody war raging in Europe the vast audience went wild. The climax came when he said:

Without orphaning a single American child, without widowing a single American mother, without firing a single gun, without the shedding of a single drop of blood, he wrung from the most militant spirit that ever brooded above a battlefield an acknowledgment of American rights and an agreement to American demands.

"Repeat it! Repeat it!" roared the frenzied audience. The Senator repeated the sentence with magnificent impressiveness. What happened then is stated in a note in parentheses in the official report of the convention proceedings, as follows:

Tremendous outburst of applause and cheering, the parading of delegates with the standards of many States around the hall for 21 minutes.

There was another enormous demonstration when the Senator a little further along in his speech—

In the bloodiest crucible of all history he has kept the stainless banner of the Republic flying above 100,000,000 people in peace and in honor. * * * Around 20,000,000 happy firesides the fathers of America will gather this night with their unbroken family circle, with their children upon their knees and their wives by their sides, happy and prosperous. Contrast this with the fathers, husbands, and brothers of the Old World dying in the ditches, with the gloom and mourning in broken family circles, where hunger crouches and disease treads.

Then, drawing a vivid picture of the President as a lover of peace in a world of brutal and heartless dictators, the Senator proceeded with a eulogy that was interrupted at almost every sentence with tumultous acclaim:

He has struggled for peace. His fondest hope, his most fervent prayer, is for the peace not only of his own beloved country but of the world. When the last great day shall come, and before the court of God the nations of this earth shall march in judgment review, the monarchs of the Old World shall have to answer for this awful carnage, this heartless orphaning of millions of children, this cruel widowing of millions of mothers, this brutal turning of a once happy land into a place of mourning, and on the last day I can see our President holding in his hand the accusing picture of Henri Danger, of Christ upon the battlefield, with the dead and dying all about him, with the roar of cannon, the scream of shrapnel, the wail of the dying, and above his head written these words: "And He said unto them, love one another." When that day shall come, who is it that would have our President exchange places with the blood-bespattered monarchs of the Old World? I can see him with the white light streaming upon his head and hear the Master say, "Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God." The Democratic Party is proud of the achievements of Woodrow Wilson.

In strange contrast with Senator James' keynote speech the platform adopted by that historic convention which renominated President Wilson, asserted no claim for credit due him for keeping America out of war. Whoever takes the trouble to read the platform will find no such claim in it. I have always believed it was kept out of the platform because Woodrow Wilson's influence controlled the platform makers, whereas it could not control Senator James. And I venture to say that a careful reading of all of President Wilson's speeches during his campaign for reelection will show that he never asserted such a claim. Perhaps he could see far enough through the dark crystal of fate to know that the time was coming and not far away when he would feel that it was his duty to lead America into the war. The slogan "He kept us out of war," which determined the nature of the Democratic presidential campaign of 1916 was invented, not by the platform committee nor by the President, but by Senator James over the positive opposition of President Wilson. The Senator from Kentucky acted in the best of faith and with a very practical idea of the value of the slogan he was creating.

British Propaganda and Subversion of Textbooks in American Public Schools—A

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1940

REPORT BY DAVID HIRSHFIELD, COMMISSIONER OF ACCOUNTS OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I have taken the liberty of marking these articles, in which I am discussing changes in school histories, A, B, C, D, and so forth, and my reason for so doing is not to evade the regulations of the House concerning printing but simply to identify these articles.

Each article is complete in itself; and while publishing them may entail some cost, there should be no objection, inasmuch as we have appropriated fourteen and a half billion dollars to launch this country into an unnecessary war, which will, if we enter into it, cost millions of lives and billions in property.

My remarks are inserted in the RECORD for the sole purpose of informing the people of the actual conditions that exist today, so that in the knowledge of these facts they may demand that this Nation remain at peace. The cost of the printing therefore is not an expense, but it is, instead, an investment which I hope will lead toward national security. All information which I have inserted in the RECORD is authenticated and based upon facts, much of which is in my possession or in the Congressional Library, where Members of Congress may verify my statements.

My interest in the matter which I have placed in the RECORD is not political but is, instead, to shed light upon those whose interest is in foreign nations instead of the United States.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and include a report by David Hirshfield, commissioner of accounts, city of New York, on investigation of pro-British history textbooks in use in the public schools of this city.

Mr. Speaker, I have included these articles with my remarks in order to call the attention of Members of Congress and the parents of our American boys and girls to these changes in our textbooks, as I am sure all patriotic citizens are interested in retaining the true American history in our public schools.

REPORT ON INVESTIGATION OF PRO-BRITISH HISTORY TEXTBOOKS IN USE IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK, AT THE DIRECTION OF HON. JOHN F. HYLAN, MAYOR

(By David Hirshfield, Commissioner of Accounts, City of New York)

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER OF ACCOUNTS,
City of New York, May 25, 1923.

Subject—Investigation of pro-British history textbooks in use in the public schools of this city.

Hon. JOHN F. HYLAN, Mayor,

DEAR SIR: On December 6, 1921, I received from Your Honor a letter, of which the following is a copy:

DECEMBER 6, 1921.

DAVID HIRSHFIELD, Esq.,
Commissioner of Accounts.

DEAR SIR: I wish you would make a thorough investigation and report to me with regard to the new history readers and textbooks alleged to contain anti-American propaganda, which have been introduced in the public schools of this city.

It would be interesting to learn why the standard works have been supplanted, if such be the fact; who are the authors of the new books; and what influence is back of the change.

This administration has done more than several past administrations combined to provide adequate accommodations for school children, and our total program calls for 95 school buildings and additions.

Having made ample provision for school facilities, it is our intention to see that the buildings are devoted to the purposes for which they were erected. There is no room in any of our schools for anti-American propaganda or anything which would besmirch American traditions and the glory, renown, and good name of our American Republic and its founders.

America has given to the world great fundamental truths in government of the people, for the people, by the people. These truths have been woven in the warp and woof of our social, economic, and political fabric. Many nations, some centuries older than our own, have profited by our example.

We have never forgotten our debt to early patriots who bequeathed to us the beneficent institutions of free government. At the risk of their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor, our forefathers committed themselves to the cause of human liberty. It was an experiment, pure and simple, but a successful one.

It is amazing to think that any publication intended for the use of school children should refer to our early patriots as "hot-headed mobs," "smugglers," and "pirates." The fortitude, supreme common sense, and sagacity of Washington and the other patriots have always been a never-ending source of inspiration, and it will be a sad day if alien propaganda is permitted to alter the enviable record of their service and patriotism.

The school children of this city must not be inoculated with the poisonous virus of foreign propaganda which seeks to belittle illustrious American patriots. What our school children are taught to believe about America and its founders becomes the spirit of America in the future. Let these children continue to be taught the truth as they have in the past, and we need have no misgivings as to the future welfare of the Republic.

Very truly yours,

JOHN F. HYLAN, Mayor.

Pursuant to this request, I made a study of the American history textbooks in use in the public schools of the city of New York, against which complaints have been made.

In addition to having read and examined the history textbooks complained of and having done extensive research work, I held five public hearings during the period from February 3 to April 18, 1922, to which all those interested were invited.

These hearings were well attended and the following-named persons appeared and spoke against the use of the un-American textbooks in our schools:

Col. Alvin M. Owsley, national commander, the American Legion.

Mr. Charles Grant Miller, author of Treason to American Tradition.

Col. H. B. Fairbanks, chairman, executive committee, Veterans of Foreign Wars.

Mr. Joseph T. Griffin, principal, public school 114, Manhattan.

Mr. Julius Hyman, representing National Security League and Jewish Welfare Board.

Mrs. John Jerome Rooney, chairman, district school board No. 15, Manhattan.

Mr. William Pickens, field secretary, National Association for Advancement of Colored People.

Mr. F. E. DeWees, 31 East Twenty-seventh Street, New York.

Judge Wallace McCamant, president general, National Society Sons of the American Revolution.

Maj. David Banks, secretary general, Military Order of Foreign Wars.

Mr. Thos. P. Tuite, executive secretary, the Star-Spangled Banner Association, and secretary, Vanderbilt Post, Grand Army of the Republic.

Mr. William M. Van Der Weyde, president, Thomas Paine National Memorial Association.

Mrs. Marie J. Stuart, National Association for Advancement of Colored People.

Mr. John A. Carrigy, commander, Nathan Hale Post, the American Legion, Brooklyn.

Mr. Warren B. Fisher, representing United American War Veterans.

Miss Dorothy Burns, 616 West One Hundred and Sixteenth Street, New York.

Mrs. Caroline C. Sperry, Mountainview, N. J.

Mr. Philip Leonard Greene, international president, Pan-American Student League.

Capt. Walter I. Joyce, national chairman, Americanization Committee, Veterans of Foreign Wars.

Mr. Charles Edward Russell, author, diplomat, and publicist.

Mr. George E. Morrison, managing editor, The Historic Hudson.

The following-named persons appeared and spoke in defense of the histories complained against:

Mr. Francis M. Kinnicut, member, advisory board, the English Speaking World.

Mr. Telfair Minton, secretary, the Loyal Coalition.

While none of the authors of the complained-of textbooks appeared at these hearings, I am told that several representatives of the textbook publishers attended, but none spoke.

From the examination of the textbooks and a study of the whole subject and from the testimony given before me, it appears that standard American school histories have been largely supplanted in the New York City public schools by eight texts recently revised, so far as they relate to the Revolution, the War of 1812, and other Anglo-American differences.

Under the specious pretense of "promoting more friendly relations" and "mutual understanding" with Great Britain, our school children are now being taught not the consecrated maxim, "Taxation without representation is tyranny," but, quite to the contrary, that "In England's taxation of the Colonies there was no injustice or oppression," and that the real reason independence was sought was because after England had at great cost crushed out autocracy in the Western Hemisphere the colonists no longer needed the protection of the mother country and were unwilling to pay their fair share of the costs incurred.

Faneuil Hall, "the cradle of liberty," is of no consequence in these new histories, nor is the Mutiny Act, the Stamp Act, or the Boston massacre, which the colonists deemed important causes for resentment.

The martyrdom of Nathan Hale, whose only regret on the British scaffold was that he had but one life to give to his country, is in all of them ignored. In most of them there is no mention of Joseph Warren, Ethan Allen, Anthony Wayne, Paul Revere, Molly Pitcher, and Betsy Ross. In one there is a page of praise for Benedict Arnold.

Such important battles as Bunker Hill, Bennington, Oriskany, and Kings Mountain are omitted.

Such decisive victories as Ticonderoga, Saratoga, New Orleans, and the capture of the Serapis are belittled.

The inspiriting slogans, "We have met the enemy and they are ours," "Don't give up the ship," and "I've not yet begun to fight" are either omitted or discredited.

French aid in the Revolution is by all, but one, of these authors attributed to shameful motives.

As a result of these new texts the children are now being taught in our public schools misrepresentations such as the following:

That the American Revolution was merely a "civil war" between the English people on both sides of the sea and their "German" king;

That Magna Carta is the real source of our liberties, while the Declaration of Independence exerted no vital force;

That such patriots as Samuel Adams, John Hancock, and Patrick Henry were mere disreputable characters;

That Thomas Jefferson deserved a halter;

That Alexander Hamilton denounced the people as "a great beast";

That the United States Constitution and most of our free institutions were borrowed from England;

That the War of 1812 was "a mistake," "disgraceful," and "unfortunate";

That the Mexican War was a grab of territory;

That the North saved the Union only through England's "heroic support";

That our War with Spain was won because England prevented Germany and all Europe from taking sides against us;

That our country's history has been "hitherto distorted through unthinking adherence to national prejudices";

That it is now being "set right" through "newer tendencies in historical writing" and "methods of modern historical scholarship."

It would seem as if these authors wanted to convey the impression that our history, our Government, and everything else American is all wrong, and that the sole hope for American progress lies in our renouncing our American traditions, surrendering our American spirit, and becoming again an integral part of the British Empire, as Cecil Rhodes directed in the first draft of his will, quoted in Basil Williams' life of Cecil Rhodes:

"Directed that a secret society should be endowed with the following objects: 'The extension of British rule throughout the world, * * * the colonization by British subjects of all lands where the means of livelihood are attainable by energy, labor, and enterprise, and especially the occupation by British settlers of the entire continent of Africa, the Holy Land, the valley of the Euphrates, the islands of Cyprus and Candia, the whole of South America, the islands of the Pacific not heretofore possessed by Great Britain, the whole of the Malay archipelago, the seaboard of China and Japan, the ultimate recovery of the United States of America as an integral part of the British Empire.' "

And also making a reality of Andrew Carnegie's fondest dream, set forth in his Triumphant Democracy in 1893:

"Time may dispel many pleasing illusions and destroy many noble dreams, but it shall never shake my belief that the wound caused by the wholly unlooked-for and undesired separation of the mother from her child is not to bleed forever. Let men say what they will; therefore, I say that as sure as the sun in the heavens once shone upon Britain and America united, so surely is it one morning to rise, shine upon, and greet again the reunited state, the British-American Union."

The texts which I have specially examined are:

An American History, Revised, 1920, by David Saville Muzzey;

History of the American People, 1918, by Willis Mason West.

School History of the United States, Revised, 1920, by Albert Bushnell Hart.

A History of the United States for Schools, Revised, 1919, by McLaughlin and Van Tyne.

Our United States, 1919, by William Backus Guitteau.

Burke's Speech on Conciliation, 1919, by C. H. Ward.

Short American History by Grades, 1920, by Everett Barnes.

American History for Grammar Grades, 1920, by Everett Barnes.

All on the list of authorized texts of the New York City public schools, selected by William L. Ettinger, superintendent of schools in the city of New York.

It appears that from among the 10 texts complained of, the 8 worst offenders against America and Americanism were selected for use in the New York public schools.

At the time this investigation was called for by Your Honor an inquiry into similar complaints had been going on for some time by a special committee of 21, consisting of superintendents, principals, and teachers, appointed by Superintendent Ettinger. This committee thereafter, in May 1922, made its report, in which certain passages in seven of the complained-of texts were criticized, but not a word was said against the Muzzey history.

Of one of the authors the New York Public School Special Committee's report says:

"No Wedderburn, no crown advocate, could plead the British cause in a more bitterly partisan spirit than West has done."

As to all the accused authors, excepting Muzzey, the school committee reported:

"The paragraphs complained of in their books indicate an attitude of mind toward the founders of the Republic which, in our judgment, is entirely reprehensible."

The report of this committee was accepted by the board of superintendents May 15, 1922, and the committee members were thanked by Superintendent Ettinger for their "excellent work."

However, for some unexplained reason, the list of textbooks authorized to be used in the public schools of New York City issued in February 1923 continues to include every one of the histories that had been investigated and condemned by the superintendent's own investigating committee.

As I understand it, while all books for use as textbooks in the public schools of this city must be selected from the list of authorized texts promulgated by the superintendent of schools, the principals select for use in their respective schools such books on the list as they choose; but, owing to refusal of information by the principals and various other school authorities, by order of Superintendent Ettinger, it has been impossible to obtain information to what extent these texts are now in use in our schools.

During the progress of my investigation, and apparently as a result thereof, the Guitteau history and the two Everett Barnes histories were revised. In these re-revised textbooks, though many offensive passages have been corrected or removed, the texts still show their authors' apparent want of true American patriotic appreciation.

Patriotic protest has forced the Muzzey history out of the public schools in many States, but in the New York City school system it seems to be especially favored. Thirteen hundred and fifty-six copies of the Muzzey history were purchased and placed in the public schools of this city in 1922, and already in 1923 there have been added eleven hundred and fifty more.

President-General McCamant of the National Society Sons of the American Revolution, in a statement, said, in part:

"There is a great abuse in the matter of the adoption of school books. The representatives of the publishing houses spend money lavishly in the entertainment of teachers and school superintendents and secure favors from the latter which ought not to be granted.

"In my attack on the Muzzey history in my home city, Portland, Oreg., I was unable to get anywhere in that jurisdiction until we got rid of a school superintendent who was too friendly to Ginn & Co., the publishers of the book, to be willing even to consider its displacement.

"Every one of the publishing houses has a force of smooth promoters, selected because of their personality, who go about the country bringing about the introduction of textbooks, not on their merits but on the popularity and other persuasive qualities of the men who promote them."

The young should receive patriotic enlightenment and be taught loyal citizenship. The quality of the history teachings to the school child largely determines the patriotic character of the future citizen and the destiny of the Nation. Too great care cannot be taken to protect the impressionable minds of our school children against improper history teachings.

The prime essential of history teaching to our children is to inculcate wholesome appreciation of the heroes, ideals, and achievements of our country's past and to stimulate right aspirations as to its future.

The teaching to American children of the revised and much-complained-of history textbooks can have but one result, and that is to depreciate American patriotic thought and degrade national spirit.

It appears, however, and is shown in detail in this report that organized English and American financial influences insidiously pervade the scholastic circles of our country, with the result that American school histories are so rewritten as "to give the emphasis to the factors in our national development which appeal to them as most vital from the standpoint of today."

The aim of this "standpoint of today" seems to be to discredit the American Declaration of Independence and the American Constitution in the minds of the American children, as not being the real foundation, bulwark, and inspiration of our rights, liberties, and ideals and thus undermine their love for our country and sow seeds of disrespect for our sacred institutions.

In every school history, the story of the American Revolution ought to be told with emphasis on the righteousness of the cause for which our forefathers fought.

The men of the Revolution are no longer here to defend the righteousness of their cause and we owe a duty to their memory to see that our school histories shall teach that they were right in what they did and what they fought for, and any history which, after 150 years, attempts to teach our children that the War of Independence was an unnecessary war and that it is still a problem as to who was right and who wrong should be fed to the furnace, and those responsible for these books branded as un-American.

I do not for one moment contend that everything contained in our American history textbooks prior to the pro-English propaganda in America was absolutely true. However, those American histories were written from the American point of view, intended to awaken love for America and for everything American, to instill patriotism in the breasts of the young and excite their admiration for the heroic men and splendid women who laid the foundation of our independence and made this Nation a fact.

If any of the old-line history textbooks contained any inaccuracies of particular events, they erred in favor of Americanism, and I, for one, would rather have it that way.

Under the protection of the State educational laws, the superintendent of schools in the city of New York reigns supreme in our elementary and high schools, while the college officials have absolute sway over their respective city-owned and city-supported higher educational institutions.

In the past any suggestion from the city authorities in connection with the method and kind of education to be given to our children has been met with an outcry of "politics" and "political interference" from those who are suspected of being beneficiaries of the various existing funds and foundations used to promote a certain brand of education and to mold public opinion. Nevertheless, these textbooks should not be permitted to be used in our schools.

NEWSPAPER ARTICLE ON AMERICANISM

Mr. MACIEJEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article:

IT'S A WONDERFUL PRIVILEGE TO BE AN AMERICAN

Today much of the world faces the grim specter of famine. But here in the United States we still have the blessing of plenty.

A Department of Agriculture survey shows that abundant supplies of nearly all foodstuffs will be available for the coming year. Increases in production of edible fats and oils are expected to continue. The fresh-fruit supply will be slightly above last year, and large wheat and rice crops are anticipated. In the case of most foods, there will be enough to meet all domestic requirements, and to provide surpluses for export.

Other surveys indicate that the demands of war-material production in our factories will not seriously dislocate production of consumer goods. We may have to do without a few manufactured luxuries as time goes on, but there will be plenty of the necessities.

If our productive facilities are to prove of maximum benefit to the consumer, another factor must enter in—and that factor is the distributor. Abundance on the farm is wasted unless the crops can be delivered to the buyer at minimum cost. And efficiency in the factory can be offset by inefficiency and waste in distribution.

But the consumer need not worry. The American distribution machine, like the American production machine, is the most efficient in the world. Our competitive system, with all kinds of distributors seeking to outserve each other, must be given credit for this. When you enter a store and make a purchase you're getting more for your money, all things considered, than the buyer in any other nation.

It's a great privilege to be an American citizen.

Conscription

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN G. ALEXANDER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1940

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, early Sunday morning, a few hours after the passage of the Burke-Wadsworth conscription bill, I prepared the following address on conscription, which was carried last night in a Nation-wide broadcast over the blue network of the National Broadcasting Co.

In its first paragraph I stated that its adoption by Congress is one of the last three steps to war, the other two being the election of a President November 5, and the other, the decision thereafter by the man so chosen of the particular time and spot where the actual starting of hostilities is determined to have occurred. Now read my remarks and then the clipping from the Washington Post appended thereto, which confirms the statement made by me in paragraph 1:

CONSCRIPTION

Two hundred and sixty-three Members of Congress having voted for conscription at the week's end, an interesting question arises as to whether the Representatives elected by the people to Congress really represent the people. If a vote could actually be taken as to conscription by every United States citizen, male and female, 21 years of age or over, would the result be the same? I doubt it, for conscription is the road to war and the people never want war. In fact, by the passage of this bill by Congress we are mighty close to the take-off point. Trained observers know there are but two more steps. First, the selection of a man for President on November 5, and the second step is the decision shortly thereafter by this man as to the exact time and place where the overt act, starting hostilities, will occur. That will doubtless be a historic day and spot, for it will mark a long, drawn-out contest lasting undoubtedly for from 5 to 6 years while the war of all wars rages all over the world, in every hemisphere, on every continent, testing and determining what—determining whether we the people want economic imperialism in the name of capitalism or whether we want state imperialism in the form of fascism or nazi-ism or its sequel, communism? And when the war is over and the appetites of everyone, warmonger and innocent bystander alike, have been satiated, those who are left will undoubtedly decide they want neither of these. And so the war will be won, not, of course, by the promoters and instigators of today, but by the power of truth and by the strength of the principle of the universal brotherhood of man, applied to world politics, which, as all rational and clear-thinking and healthy-bodied persons know, is the one and only ultimate answer to the question of how to get peace and stop war.

I went into this topic in some detail in my address entitled "After the War—Peace," of November 2, last, following the vote on the revision of the Neutrality Act. (I wish at this time to say that requests for that address are still coming in from all over the Nation, and I shall be glad to supply them in any quantity to everyone interested in solving war. The expense of that will be a contribution by me to a real and lasting peace.) Those who have already read this speech will recall that I pointed out in those remarks that the real result of the revision of the Neutrality Act would not be that which was pictured and promised by its proponents. They said it was needed so we could end the war and save ourselves from war and assure peace. Let me ask one question now, 10 months later, Has it worked to end war, to save ourselves from war, or to bring peace? No; nor will this Conscription Act serve us any better, notwithstanding the false and misleading promises held out by its promoters. Nor will the mere winning of this war by either side, if that were possible, result in stopping war any more than the Armistice of 1918 did, unless it is accompanied by a removal of those men from positions of power and trust who are either of themselves or by others inspired to selfishness, to hypocrisy, and greed; and also unless accompanied by the removal of the causes of rivalry, ultranationalism, mistrust, hatred, and other incentives to war, such as trade barriers, exchange manipulation, and all other restrictions to the free flow of trade and commerce and to all forms of travel and communication, individually and collectively.

Oh, my friends of America, can you not see this? If your Congressmen fail to grasp this great and fundamental truth, then may it not be because you have failed to be an inspiration to them, because you have failed to read your Bibles, because you have failed to search the heart of God, and, also, because you have failed to study the lessons of history? And what is more you have failed to catch the vision and the idealism of the heroic, Christian founders of our great Nation, and of the honest, conscientious framers of our matchless Constitution. If Congressmen fail in this great crisis, may it not be because you the people have failed to go along with the wise, foresighted signers of the Declaration of Independence for their pronouncement said, "All men are created equal." Analyze that "all," meaning every; "men," meaning humans everywhere. Seventy-five years ago we fought a bloody Civil War to prove we still believed it and meant it as to colored men, but today we are being asked to fight a still worse, more bloody and more destructive war, to disprove its truth, and in its place we are being asked to prove that some men are created to have and others to have not, that some are to be favored above others, and that all men everywhere are not created equal with certain inalienable rights, but that they are created unequal and that their rights in and to the bounties of nature, the favors and benefits of an all-wise Creator are to be denied certain races and groups and nationalities because they happen to be born in or forced by economic misfortune and circumstance to live at a certain spot or part of the globe, or to have a certain color.

No wonder we have wars, no wonder we can be so misled, when we so forget the original, sound, and fundamental tenets not only of our Government but also of our religion!

I am glad of one thing, however, in this most disheartening hour and era in our national history and that is that there were 149 of our members representing a little over one-third of our Nation who still keep the vision of the founding forefathers. That one-third is the heart of America, not only geographically speaking, coming mainly as they do from the Midwest area, but also figuratively, for from them not only their own constituency but patriots everywhere can take courage and gain hope. As long as you back them, and they stand here to safeguard American and Christian principles, not only this Nation, but even the world itself will be saved from the horror which would be resultant from complete destruction of these eternal truths and American standards of human conduct and civic relationship.

On that basis, I bespeak hope and courage to all lovers of peace. So strong is the sentiment against war and against this current conscription bill in the midcontinent States, that there is already talk of civil revolt and opposition if an attempt is made to take boys from their homes, although, of course, no such unwise thing should happen.

It is hard for our Midwest people to understand how anyone could vote for this conscription bill, much less a Congressman. It is well that the varying factors be made clear to them, lest they be misled by the strength of the conscription vote in the House of Representatives. In the first place politics played a strong part. Many Members pursue a definite policy of "follow the leader," and as long as the administration forces were charged with the job of putting over conscription in the name of preparedness, you can be sure that they pulled all political wires to effect its passage. This is always worth several dozen votes. Then there are those like Mr. WADSWORTH himself, who subscribe to the policy of compulsory military training at all times. Here was their golden opportunity and they grasped it. Others were influenced by the fact that war industries or training camps and facilities are concentrated in their districts thus involving not only profits, but work, and labor, and real-estate values, and all that goes with that activity or any industrial activity for that matter. And also I suppose we might add a class for those Members whose people are unable to think constructively or have been misled in their thinking by propaganda of one sort or another, perhaps into a pro-British point of view, or into believing mistakenly that this conscription bill is really going to help the Nation and give us real preparedness for modernized warfare. There are also a few Members whose vote could be expected to be influenced by considerations of nationality or race, and some by straight business influences such as Members whose constituency have their vocations centered about Wall Street.

A man-by-man review of these various groups would indicate that personal and business elements were largely responsible for the votes of the majority of those voting for conscription, and that the profit element had a place in the decisions. This being the case, I do not feel that the opponents of the bill need have any discouragement or misgivings as to their position but rather should continue their stand and keep up their fight to take the profits out of war.

Also, I should add, this is a much larger question than is covered in the Smith amendment to draft some industry and which was adopted by the House in place of the Russell-Overton amendment in the Senate. The Smith amendment was evidently quite acceptable to industry as evidenced by the overwhelming vote for its adoption, so it can hold little hope as a deterrent or remover of the war-profit element.

Now, I don't want to preach, and I hate to appear in a sanctimonious role, but I have given this problem long and serious study and, to sum up, my advice to the mothers, fathers, sons, and daughters of America is that if you really want to solve the problem of war and enjoy peace, that you spend 15 minutes a day with your Bible, and then that you daily study the problem of war, keeping in mind your discoveries of the eternal truths contained therein and especially Christ's doctrine, and that you seek to bring peace to the entire world instead of just to America. By this means you will then unlock the door to a real and lasting peace, and without it, I am afraid your search will have been in vain. With this advice, I bid you, Godspeed and good night.

Mr. Speaker, imagine my surprise on reading the Washington Post Sunday afternoon after preparing the above speech to find the following copyrighted article from the New York Times by Robert P. Post, dated London, September 8, quoting the dean of all British publicists, J. L. Garvin, in the London Observer as confirming my conclusion regarding the next two steps to war.

[From the Washington Post of September 8, 1940]

UNITED STATES WILL ENTER WAR AFTER ELECTION, SAYS LONDON WRITER

(By Robert P. Post)

LONDON, September 8.—In a long article discussing the Anglo-American destroyer-bases deal, J. L. Garvin, in the London Observer, says the United States, when the Presidential elections are over and the clouds of controversies are cleared away, will become a mighty belligerent at the overwhelming demand of her people, irrespective of party.

This opinion, he declared, is based on two reasons.

"First, that British sea power is the bulwark of America's security, no less than her own navy. It is we who are the great outpost of the American defense. By comparison, the new chain of small outposts which Washington has leased are bagatelles for the purposes of this war, however effective they may become later.

"Second, the United States must come in for the wider reason which equally concerns ourselves and the conquered nations, including France. No sufficient securities for future world peace can be wrested out of the worst of wars unless America came in to clinch the total victory for freedom to assure the solidity of a just peace."

Thus the dean of all British publicists wrote tonight. He is probably not speaking officially but is undoubtedly voicing the opinion of many here.

It is emphasized tonight in official circles that Garvin was writing entirely on his own and had not submitted his story or consulted any members of the foreign office before he wrote it.

Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to have to quote such statements or to say such things, but I think, in the interest of the lives and safety of the youth of America, we might as well face the facts and to speak out the self-evident truth, much as it hurts and unpleasant as it is to all of us.

My suggestion, in addition to those contained in the above broadcast, is, if we want to save ourselves from the impending holocaust, we had better start preparing personally and individually. It is my purpose to make another broadcast in a couple of weeks at about the time when the draft law will go into effect, for the purpose of going into more detail on that subject of self-preparedness and also to give some timely advice to the youth of America, who will be called on to make the sacrifice. Yes; in many cases even the supreme sacrifice. From the experiences of myself and others in the World War of 1917-18, perhaps we can give some helpful advice and suggestions for the guidance of our youth of today and for their immediate and future protection.

British Propaganda and Subversion of Textbooks in American Public Schools—B

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1940

EXCERPT FROM REPORT BY DAVID HIRSHFIELD

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and include a report of David Hirshfield commissioner of accounts, city of New York, on British propaganda agencies are active in America.

Mr. Speaker, I have included these articles with my remarks in order to call the attention of Members of Congress and the parents of our American boys and girls to these changes in our textbooks, as I am sure all patriotic citizens are interested in retaining the true American history in our public schools.

BRITISH PROPAGANDA AGENCIES ARE ACTIVE IN AMERICA

There is striking significance in the uniformity with which these revisionists proclaim their purpose to rewrite American school history from a new viewpoint. A comparison of their statements in their prefaces reveals that they all seem to be subject to the same influences.

It is well known that children are highly sensitive to the spirit of an author. This is why in the writing of school history the prime essential is a true and virile patriotic spirit in the author. If this be wanting, his history, however precise it may be as to specific facts, is only a bulb without a current.

Charles Grant Miller, in the course of his testimony at one of the hearings, said:

"The history that truthfully presents our Nation's annals in such sympathetic, virile, patriotic spirit as to inculcate in our children pride in the birth and development of our Republic, honor to its heroes, devotion to its principles and progress, and zest in its ideals and purposes—this is a true history. But the history that creeps along the verge of falsehood, alien in spirit, snarling in self-defense that it is 'not actually untrue,' and inoculating the children with suspicion of the Nation's founders, doubt as to its cardinal principles, and indifference to its democratic ideals—that history is false."

And I agree with him.

It may all be accidental; nevertheless, no one can fail to note the complete accord in which all these school-history revisionists have shifted their standpoint, and the striking similarity of their statements proclaiming their new attitude.

Col. Alvin M. Owsley, national commander of the American Legion, in his statement at a hearing in my office, said:

"We must keep on the alert and not let this protest that has been so well started dwindle away into nothing for want of the real facts about the hostile forces at work. Let us find out just who or what influence it is that has undertaken to rewrite our history, to underestimate the value of our national characters, and to undermine the fixed principles upon which our Nation was built."

There are certain recognized influences which have been working long and powerfully to this end.

There never has been any secret about the underlying purpose in the Cecil Rhodes scholarships. Cecil Rhodes was no idle dreamer and his far-seeing genius and practical methods added vast domains to the British Empire. Few of his plans failed.

As already stated in this report, one of the objects of Rhodes was "the ultimate recovery of the United States of America as an integral part of the British Empire."

Cecil Rhodes laid his ambitious plans to that end, and by heavily endowing with British gold and backed by the British Government, created agencies for their working out. Under the ingenious Rhodes scholarship scheme the best of our American young men, selected from the colleges of all our States, especially for their required "qualities of leadership," are taken to England and placed in Oxford University for 3 years, with an allowance of £300 English money a year, and are then returned to us perfect English gentlemen, advocating British-American union.

These former American young men have formed a Rhodes Scholars' Alumni Association of America. This association has been openly active in defense of the Anglicized school histories.

When Cecil Rhodes dreamed his dream of "the extension of British rule throughout the world" and "the ultimate recovery of the United States of America as an integral part of the British Empire" he was obsessed of ambition less for political than for financial and commercial dominance. Since then the money power has shifted its seat, but the dream of world dominance remains, and the British Government is still its most effective instrument.

The money superpower is now on this side of the Atlantic, and, according to the English historian, John Richard Green, "the main current of the history of the English-speaking peoples must run along the channel not of the Thames or the Mersey but of the Hudson and the Mississippi." But in all the intriguing pleas for an "English-speaking union" those active in the movement do not seek an extension of the area of freedom under the American Constitution but always an extension of British trade and power.

So it is easy to see why our fundamental principles are being discredited, our history rewritten, and our ideals destroyed at behest of a superpower which is neither British nor American, knows no patriotism, and recognizes no country except as subject for exploitation.

This international money power is constantly seeking to persuade the American people to surrender their inherited sources of inspiration, strength, and guidance, and does now largely control the governmental policies of the United States as well as of England and other foreign countries.

America is safe only if her people will see to it that the historic truths, principles, ideals, and purposes that have served them unfailingly through a century and a half of unprecedented progress and to unparalleled prestige, be preserved unsullied in our own generation and transmitted unimpaired to our children. The antidote to the propaganda poison lies in patriotic teaching in the public schools.

Educational foundations, which have come to exercise immeasurable influences upon the scholastic and public-school systems of the United States, are offsprings of the international banking power, as a glance at their interlocking directorates and a sane thought as to the habitual practices and intuitive purposes of their founders clearly reveal.

Elihu Root, chairman of the Carnegie council, illustrates at once this directness of connection, and the completeness of design of the superpower.

Andrew Carnegie was another, Britisher through and through, who could dream grandly and had power to make his dreams come true. He endowed the multiform Carnegie institutions from motives which he never sought to conceal. His fondest dream was to bring about a "reunited state, the British-American union."

The spirit of this finds expression and fruition through the Carnegie Libraries, Foundation for Advancement of Teaching, Division of Intercourse and Education, Aid for Vocational Education, Association for International Conciliation and, by no means least seductive, the Carnegie Pension Fund for American professors and even American judges.

Direct and vital effects of these organized influences for Briticization of our scholastic and public-school systems are readily detected and clearly identified in utterances of innumerable teachers' associations in the last few years. These are fairly typified and summarized in the following excerpt from the report of the American History Teachers' Association, submitted to the United States Congress October 22, 1918:

"Attention is directed to the old charge that the study of the American Revolution in our schools tends to promote an anti-British state of mind. It is a natural reaction to demand revision of our textbooks with a view to the cultivation of a pro-British state of mind; and that reaction is now actually in evidence."

Other influences that have been directly at work to bring about the emasculation of American history and the destruction of our national spirit and morale are not only recognizable but confessed and in some cases even boasted.

Sir Gilbert Parker, professional British propagandist, in an article in Harper's magazine, March 1918, outlined some of his methods of "putting it over" on the American people, as follows:

"Practically since the day war broke out between England and the Central Powers I became responsible for American publicity," Parker wrote "I need hardly say that the scope of my department was very extensive and its activities widely ranged.

"Among the activities was a weekly report to the British Cabinet upon the state of American opinion, and constant touch with the permanent correspondents of American newspapers in England. * * * Among other things, we supplied 360 newspapers in the smaller cities of the United States with an English newspaper.

"We advised and stimulated many people to write articles; we utilized the friendly services and assistance of confidential friends; we had reports from important Americans constantly, and established association by personal correspondence with influential and eminent people of every profession in the United States, beginning with university and college presidents, professors and scientific men, and running through all the ranges of the population. * * *

"It is hardly necessary to say that the work was one of extreme difficulty and delicacy."

The propaganda that Parker boasts he was putting over was sixfold:

That the Revolution was a contest between the German George III on one side and the English people and American colonists on the other.

That "many Americans regret the War of 1812 as most Britishers regret the acts of George III."

That "the greatest enemy of American development was Napoleon," but Great Britain saved us from conquest by him.

That it was the British Foreign Minister Canning who gave us the Monroe Doctrine and made it an accepted fact.

That "the British Navy and behind it the Britsh Government has been the best friend that the United States ever had in its history."

And "that next to Great Britain, the best friend the United States has today is Japan."

Ten of our school historians promptly began repeating to American school children these new theories which Sir Gilbert has frankly boasted as his official British propaganda.

When Lord Northcliffe had completed his propaganda organization in this country during the recent World War, and was returning home, it was announced that he was leaving behind him $150,000,000 (our own money, of course) and 10,000 trained agents to carry on the work. His London Times in the issue of July 4, 1919, rendered account of the efficient propaganda which he had inaugurated here and was being "carried out by those trained in the arts of creating public good will and of swaying public opinion toward a definite purpose."

Among the methods, stated by the London Times, to be then in operation or in prospect in this country were:

"Efficiently organized propaganda to mobilize the press, the church, the stage, and the cinema; to press into active service the whole educational system, the universities, public and high schools, and primary schools; to provide for subsidizing the best men to write books and articles. * * * Histories and textbooks upon literature should be revised. New books should be added, particularly in the primary schools. Hundreds of exchange university scholarships should be provided. Local societies should be formed in every center to foster British-American good will, in close cooperation with an administrative committee."

This same Fourth of July issue of the London Times contained a signed article by Owen Wister, American-born, in which he said:

"A movement to correct the schoolbooks of the United States has been started, and it will go on."

George Haven Putnam, a prominent New York book publisher, born in England, and high official in the English-speaking union, made a Fourth of July address in London in 1918 before the Anglo-Saxon Fellowship. In the course of his address Mr. Putnam gave his English conferees this assurance:

"I want to see not a Declaration of Independence, but a Declaration of Interdependence—an acknowledgment that the two peoples belong together."

He also told his audience on that occasion that:

"Textbooks are now being prepared which will present a juster account (in the United States) of the events of 1775–83, 1812–15, and 1861–65."

All this might mean much, or nothing, according to the results. The fact is that we now find a half-score altered textbooks in our schools, in which American history is grossly distorted and de-Americanized, in the interest of British-American union.

In addition to the elaborate and admittedly well-oiled British propaganda machine, established in our country by Sir Gilbert Parker and the late Lord Northcliffe, the output of which still flows steadily through newspaper syndicates, magazines, and motion pictures, there are at least a full dozen of strong propaganda organizations, all British or pro-British, busily at work Briticizing American public opinion.

The stated purposes of these propaganda organizations range all the way from specious cultivation of "more friendly relations between Great Britain and the United States" to fulfillment of the Carnegie prophecy of "the reunited state, the British-American Union" and the Cecil Rhodes design of "the recovery of the United States as an integral part of the British Empire."

The Sons of St. George, an old organization of British-born residents of this country, was Tory during the Revolution and is Tory still. Within the last few years it has emerged from obscurity through a Nation-wide hard drive for increased membership and vigorous assertion of British spirit.

The English-speaking union is made up of British and pro-British advocates of what its name indicates—Anglo-American union. It is an international association of British and pro-British enthusiasts, the object of which is to foster pro-British sentiment throughout the United States by influencing statesmen, authors, lecturers, preachers, editors of magazines, newspapers, and syndicates and school historians to disparage American annals, ideals, traditions, policies, achievements, and institutions and exalt those of Great Britain.

This organization is amply financed from sympathetic sources, and for the last 3 years has been conducting, regardless of expenses, a tremendous drive for membership. Branches have been established in New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Richmond, Buffalo, Cleveland, Chicago, St. Louis, Lincoln, Nebr., and San Francisco.

The English-speaking union issues to its members a magazine, the Landmark, which has bitterly attacked as "demagogic" and "narrow-minded" the popular patriotic protest against Anglicized history textbooks in our public schools.

The American president of the English-speaking union is John W. Davis, a lawyer for J. P. Morgan and the international banking interests.

George W. Wickersham, another Morgan lawyer, is chairman of the American board of directors.

George Haven Putnam, New York publisher, who in 1918 boasted in London that American school histories were being rewritten, is its chief promoter.

Prof. Matthew Page Andrews, of Baltimore, Md., is a director. Professor Andrews is the author of American History and Government, in which he teaches that our Civil War was caused by perfidy and broken promises on the part of President Lincoln.

This hostile theory, as well as the argument, and to a large degree the exact words, appear to have been lifted bodily out of Greg's British History of the United States, which is so bitterly anti-American throughout that it never has been offered for sale in the North.

In his school history, Prof. Matthew Page Andrews teaches:

That Lincoln was called the Slave Hound of Illinois.

That not slavery but the tariff divided the North and South.

That secession was a northern principle.

That slavery was discontinued in the North only for economic reasons.

That most southerners desired and many tried to free their slaves, but northerners would not permit them to do so.

That the condition of the slaves of the South was far better than that of factory workers of the North.

And that, finally, the Emancipation Proclamation was a mere political play and moral pretense, as it could have no possible application except to slaves over which President Lincoln had no jurisdiction.

The English-speaking union, of which this Anglicized historian is a director, and the Morgan lawyers, Davis and Wickersham, are the highest American officials, arranges for special social attentions in England and for the granting of degrees by English universities to American collegiates and historians.

With respect to this phase of English propaganda, Charles Edward Russell, distinguished American diplomat and author, in a statement made at one of my hearings, gave some first-hand information concerning it. Mr. Russell said, in part:

"About 10 years ago I happened to pick up one of these school histories, written by two of the greatest revisionists; and reading it carefully I was astonished to see what changes had been made in the story of the Revolution—how the Revolution was belittled, and also how the history of the War of 1812 had been turned around. It just said that the War of 1812 was a foolish, unnecessary, and insignificant war and the United States regretted having taken part in it.

"In 1918 I was commissioner for the United States Committee on Public Information to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. I was there 5 months in that capacity in their offices in London. My operations in that position brought me in close connection with the interests of the British Government, and I observed many astounding things.

"While I was there in that capacity there came to London one of the authors of this very history that I had read some years ago with so much astonishment. He was a gentleman that in our own country had gotten very little attention. I was surprised to see, the moment he landed, evidently by some preconcerted plan, he was taken possession of. He was interviewed at great length in all the newspapers. He was invited daily to luncheons and dinners. He was lionized socially, and he was taken to Oxford and endowed with the greatest honors that Oxford could pay to anybody, and he was made a figure of very great importance, all based upon the fact that he was a friend of Great Britain. This was his reward apparently for writing such a history.

"Those of us who know the social forms in Great Britain know quite well the very delightful generosity and hospitality of the English homes, and the wise manner in which the English make use of their social advantages. It is only a very natural thing that the author in this country who thinks he has never secured the recognition he deserves at home, goes abroad, and he is immediately swept off his feet."

I asked Mr. Russell whether in order to get that recognition on the other side it was necessary for such author to have first served England in America, and he answered that it was, "except in a case where a man may be useful in future services of this kind."

The present reception to President Butler of Columbia University throughout England, where he is being feasted, toasted, and exalted for his pro-British propaganda, is a striking confirmation of Mr. Russell's statement.

The Sulgrave Institute is another "hands-across-the-sea" organization composed of British and pro-British. The Sulgrave big idea is founded upon the realization that George Washington has loomed large throughout the world and so must be claimed as an Englishman who established in this Western World, English freedom. Like designs are working regarding Lincoln, for whom there is now being provided an English lineage and an English ancestral home, as another shrine where expatriate Americans may bend the sycophantic knee in foolish worship of supposed English influences that are said to have freed our slaves and saved our Union.

The Pilgrim Society, in connection with its manifold other activities, is busily disseminating the doctrine that all American institutions that are good came over in the Mayflower and that the time is near at hand for the Mayflower to reembark its cargo of a mighty nation and return it to the "mother country."

The Church Peace Union has a $2,000,000 Carnegie fund, "to pay the expenses of English and American ministers of note to cross and recross the Atlantic, to occupy famous pulpits, to speak before ministers' meetings and to receive honorary literary degrees at universities." The idea is thus to utilize preachers and pulpits to develop "the international mind."

The World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship Through the Churches has as its stated purpose, "To organize the religious forces of the world so that the weight of all churches and Christians can be brought to bear upon the relations of governments and peoples." The Most Reverend the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury is president, and the Right Honorable Sir William H. Dickinson, K. B. E., London, is the first secretary. This alliance has established local committees in 500 American communities, and it works in close cooperation with the Church Peace Union and its $2,000,000 Carnegie fund.

George W. Wickersham, American chairman of the English-Speaking Union, is also a high official in the World Alliance. A score of eminent American clergymen, always conspicuously demanding American policies in the interest of Great Britain, are directors. Among these are Bishop James Cannon, Dr. James L. Barton, Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin, Dr. Charles E. Jefferson, Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick, Dr. Charles S. McFarland, Dr. Frederick Lynch, Dr. Sidney L. Gulick, and Dr. Hamilton Holt. Every one of these in their preachings and in their zealous pleas to President Harding and Secretary Hughes recently demanded that the American Army and Navy be rushed to the aid of Great Britain at the Dardanelles.

"Peace Union" and "International Friendship," as interpreted by these propaganda organizations, financed with Carnegie funds, have but one purpose, and that is "a reunited state, the British-American Union."

The American Association for International Cooperation has recently started a circularizing campaign to build up an influential membership. Its character, connections, purpose, and financial backing may be surmised from the fact that its chairman, George W. Wickersham, is also chairman of the English-Speaking Union and a high official of the World Alliance.

The Magna Carta Day Association advocates our national observance of June 15, as the natal day of free government, instead of, or at least in eclipse of, the Fourth of July.

The official pronouncement of this association declares:

"Magna Carta is the great outstanding event in the history of world liberty.

"The Magna Carta Day Association seeks to develop a greater sense of unity of thought and purpose of the seven nations.

"It is important to have in mind the essential and actual solidarity of the seven nations—the United States and the six nations of the British Union—Great Britain and Ireland, Newfoundland, Canada, South Africa, Australia, and New Zealand."

As outlined, the purpose of this association is "by means of Magna Carta Study Clubs to encourage the widespread study of the origin and development of our liberties," and "to promote an annual day of commemoration by the seven nations."

If all this means anything at all, it means British-American union.

The British committee at the head of this association consists of Lady Astor, a former American, the Right Reverend J. E. C. Weldon, and the Right Honorable Sir Gilbert Parker, Bart.

The executive secretary and treasurer of the American branch of this Magna Carta Society is J. W. Hamilton, who is a member of the editorial staff of the English-Speaking World, published monthly in New York as the organ of a dozen British propaganda agencies.

Among the American committeemen of the Magna Carta Day Association are more than a score of college presidents, professors, other educators, and preachers, who readily are traced into other British propaganda organizations and as being officially identified with various British services in this country. The name of Prof. Matthew Page Andrews, traducer of Lincoln, stands at the head of the list of American committeemen of this association, and results of the activities and influences of these propaganda organizations may be traced in the Anglicized school histories.

For instance, in the McLaughlin and Van Tyne school history in 1911, there was no mention whatever of Magna Carta. In their revised edition of 1919, however, a full new chapter of 15 pages is devoted to the Magna Carta and very little space is given to the Declaration of Independence.

George E. Roberts, another American committeeman of this society, is vice president and publicity manager of the National City Bank, New York, a director and the propaganda expert of the International Banking Corporation and also, in association with Henry S. Pritchett, president of the $200,000,000 Carnegie Foundation, conducts a correspondence school in economics for executives. This shows the international bankers, the foundations, and the pro-English propagandists pretty closely together, in fact, too closely for the comfort of security of America and the good, plain, honest American.

The British propagandists, besides being supplied with money, may also be supplied with certified associates out of a long list of American college presidents and professors, teachers, preachers, lawyers, and judges, endowed or expecting to be subsidized into sympathy with the Carnegie design of the reunited state, the British-American union.

The National Security League is now sending letters into the Wall Street section, asking for a fund of $25,000 a year, for the special training of school teachers to interpret the United States Constitution in the public schools, and to secure legislation in the various States which will make this teaching compulsory throughout the country.

I do not think that it will be hard for anyone to guess the character of the special training for interpretation of the Constitution, to be provided for with funds from Wall Street. The three eminent attorneys for Wall Street interests whose signatures appear on the letters of appeal for funds decline to disclose this phase.

A hundred and fifty American educators are listed as favorable to this special interpretation movement. More than half of them are found to be members of one or another or several of the British propaganda organizations.

When investigated by a committee of Congress, during the war, the National Security League was found to have $50,000 of Carnegie money. With its funds sufficiently augmented from Wall Street and its large force of British propaganda operatives organized in our colleges and schools, this organization may soon be expected to make the same stealthy assault upon the American Constitution as already has been made upon American school history.

I believe that it is now clearly apparent that the concerted revisions of the 10 offending American school histories did not come by chance coincidence, but as the result of thoroughly organized and heavily financed activities. Also that "the international mind," sought to be established through these influences, is always the British mind.

For any further evidence of the determined purpose to disregard the Declaration of Independence, breed disrespect for the Constitution of the United States and American institutions, and belittle the great men and women responsible for the establishing of the United States of America, one only has to read the address made by Dr. William Allen Nielson, president of Smith College, before the English-Speaking Union, at a dinner at the Hotel Astor, New York City, a few days ago, at which dinner former Ambassador John W. Davis presided and Sir Percy Fitzpatrick and Sir Eustace Finness, Bart., spoke.

After asserting that the world had "gone to pieces, like a broken bowl," and that the English-speaking peoples were the great pieces that remain unbroken, Dr. Nielson said that the difficulties involving the English-speaking peoples were due chiefly to "miseducation." "The histories studied in this country have been getting better and better * * *."

"But the fact must be faced that within the last few years this progress has been checked. There has set in a wave of reaction, and in almost every State of the Union there is going on an agitation for the reintroduction of parochial patriotism into the histories and colleges.

"The scholars of this country, then, ask no support in the pushing of particular views. They ask and all they need is to be let alone, and our watchword in this part of our activity is to leave the writing and the teaching of history to the scholars and demand that the politicians keep their hands off."

The good president of Smith College deplores the fact that there still are men and women in America whose patriotism cannot be purchased with British gold and who insist upon preserving America for those who love and admire America and cherish her traditions and institutions.

To my mind, the gravest menace to the friendship between America and Great Britain lies in the pernicious and persistent British propaganda maintained in the United States, through which not only our history but our financial, industrial, governmental, and political institutions are misrepresented to our people.

That this is not without recognition even in England the following editorial utterance of the New Statesman of London shows:

"Many American people who, from the beginning, have been ardent supporters of the Allies' cause are concerned, not with the eagerness but with the lavish unintelligence of the publicity methods we have adopted. They doubt the wisdom of our elaborate pretense of doing nothing officially, when evidences of an extensive activity are everywhere apparent.

"They suspect the existence of British control of certain American newspapers. They criticize a certain kind of English speaker and journalist. Much of the writing and speaking in behalf of England has been of a kind which would be condemned by anyone possessing a fair knowledge of the American mind and temperament."

The methods thus criticized in England are increasingly put into force throughout America. A vast amount of this propaganda, steadily flowing through our newspapers, magazines, movies, books, lecture platforms, and pulpits, bank and commercial circulars, and countless other channels is unsuspected and fully effective. There can be no doubt in any sane and fair-thinking mind that this propaganda is responsible for the stealthy but concentrated movement to alter and denature American history texts used in our public schools, and thus poison the source of our national pride, inspiration, and morale.

But that is not all. A bold attempt is being made in the light of day to tie up for good the United States with England.

The international bankers, having apparently succeeded in gaining control of certain American Ambassadors, United States Senators, Congressmen, Governors, legislators, judges, political leaders in both major parties, and others high in councils of the Nation, no longer attempt to hide their true purpose of bringing about a British-American union to be controlled by England. Their advocacy of the League of Nations, of the Four Power Treaty, and now of the World Court has, in my opinion, no other meaning than their willingness to subordinate American interests to those of England.

Lord Robert Cecil's recent presence in this country, to spread English propaganda in America in behalf of the League of Nations, although the people in the last Presidential election in no uncertain terms declared themselves against entangling alliances with England or any other foreign country, was the boldest act of a foreigner imaginable.

But what are we to expect of a British subject propagandist, when an American citizen, former President Frank A. Vanderlip of the National City Bank of New York, after a visit with the English bankers abroad, is proposing that instead of the duly elected President and his Cabinet, a council of foreign relations, composed of 25 members elected for a long term of years, and at least 30 percent of them always abroad, should pilot the destinies of this country in relation with foreign governments.

In conclusion, I wish to recall the wise advice of George Washington, the Father of his Country, to the American people, wherein he adjured them to observe good faith and justice toward all nations and cultivate peace and harmony with all, but neither seek nor grant exclusive favors nor preferences to anyone; to constantly keep in view that it is folly for one nation to look for disinterested favors from another, because it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character.

It is my firm conviction that General Washington must have been inspired when, in 1796, he warned the American people that it was easy to foresee "that from different causes and from different quarters, much pain will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in their minds the conviction of the truth."

This prophecy has come to be too true, and only a reawakening of the love for America, her institutions, her ideals, and traditions in the breasts of her citizens, by birth and choice, will save our country from paying with a portion of her independence for the follies and, in many instances, willful un-American acts of some of her high officials and of those who bow to god Mammon or succumb to foreign flattery.

During the hearings before me and since then a number of patriotic societies have adopted resolutions demanding that the use of the hereinbefore-referred-to history textbooks be discontinued. Copies of these resolutions filed with me are hereto attached.

Respectfully submitted.

Commissioner of Accounts.

Peacetime Conscription in America Is a Revolutionary Step in Our Form of Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. RICH

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 7, 1940

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, as a Member of Congress I have been very much interested in doing everything that it is necessary to do and that it is possible to do to have America adequately prepared for any eventuality. I am for the protection of the United States 100 percent against any invading army and will do anything to that end to see that we have adequate preparedness. Furthermore, I am interested in looking after the requirements laid down by the Monroe Doctrine of giving a guiding hand and a helpful attitude in every way possible to all of the North and South American countries.

We Members of Congress have not been informed of any particular reason why we should go to the great extent in becoming a militaristic Nation that we have assumed in the past 60 days. Two years ago all we talked about was a Neutrality Act, of keeping our fingers out of the other fellow's business and remaining neutral. Last year the act was changed, giving the President greater powers. Now the propaganda that is going on in this country, trying to get America into the European war, is the greatest I have ever seen in my life. In my judgment it is not our duty to police the world. It could not be done if we wanted to do it and there is no use in trying to do it. We could lend our good office for peaceful settlement of disputes if possible any place in the world and wherever practical if our peaceful counsel is needed and we are invited to participate. I am trying my best, and will continue to do so, to keep this country out of any European entanglements and certainly out of foreign wars. I will not vote to send our soldiers across the seas. We did that in 1918 to make the world safe for democracy, and we are worse off today than we were previous to that time. We have no business, as I said before, in meddling in the affairs of Europe. Regardless of what my feelings might be toward one country or another, our first line of defense does not hinge on any particular country. With an ocean 3,000 miles wide between here and Europe and 4,000 miles wide between here and Asia and Africa, airplanes and tanks are of no avail. Lindbergh gave us assurances on that from the airmen's standpoint, and we have a right to believe him, and we certainly know that tanks cannot come across the ocean. And to bring an army of 500,000 men and land it in the Western Hemisphere will take more vessels than there are in all Europe and Asia combined; that has been brought out in the testimony before the committees of Congress.

If we start peacetime conscription without giving the volunteers of America at least 4 months' opportunity, we are only becoming a militaristic Nation and I do not believe in that. If you will give the patriotic men of this country an opportunity to jon the Army for 6 months or even 4 months and pay them $30 to $40 a month, with the idea that they only have to enlist for 1 year, you will get more men twice over than we can house, feed, and clothe properly. Then why try to get an Army of 1,000,000 men when you cannot take care of it? Furthermore, our mechanized units and our airplanes will not be sufficient to give them proper training. This has been brought out in the testimony before the Military Affairs Committee as well as in the debates here on the floor of the House. Why peacetime conscription then, I am unable to understand. I do not fear Hitler or any other powers coming over to attack us for 10 years at least, and then I do not expect it. He will have his hands full in policing Europe for years to come. If we go at the building up of our military forces in a sane, sensible, sound way we will be able to take care of any emergency and the waste that is now going on will be very materially decreased.

Let us look at the history of the countries which have started peacetime conscription. Democratic Athens had it and gained a tyrant. The Roman Republic had it and became an empire. Republican France enforced it in 1793 and got Napoleon. Germany practiced it after 1806, and Bismarck followed, then Hitler.

History teaches that peacetime conscription cannot guarantee the defense of a country, but that successful, efficient, peacetime compulsory service means military imperialism for the State and loss of liberty for the citizen. That is the result of peacetime conscription. Do we want that in America? Certainly not. There have been millions and millions of dollars poured into this country trying to scare the American people into getting into this war; I am convinced of that, and if we keep on 6 months longer the way we are going nothing will stop it. And if we get into a war with the present administration at the head of our Government we will be getting into a dictatorship, and I do not want that.

Regardless of what I might have thought of the advisability of trading 50 over-age destroyers to Great Britain for 99-year leases on air bases, to do so without the consent of "the Senate and/or the House of Representatives" is the greatest step in dictatorship that has yet been taken. Why do we want 99-year leases? Do we not expect this country to live beyond the next 99 years? We have had a democracy for 150 years, and I say let us give our children and our children's children the same advantages that we have had by retaining our form of government indefinitely. Why limit our improvements for our protection for only 99 years?

Peacetime conscription, in my judgment, is not necessary from the evidence that has been given before the House in connection with this bill. Even though the Fish amendment giving 60 days' time has been added to the bill, and which I voted for, I am convinced that because of the great pressure brought by the administration this amendment will be quickly thrown out of the window before the conferees of the Senate and the House have finished with the bill, and we will have immediate conscription. As an American citizen and a Member of Congress for American peace and American safety and American independence, I did not support peacetime conscription. I certainly am of the opinion that whenever we conscript the manpower of this Nation we have every right to conscript industry as well.

WE ARE NOT HANDLING OUR WAR PREPAREDNESS IN A BUSINESS WAY

I feel I would be derelict in my duty to my country if I did not at this time call attention to some of the apparent abuses of executive power, to the favoritism displayed and to the gross mismanagement in our rearmament and national defense program.

The failure of steps this Government so far has taken in its defense efforts is generally recognized by military experts. The industrial mobilization plan drafted in 1933, designed to eliminate the waste and graft that occurred in 1917 and 1918, and which had been revised by experts, apparently has been junked for a nebulous plan hastily thrown together by men who have little faith in the ability of constitutional government to function and a free people to defend themselves.

Speaking of today's efforts, Gen. Hugh S. Johnson, on Tuesday, September 3, said:

> The present industrial mobilization, in the sense of relative comparisons with our own past experience, or the present experience of other nations is a miserable failure—a complete flop.
> The reason for that is not that it follows any "old" plan or any kind of "new" plan either—it just doesn't follow any plan at all. The mistakes of bewildered 1917 are being followed and repeated with nauseating regularity and consequently hopeless delay.
> They are being repeated because the President and his administrative family were so fascinated with their habit of "brilliant experimentation" that they don't want anything to interfere with it.
> Above all, they don't want to have any other influence in government; the President wanted to be the central figure in any war effort.

The various spending agencies wanted to roll their own.
The only outside aid they would suffer had to be completely without authority, working in merely an "advisory" capacity.

Mr. Speaker, what will this junking of our industrial mobilization plan probably cost the Nation's taxpayers?

Listen to this, Congressmen.

In 1917 and 1918, we spent a billion dollars for aircraft. Yet not a single fighting plane ever reached the western front.

We spent $60,100,000 on a powder plant at Nitro, W. Va. Not a pound of powder was produced from that plant during the war.

A total of $116,194,974 was spent on four nitrate plants at Muscle Shoals, Ala.; Sheffield, Ala.; Toledo and Cincinnati, Ohio; from none of which a single pound of nitrate was produced during the war.

We spent $264,955,387 for 155-millimeter shells. No shell ever reached the firing line in France. The story could be continued almost endlessly.

All of this waste came from lack of plans. Now the plans that were prepared by experts has been junked, and we are embarked upon the road of experimentation.

Contracts have been let, and when a study of their distribution is made it is apparent that sectional favoritism has been shown. On May 29 of this year, the Wall Street Journal in a feature story said:

Authority to allocate Army contracts and certain Navy contracts on a negotiated-price basis, without competitive bidding is said by officials to be contained in national-defense legislation now pending before Congress.

At the time this item appeared, the President was quoted as saying:

The Government is not now considering the drafting of men, women, or money, but simply trying to spend $1,250,000,000 more than normal.

That statement reminds me of the formula laid down by Harry Hopkins, "Spend and spend and elect and elect." Spending seems to be the keynote of this whole program.

We now find ourselves spending not the $1,250,000,000 mentioned by the President in the last days of May, but over $10,000,000,000 to defend the United States from its illusionary enemies.

And now, only 90 days later, we find the Executive has changed his program and we are about to draft men and conscript industry. If we draft men, we have every right to conscript industry if need be for it.

The "spend and spend and elect and elect" program is getting under way with a full head of steam.

And while the program is getting under way the spending agencies are dispensing propaganda to influence the public.

Frankly, Mr. Speaker, there is something wrong with our defense program. We ought to find out what is wrong now before we waste our money in fruitless experiments.

A study of the reports of various governmental agencies throws considerable light on the present situation. In his annual report to the Secretary of War for 1939 the former Assistant Secretary, Col. Louis Johnson, said:

During the year, in order to gain first-hand information about the activities of my office, as they appear to industrial America, to observe at first, to question, and second, to learn of the problems affecting our allocation plants, Government arsenals, air fields, and airplane factories, I have traveled approximately 100,000 miles by air and 35,000 miles by rail.

To familiarize our citizens with the aims, plans, and definite objectives of my office I have delivered 102 formal and 22 impromptu speeches before industrial, patriotic, military, and social groups.

Where is Mr. Johnson's plan today, and where is Mr. Johnson?

The activities of Mr. Johnson is another example of how the galloping hounds of waste have squandered the taxpayer's money that was appropriated for national defense. Johnson is out and so, too, is Mr. Woodring, who in the same annual report said:

Between March 4, 1933, and June 30, 1938, a powerful striking arm, definitely defensive in purpose—if offensive in tactical and strategic employment—has been instituted in the form of the general headquarters air force.

Within the last few weeks we learn that this powerful striking arm consists at the most of but a few hundred modern fighting and bombing planes.

Mr. Speaker, there was, however, one outstanding statement in this annual report, and that came from the pen of a great soldier, Gen. Malin Craig, then Chief of Staff. In a forthright and soldierly way, the general said:

Military planning is one of the most serious responsibilities that can confront a people or a group of men. The plans deal with the Nation's future, with hundreds of thousands of lives and untold wealth.

They must be coldly and painstakingly considered in the light of intense realism as the basis of all future military strategy and tactics.

Mr. Speaker, those of us who oppose conscription do not believe that this, our present course, our present problem, is one that has been submitted as a result of careful study in the light of intense realism. We do not believe in good faith that the avenues heretofore used in the defense of our country should be lightly cast into the discard. We do not believe the system of voluntary enlistments has failed. We do believe that today a call for a million volunteers for a 1-year course in military training will be quickly met by the manhood of this country. The torch of liberty will never illuminate the world—it never has and never can—in the hands of an unwilling conscript. Freemen alone can successfully defend the Republic and everything it represents.

British Propaganda and Subversion of Textbooks in American Public Schools—C

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1940

EXCERPT FROM REPORT BY DAVID HIRSHFIELD

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and include articles from the report of David Hirshfield relating to books by William Backus Guitteau, director of schools, Toledo, Ohio, and O. H. Ward, Taft School, Watertown, Conn., entitled "Our United States," and "Burke's Speech on Conciliation," respectively.

Mr. Speaker, I have included these articles with my remarks, in order to call the attention of Members of Congress and the parents of our American boys and girls to these changes in our textbooks, as I am sure all patriotic citizens are interested in retaining the true American history in our public schools.

OUR UNITED STATES, 1919—REVISED, 1923

(By William Backus Guitteau, Ph. D., director of schools, Toledo, Ohio)

In the announcement of the 1919 edition of this textbook its publishers stated:

"This book has been written in the light of recent events in which a new atmosphere has been created for the study of our national life.

"The Revolutionary War and subsequent Anglo-American difficulties, hitherto distorted in our schoolbooks as a result of national prejudice, have been restated by Dr. Guitteau. * * *

"Many events involved in the history of our foreign relations, hitherto distorted in our schoolbooks through an unthinking adherence to traditional prejudices, have been restated by Dr. Guitteau in their true light."

Professor Guitteau, in his preface, elaborated upon this promise to correct in our school children the "unthinking adherence to traditional prejudices," as follows:

"The momentous events of the last 5 years have demonstrated conclusively that our history textbooks must be written from a new viewpoint. * * *

"The American Revolution, for example, is no longer to be studied as an isolated event resulting from British injustice. * * *

"So with the War of 1812, which takes on a new aspect when viewed as an incident in the Napoleonic Wars rather than as a British-American contest.

"Throughout this book, therefore, special emphasis has been placed upon the relation of the United States to other countries, in order that the young citizens who study it may realize more fully the importance of our world relations and our world responsibilities. * * *

"In this way an impartial judgment may be passed upon our international relations" (p. V).

Accordingly, throughout this text for the instruction of American school children the long-accepted versions of the treatment of the Colonies by England and the inspiring references and descriptions of our national heroes, ideals, and achievements are eliminated, and matters more in harmony with the "light of recent events," intended to wipe out "unthinking adherence to traditional prejudices," are substituted.

To the credit of Professor Guitteau, it must be said that, like Prof. Everett Barnes, he has seen a new light since my investigation of his history has been made, because in his 1923 edition he has revised his textbook.

I do not wish to be understood as stating that because Professor Guitteau has so completely changed his proclaimed purpose his 1923 revision is wholly free from criticism, for many passages complained against in the 1919 issue have not been corrected in the 1923 book.

The reversal of Professor Guitteau's attitude can only be appreciated through comparison of the two prefaces:

THE 1919 PREFACE

"The momentous events of the last 5 years have demonstrated conclusively that our history textbooks must be written from a new viewpoint. The history of our national life should not be told as a narrative separate and distinct from that of the rest of the world. The American Revolution, for example, is no longer to be studied as an isolated event, resulting from British injustice. On the contrary, it should be placed in its true light as one phase of a larger revolution against kingly usurpation. In this revolt, Englishmen living in the New World played a leading part, encouraged and sustained by the knowledge that their action was approved by many of the foremost British statesmen of the day. So with the War of 1812, which takes on a new aspect when viewed as an incident in the Napoleonic wars, rather than a British-American contest. Throughout this book, therefore, special emphasis has been placed upon the relations of the United States to other countries, in order that the young citizens who study it may realize more fully the importance of our world relations and our world responsibilities. * * *"

THE 1923 PREFACE

"Recent events have demonstrated that our teaching of history should emphasize more than ever before the peculiar and characteristic genius of American institutions, and the permanent and outstanding assets of American democracy. In this textbook the author has kept in view the purpose in present-day teaching of history and government; that is, the preparation of pupils for intelligent, helpful citizenship, through the study of our country's history, its ideals, and institutions. History teaching worthy of the name no longer tolerates the mere recital of facts, dates, and names or the answering of stereotyped questions at the end of the chapter. Rather, our teachers of history will draw from the events of the past their underlying significance; and they will relate the past to the present in such a way as to create in the minds of the pupils high ideals of American citizenship and political conduct, and to foster loyalty to the best American traditions. * * *"

The promptness with which "modern historical scholarship" may shift itself to any attitude required is truly amazing.

In his 1919 edition Professor Guitteau had made no mention of the martyr patriot, Nathan Hale, whose last words on the British scaffold were, "I only regret that I have but one life to give to my country"; but of Major Andre he did say, on page 196:

"The unfortunate young officer was promptly hanged as a spy."

In his new 1923 edition Nathan Hale is reinstated and accorded three-quarters of a page in a picture and appreciative account; while the comment on Major Andre is changed to read:

"He was condemned to death as a spy because of his disguise and the concealed papers."

The fact is also brought out that Nathan Hale was "promptly hanged, without trial, while Major Andre was given a fair trial."

On page 188 of his 1919 text this author was teaching:

"It is estimated that at least one-third of the colonists remained faithful to the King."

In the new book this is changed to read:

"It is estimated that at least one-third of the colonists remained faithful to the King or at least failed to support the Revolution."

Again, on page 273, of his 1919 history, in connection with the War of 1812, Professor Guitteau wrote:

"Apparently our war hawks forgot that upper Canada was settled largely by loyalist refugees from the United States. These loyalists and their children had not forgotten their treatment by the American patriots during the Revolution. They were not likely to ally themselves with the people who had driven them from their homes and confiscated their property."

This remains unchanged in the new book. The New York School Committee condemns this statement in its report, as follows:

"The statement that 'our war hawks' had apparently forgotten that the loyalist refugees had settled upper Canada and that they and their children had not forgotten their mistreatment by the American patriots, and were not likely to ally themselves with those who had driven them from their homes and confiscated their property, is partisan and uncalled for."

Elsewhere in its report, the school committee says of other statements still remaining uncorrected:

"Guitteau's account of the treatment of the loyalists is prejudiced."

For the burning of Washington, Professor Guitteau advances the same justification for the British that is urged in their behalf by the other historians who wrote the American history "in the light of recent events," and that is that:

"The British claimed that their action was justified on account of the burning of York (now Toronto) by the Americans" (p. 280).

This, too, remains unchanged in the 1923 book.

Another stock slander of the "new atmosphere" history writers with "newer tendencies," which Professor Guitteau had repeated on page 242 of his 1919 text, was:

"Hamilton distrusted the masses, and once exclaimed at a public dinner 'Your people, sir, is a great beast!' "

Whether or not Hamilton made use of that expression, it is of no educational value, and its repetition can have only one purpose. While it is conceded that Hamilton lacked confidence in the masses, it is unfair to single out this weakest point in an eminent character and stress it in a history which fails to give him adequate credit for his invaluable services to our country.

Professor Guitteau must have recognized the justness of the complaint, because in his 1923 text he omits the offensive passage and refers to Alexander Hamilton as having been:

"Brilliant in intellect and a genius in finance."

Of Benedict Arnold, Professor Guitteau, in his 1919 history, said, on page 195:

"Unfortunately, Congress was slow to recognize his services, while promoting other officers far less deserving.

"However, Congress failed to give him the promotion to which he believed himself entitled, and this injured his pride."

I am sure that no one will for one moment urge that either version was an excuse for treason.

Of President Jackson, Professor Guitteau, on page 327 of his 1919 text, and left in his 1923 book, said:

"He could not spell correctly or write good English."

A letter concerning the dangerous power of the Bank of the United States, written in President Jackson's own hand, has recently been discovered and is now in the Library of Congress. This letter reads in part:

"A corporation of individuals deriving its powers from Congress, pervading every section of the Union, will in the general, by controlling the currency and leading men of the country, be more powerful than the Government and may seriously thwart its views and embarrass its operation. This is one of the dangers of the present bank. But any substitute which should concentrate the same or a like power, and be put entirely under control of the General Government, might by the union of the political and money power give the administration of the Government more influence and the Government itself more strength than is compatible with the safety of the States, the liberties of the people, and the purity of our republican institutions."

Here is spelling correct enough and English good enough for any language purist, clearly expressing political sentiment good enough for any American patriot of any period.

Of Washington, too, some revisionists teach that he could not spell. However, he, too, managed to express himself and wrote "liberty" and "democracy" correctly and plainly enough to be read into the language of every civilized people of the world.

A description of Lincoln which Professor Guitteau still presents to school children in his latest edition, is as follows:

"Tall, gaunt, and awkward, wearing ill-fitting clothes, his voice high and shrill, his dark, wrinkled face clouded by a look of habitual melancholy, Lincoln suffered in comparison with his brilliant adversary" (p. 393).

Professor Guitteau in his latest text devotes pages 618 and 620 to argument in favor of the League of Nations. This, I am told, is a distinct violation of one of the first principles of ethics of the teaching profession. The League of Nations is still a subject of political partisan contention and will be an issue in some form or other in the coming Presidential campaign. I am of the opinion that no unsettled political question should be taught in the public schools from a partisan viewpoint. If any controversial matter is to be treated, it should be by a presentation of the facts on both sides, impartially.

BURKE'S SPEECH ON CONCILIATION—1919

(Edited by O. H. Ward, Taft School, Watertown, Conn.)

This text is proclaimed to be in its preface and introduction a new portrayal of the forces for freedom in the period of the American Revolution.

The author of this work announces that:

"Never did a school classic carry such a present-day message or furnish so definite an answer to a national demand."

This must be taken in reference not to Burke's part of the book, for that has been a fixed classic for nearly 150 years, but to Professor Ward's portion, which he says has been written directly in view of "the common peril of 1914."

In the preface of this textbook the author proceeds to speak of himself as follows:

"I feel touched and grieved because editors have never given so much as an inkling of the vital fact. * * * It needed only the common peril of 1914 to show both countries how deep was our mutual desire for English freedom."

And refers to our "emotions of new-found gratitude to England."

Apparently the worthy professor's emotions of his boyhood have undergone a change, and he set out to rewrite the American history to conform to his new emotion, that is, to revamp old facts to fit new ideas.

As forces for freedom, innumerable theories of liberty, and rights applicable to America, as discussed by Englishmen, are given in this book, but not a word is said of the great American patriotic speeches, the Colonial Declarations of Rights, or even the Declaration of Independence.

Indeed, Professor Ward frankly declares it as his opinion that:

"An understanding can be gained only by reading what typical Englishmen said while the American Revolution was being fomented."

Among the advocates of American freedom more than a score of Englishmen are copiously quoted, but the names of Jefferson, Hancock, Adams, Otis, and Paine are omitted. Among the forces for liberty repeatedly mentioned are Henry III and Henry VIII, but never Patrick Henry.

From a study of Professor Ward's part of this book it would never be suspected that the American Revolution marked an epoch in the advance of liberty. According to this author, the main current of democracy was steadily flowing in the channel of the British Constitution, and is flowing there still.

Professor Ward says further in his preface:

"As long as there lurks in the back of the American consciousness a suspicion of English tyranny in 1775, so long will misunderstanding prevent the English-speaking nations from working in accord to develop Anglo-Saxon freedom."

Of the American objection to "taxation without representation," which the colonists resisted with arms, the professor teaches that England "was in financial straits and needed revenue. A very natural way of adding to her income was to tax the colonies. "This purpose was quite honest."

That the Stamp Act "measures were normal methods of finance and were passed with few dissenting votes. Few people in England suspected that there was anything momentous about the Stamp Act."

Of the tax on tea, Professor Ward says:

"The one duty retained was so slight that tea could be bought cheaper in America than in England."

He omits, however, to state that this small tax involved a great principle.

Rare ingenuity is shown by Professor Ward in stating historical facts to fit his purpose. After establishing to his satisfaction that England was blessed with a high degree of freedom which the colonists gladly shared, that there was no oppression in the Stamp Act, or in the tax on tea, and that there was no tyranny at all, nor even any just "suspicion of tyranny," the Professor says:

"What has brought about this disastrous change? The German king of England, George III.

"The American Revolution was not an attempt of England to tyrannize over her colonies, but was a quarrel fomented by a Hanoverian king as part of his program of despotic ambition."—Page 3.

Professor Ward in seeking to excuse the English for the uprising of the colonies, endeavors to transform the English king into a German.

Macaulay, the great English historian, in writing of George III, said:

"The young king was a born Englishman. All his tastes and habits, good and bad, were English."

George III, in his first speech in Parliament, said of himself:

"Born and educated in this country (England), I glory in the name of Briton."

Professor Ward blunderingly mentions the English historian Lecky as his authority on George III. He must have meant Trevelyan, revised, 1917. What Lecky said of George III, on his accession to the throne, is this:

"The new sovereign came to the throne amid an enthusiasm such as England had hardly seen since Charles II restored the monarchy. By the common consent of all parties the dynastic contest was regarded as closed, and after two generations of foreign and unsympathetic rulers, the nation, which has always been peculiarly intolerant of strangers, accepted with delight an English king."

Professor Ward concedes that George III was not the first "German king of England," but neglects to remark that neither was he the last. As a matter of fact, George III was no more a "German" king of England than is the present King George V. George III was no more German than the former Kaiser Wilhelm is English.

However, having settled to his own satisfaction that King George was a German, author Ward sums up the subject as follows:

"So the American Revolution was a contest between German tyranny and English freedom, although neither party in the struggle knew that this was the issue. After war has been declared people cannot examine causes; they have to fight" (pp. 36–37).

What the lineage of the king may have had to do with it all, is perhaps not a matter properly to be imposed upon the minds of school children whom he endeavors to impress with the idea that the fathers of our country did not know what they were fighting about; that they were not oppressed; that their protests and declarations were tissues of falsehood; that our Nation was founded in blunder and is perpetuated in error; and that we have groped in darkness and ignorance for a century and a half, until given the great light through Professor Ward's "emotions of new-found gratitude to England."

As a matter of fact, what difference did it make, so far as American history is concerned, whether George III was a German or an Englishman? All the laws of oppression which the colonists complained of and finally rebelled against were enacted by the English Parliament in London, and no one will dispute that the members of Parliament were all Englishmen and represented English thought, English sentiment, and the desires of the English people.

The following passage, in the first page of the preface of Ward's book, sounds distinctively like wartime British propaganda:

"Not until the younger generation has learned to distinguish between the English freedom of 1775 and the slavery that they may have from Prussia, will America return to that unsuspecting confidence in the mother country which is vital to the future progress of democracy throughout the world."

I am told that it has been charged, and not denied, that the preface and introduction to this Ward's history were not written in 1919, the year of its publication, but during the feverous British war propaganda period of 2 or more years before, and that the manuscript was actually prepared in a propaganda factory of England; and it may well be argued that in writing of Gen. George Washington in his 1919 edition:

"If you had called him an 'American' he would have thought you were using a kind of nickname. He and his fellow colonists were proud that they were Englishmen; they gladly and loyally served an English king because he represented the freedom without which they thought life not worth living" (pp. 9–10).

Professor Ward, if not intentionally, as a matter of fact did aid pro-English propaganda in America.

For "some of the best descriptions of the nature of the American Revolution" Professor Ward does not refer the student to Bancroft, Hildreth, Lossing, or any other standard American authorities, but only to the English historians, Trevelyan, Green, and Lecky, and to the British Dictionary of National Biography, the Encyclopedia Britannica and the Parliamentary History—all British.

Congress Must Not Adjourn Now

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BERNARD J. GEHRMANN

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1940

Mr. GEHRMANN. Mr. Speaker, there is talk about Congress adjourning in a couple of weeks, or as soon as some of the important pending legislation is disposed of. I feel certain that the vast majority of the people in my district feel very strongly that this is no time to run out on them.

All of us are anxiously watching the progress by the most ruthless dictator, Adolf Hitler, and his other allies in their desperate attempt to subdue and smash London and the English Isles from the air so that he may land his forces there and take possession. England is not as easy to conquer as some of the other countries, including France, were, because their love for democracy is evidently too deep-rooted to permit of many Englishmen turning traitor to their country. I feel confident that these ruthless dictators have found their match, and that they will soon see their mistake and stop this terrible slaughter of innocent human lives.

But there is the danger that events may turn against England, and that their Government might be forced to flee to Canada.

I do not believe that the English Fleet would ever surrender, but would also seek refuge in the North Atlantic. But if the worst should come, and a part of the English Fleet fell into the hands of the dictators then the war might be brought to this continent. I do not believe that with those possibilities confronting us, that Congress should adjourn and run out on the people simply because it is election time.

I, for one, will vote against recess or adjournment as long as conditions in Europe are in this uncertain state.

I realize that those of us who have opponents would like to be back home to answer some of the charges and accusations either false or true that are bound to be made in the heat of a campaign. But the people have elected us to represent them, and certainly we could not blame them very much if they ran out on us on election day if we desert them in this time of danger. My duty compels me to do what I am elected to do first, and look after my own interest when that is done. The welfare of our country is far greater and more important than my reelection. I will trust my people to be the judge and do what they feel is best for our country.

Labor Offered Life or Death in the Choice of Roosevelt or Willkie

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HAMPTON P. FULMER
OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 10, 1940

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting an editorial carried in the State Paper, a South Carolina daily, quoting Woodruff Randolph, editor and publisher of the Typographical Journal, wherein this editor states:

Organized labor is being offered life or death in the choice of Roosevelt or Willkie.

This is a very timely editorial, and I am sure will be read with a great deal of interest by the readers of the RECORD.

In the next place, if there are any labor groups or any individual wage earners or organized laborers of this country who have not made up their minds as to their choice between life or death as applied to their economic welfare, they should read this item and think seriously before casting their vote on the 5th of November.

AS THEY ARE SAYING TODAY—WOODRUFF RANDOLPH, EDITOR AND PUBLISHER, THE TYPOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL

Organized labor is being offered life or death in the choice of Roosevelt or Willkie. There is no doubt about it. The past performances and the mental attitude of Roosevelt means life more abundantly while the past performances and mental attitude of Willkie means death to the hopes of the millions who yet seek the benefits of collective bargaining and retrogression until death of many unions now organized.

Those are strong words and, of course, need substantiation. Refer again to Roosevelt's first fireside chat of 1936:

"Labor Day symbolizes our determination to achieve an economic freedom for the average man which will give his political freedom reality."

That is an ever-living statement, but one that causes gnashing of teeth of those economic royalists whose every effort and unlimited dollars have been directed toward preventing the average man from organizing so as to get a start toward an economic freedom.

Roosevelt gave you the National Labor Relations Act (Wagner Act) to give legal protection to the already long-established right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of the union's own choosing. Administration of the act has been remarkably fair.

Willkie is the candidate of and has been the highly paid representative of those economic royalists who have opposed organization at every turn. His party is demanding amendment of the National Labor Relations Act. These objectors want the old and efficient intimidation and terrorism again in their hands to prevent organization of workers. Roosevelt promised to help labor achieve its legitimate and proper purposes. He made good on his promise. Willkie promises to give labor "amendments" and will make good his promise. Destructive amendments have already been introduced in the Congress.

Both are honorable men who believe in the things they advocate. They are symbols of two conflicting theories as to who should rule the country. Roosevelt believes in the people—in seeking, through their elected representatives, proper regulation and restraints in the interests of all the people. Willkie believes (as the leader of the Republicans must) that the business interests of the country are paramount and that legislators must look only to the dictates of businessmen (employers) for advice as to what is good for the country. That is the old deal—the Republican deal—illustrated by the tin dinner pail and square paper hat atop overalls and square shoes as a symbol of the American workman.

Roosevelt's New Deal introduced other principles of government for which Willkie's old deal will never forgive him. The New Deal promised that American citizens would not be permitted to starve because the old deal had allowed or compelled complete collapse of our financial and industrial enterprises. The old deal had always disclaimed national responsibility and "passed the buck" to the States and charity. The New Deal realized such a course was impossible and with Government spending saved the people, and business interests as well. Another principle the New Deal established as the law of the land was that the Nation had a right to legislate maximum hours of work and minimum wages for workers engaged in products of interstate commerce. Willkie's old deal frothed at the mouth over this and made every effort to kill any such legislation.

Old-deal lawyers (en masse) even stepped over all bounds of ethics and decency when they attempted to decide unconstitutionality of New Deal legislation before the Supreme Court had ruled thereon. The Court finally ruled it was constitutional.

The Social Security Act was one more New Deal law which is unforgivable by the old deal. This national law of so much importance to the people may go the way of other New Deal legislation if the old deal again gets power. The old deal has not given up its aims and purposes. It has not yet recognized the Wagner Act and is fighting it at every opportunity.

The old deal screams at the billions of dollars spent on behalf of the farmers and therefore can only be expected to revert to the old-deal policy of letting the farmer starve if he couldn't get a break from the speculators who gambled on the results of the farmer's labor.

The old deal represents profits first, last, and all the time, and "the public be damned." It represents "big business" as a supergovernment bullying our legislators—and delegates to the Republican convention.

The old deal is criticizing Roosevelt for not spending billions on defense sooner, forgetting that Borah, the Republican chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, publicly stated his opinion there would be no war in Europe.

The New Deal demonstrated its interest in the people and proved it can work in their behalf. Do not let the old deal sidetrack the real issue by bellyaching about a third term. It is plain from votes of the people in all States where his name appeared that the people want Roosevelt for a third term to continue the work yet to be done.

RALPH INGERSOLL IN PM

The obvious argument for Mr. Roosevelt is that while the country has run up the bill for his mistakes, it has yet to cash in on his more constructive policies, to reap the real benefit from such programs as rural resettlement, the T. V. A. empire, the dams and ditches that the W. P. A. has labored on, the long-term benefits of social security. We have sat through a confusion of shorts and news reels. We might as well stay for the main picture.

That's the obvious argument, but not necessarily the best.

The Roosevelt conception of a socially conscious Federal Government, bargaining as an equal with the practical producers of the country—the manufacturers and the industrialists and the money men—has failed dismally in the encouragement of production and the creation of employment. It has failed because industrialists and manufacturers and money men have not played ball. You can say Mr. Roosevelt made it impossible for them to play or that they just didn't want to. But either way, they didn't.

Mr. Willkie testifies to this when he points out the huge reserves of unused capital in this country. You can say the industrialists are logical or illogical, right or wrong, but the fact is the show hasn't come off. Under New Deal rule the capital hasn't been invested, production hasn't expanded, and people haven't been employed.

So, the best argument for continuing the New Deal is the hope that when the industrialists lose their third election in 12 years they will finally get it through their heads that times have changed. There will be no talk, as there was in 1936, of leaving the country if "that man" gets elected. Because now, there's no place else to go. The choice will be put up fair and square: learn to live by and with this kind of Federal administration, which presumes a public interest not only in how industry's profits are spent, but in the wages and working conditions of its employees—or perish. Perish slowly by having their money taxed away and handed out by politicians, or fight, in a revolution in which they try their strength against the Government. But perish either way.

Mr. Speaker, I am also inserting a short editorial entitled "The Historical Roosevelt."

It is my firm belief that if Mr. Roosevelt is permitted to continue as President of the United States for a third term, which he is clearly entitled to serve because of his past accomplishments and experience and because of the present emergency, it is my belief, as stated, that history will record this outstanding American citizen next in line with the Father of his Country, George Washington.

We will hear much in this campaign from the so-called Jeffersonian Democrats, big business, stand-pat Republicans, the haters of Roosevelt—who represents the great masses of the people—about a third term.

The following statement, taken from a letter written by George Washington to Marquis de Lafayette April 28, 1788, should unquestionably overcome the efforts of the people to whom I have just referred in trying to muddy the water with a campaign issue which should, because of the splendid record of President Roosevelt and the serious present emergency, not be a factor in the campaign.

Listen to the Father of his Country:

Under an extended view of this part of the subject—

He was writing about a third term—

I can see no propriety in precluding ourselves from the services of any man who on some great emergency shall be deemed universally capable of serving the public.

I predict for President Roosevelt and the Democratic Party the greatest victory on November 5 ever in the history of this party.

THE HISTORICAL ROOSEVELT

Week by week, for better or for worse, the Roosevelt name becomes more important in American history and in world history. No one can foresee all that will happen as a result of his extension of the Monroe Doctrine, of his defensive arrangements with Canada, of his leasing of naval and air bases from Great Britain.

No one can foretell which philosophy will win in the present terrific wrestling between democracy and forces that scorn democracy. But if democratic political philosophy wins—we pray that it will—the Franklin D. Roosevelt figure may stand out before the Nation even as the Statue of Liberty stands out in New York Harbor. Today, President Roosevelt is more than a man: he is a symbol; and if what he stands for is victorious, he is likely to remain a symbol.

Of course, this is speculative. No one—certainly not this one—can appraise for all time a contemporary, or assess with certainty contemporary activities. Yet there is strong evidence the Roosevelt name will be a big name in history. He represents, dynamically, a political philosophy, and applies it when he can. He is bold. He stretches executive authority (the destroyer deal, for example) as did Jefferson, Lincoln, and other great Presidents who found themselves confronting dangerous crises. He foresaw the character of the Nazi revolution before other leaders did, and he realized the fight is one that cannot be settled by compromise. He trusts the common people, as have other Presidents now rated great. And he is hated. Other Presidents of unusual ability and usefulness also were hated by social and economic groups roughly comparable to the groups that dislike Roosevelt. (This comment is not meant to apply to any individual in any group.)

Federal-Aid Highway Programs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILBURN CARTWRIGHT
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 10, 1940

LETTER OF HON. WILBURN CARTWRIGHT, OF OKLAHOMA, TO GOVERNOR PHILLIPS

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and include a letter I wrote last week to the Governor of Oklahoma.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMITTEE ON ROADS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., September 2, 1940.

Hon. LEON C. PHILLIPS,
Governor of Oklahoma, Oklahoma City, Okla.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR PHILLIPS: I was surprised and greatly disappointed that any Governor of a great State, and particularly of my own great State, would use the profane, abusive, and unjustified language you did to me in our long-distance telephone conversation last Wednesday.

Among other things you said:

"I notice by the papers that you say our highway program was political. What did you say it for? Which road is political? You are just a ——— ——— liar! You don't care anything about Oklahoma. You don't care anything about your district. That bunch of ——— ——— liars up there told you to say that. Just a bunch of ——— ——— liars. Who told you to say that was political? Did Carmody? I want you to tell me which one is a political road. You haven't got the guts. I am taking this down; I want the people down here to know just what kind of a man they have up there. You joined in with that gang up there and said this road program is political. Now, which road is political? What did you say it for? You have accused me of it! Which road is political? I am going down in your district and tell them what kind of a ——— ——— liar you are. Now have enough guts to tell the truth. Where did you see the program? When did you see it? You are a sneaking liar. You don't care anything for Oklahoma. You don't care anything for your district. You must be afraid of Carmody. Who let you see it? Now you just admit you are either ignorant or a ——— ——— liar. You took a turn at me through the newspapers, thinking you could get away with it. What did you do it for? When did you get the idea that it was political? Did Carmody tell you to say it was? Oh, you said it on your own—well, thank you."

Governor, it doesn't take a brave man to call another ugly names over the telephone from a distance of more than a thousand miles. Of course, that is a game that two can play. But I have been taught from childhood that gentlemen should behave like gentlemen, even when dealing with others who do not.

I think it is better to call a man's bluff than to call him names.

I did say that your proposed 1941 Federal-aid highway program was political, and I challenge you to spot those 28 proposed projects on a State highway map and justify them to the people of Oklahoma on any other basis.

I have delayed writing to you until I could see the newspapers from Oklahoma and see what I had been quoted as saying about your proposed highway program which could have brought forth such an outburst from you.

Somewhat to my surprise, in view of your angry explosion, I find that the reports in all the papers I have seen are fairly accurate and present the situation about as it is. Several editors and reporters outspokenly agree with me that political considerations evidently played a big part in making up the program submitted by your State highway commission. It must have been the truth that hurt.

Apparently you just saw a newspaper headline and jumped at the conclusion that I was in some way responsible for your proposed program not being approved by Public Roads Administration officials.

I am writing this on Labor Day, near the end of August and the first of September, and am reminded of the little dog named August. August was always jumping at conclusions. One day a big 4-year-old mule came by and August ran out and jumped at the mule's conclusion. The next day was the first of September, because that was the last of August.

At the very moment you became Governor you jumped at a conclusion, went off half-cocked, and devoted half of your inaugural address to ill-founded condemnation of the Durant-Denison Dam on Red River, a strictly Federal $50,000,000 flood-control and hydroelectric power project in my district that I have worked for for years. In spite of all your efforts to stop it, thousands of men are at work now day and night on this dam and reservoir, the greatest public development in the history of Oklahoma.

Later, apparently jumping at another conclusion and again going off half-cocked, you called out the National Guard to stop construction of another hydroelectric power project by your own State Grand River Dam authority, and thus made yourself the laughingstock of the Nation.

Then you seem to have jumped at the conclusion that by delaying construction of much-needed roads in the Grand River Dam area you could force the Federal Government to dismiss an injunction suit which has no relation to roads and over which roads officials have no jurisdiction.

By these delays you have thus far succeeded only in adding greatly to the costs of construction.

As a legislative official, of course, I don't have anything to do with the submission or approval of Federal-aid highway projects, but naturally I am interested in road improvements in my State and took advantage of the first opportunity to look over your proposed program.

Your attitude toward the Federal Government and certain Federal officials is unjustified and very unfortunate for the State of Oklahoma.

So that you may know the real facts, I am glad to tell you that no administrative official, in Washington or elsewhere, asked or suggested that I say anything with reference to highway programs or projects in Oklahoma, and I have made no planned or prepared statement. Last week, after your proposed program had already been made public in Oklahoma, an Oklahoma newspaperman casually asked me what I thought about it. I had seen a copy of it and gave him, offhand, my impressions. He asked me if I thought any of the proposed projects were political, and I said that I did. Evidently he thought they were, and I haven't heard of anybody who doesn't. Have you?

As to Federal Works Administrator Carmody, it happens that I haven't seen him or talked with him about anything for several weeks, and I have never at any time discussed Oklahoma road programs or projects with him. Frankly, I doubt that he knows that you have submitted a program. And if Mr. Carmody wanted something said about anything, he is the kind of man who would say it himself.

It seems hard for you to realize, Governor, that public business can be and often is conducted without personal spite or political motives entering into it.

Something that you, and apparently some members of your State highway commission, need to learn is that the Federal-aid highway program, since the original Federal Aid Act was passed in July 1916, has been kept on a very high plane, remarkably free from partisanship, politics, or favoritism of any kind. Every employee of the Public Roads Administration (formerly Bureau of Public Roads) is under civil service, including the Commissioner of Public Roads, who has served under five Presidents; and there has never been a scandal or a serious charge of inefficiency or maladministration against this agency, which has expended billions to aid in building better roads in the United States.

The main difficulty your proposed Federal-aid program met was its failure to include any improvement on any of the 625 miles of highways in our State which are designated by the War Department as of primary military importance.

And on the 435 miles of class 2 military roads throughout Oklahoma there are only 2 projects, out of a total of 28, or less than 6 percent of a $5,000,000 program. It may be just a coincidence that both of these projects are near Okemah, one on either side of the Governor's home town.

For your information, the Hayden-Cartwright Act of 1940 authorizes the Commissioner of Public Roads, "in approving Federal-aid projects to be carried out with any unobligated funds apportioned to any State," to "give priority of approval to and expedite the construction of projects that are recommended by the appropriate Federal defense agency as important to the national defense."

I had the "guts" to help make this law, applying to our State and every State. And I have the "guts" to urge, if necessary, that it be observed and enforced in my State when Federal-aid funds are involved. I believe that an overwhelming majority of the people of Oklahoma, in all parties and all sections, are in favor of at least the Federal highway funds apportioned to our State being used at this critical time on highways that are most important for national defense.

I noticed the papers quoted you last week as saying that you did not know until after the 1941 Federal-aid program was submitted that there was a designated system of roads specially important for national defense. I am sure, though, that members of the Oklahoma Highway Commission did know, because I saw them at the annual meeting of the American Association of State Highway Officials in Richmond, Va., in October 1939, when a special highway map of the War Department was on display, and I know that detailed information about highways of military importance has been available to all State highway officials at least since that time.

You may be interested to know also that on June 3, 1940, the President of the American Association of State Highway Officials sent the following telegram to the President of the United States, from Chicago, where the association's executive committee was meeting:

"Hon. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
"President of the United States,
"The White House, Washington, D. C.:

"The American Association of State Highway Officials hereby tenders the full services and facilities of its membership for any services we can render in any capacity and on any undertaking in the present emergency.

"The State highway departments have highly trained technical and mechanical staffs located in each of the 48 States. We have available large quantities of construction and maintenance equipment. Following the precedent established in 1917 and 1918 we again offer our services.

"HENRY F. CABELL, President.

"By order of the executive committee."

On the following day I placed that message in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD under the heading, "Highway officials offer services in emergency."

I assumed, of course, that it represented the sentiment of highway officials of my own State as well as of such officials in the other States of the Nation, and I still hope and believe that other considerations will not be permitted to prevent the preparation and submission by the State of Oklahoma of a Federal-aid highway program, including improvements most important from a national-defense standpoint, now that this oversight in the preparation of the program you originally proposed has been called to your attention by public-roads officials.

I am sure that the Federal Government is not trying to take away from the State its authority to initiate and submit projects eligible for Federal aid. And I hope that you will yet realize that Federal funds pay considerably more than half the cost of all Federal-aid highway projects in our State, so that this aid is really quite substantial.

The Federal requirements are reasonable, in the public interest, and apply uniformly to all the States. Of course, it is optional with the people of each State whether or not they take advantage of the Federal-aid funds made available to them for highway improvements, under legislation which for years I have introduced and sponsored.

In this connection, out of my ignorance about highway matters, let me call your attention also to the fact that the Federal Highway Act of 1921 provides that "in approving projects to receive Federal aid under the provisions of this act preference shall be given to such projects as will expedite the completion of an adequate and connected system of highways interstate in character." Can you honestly say that all the projects submitted in your recent proposed Federal-aid program meet even this fundamental requirement of the basic Federal highway law? This original purpose of Federal aid has now been extended by the newest Hayden-Cartwright Act to place special emphasis on "adequate," "connected," "interstate" roads "important to the national defense."

You say that I don't care anything about Oklahoma and have never done anything for our State. It just happens that on the very day you called me and denounced me so furiously last week I secured final passage by the Congress of a bill I introduced early in this session which makes available to Oklahoma about $6,500,000 for construction of roads and highways in the fiscal years 1942 and 1943, the first apportionments to be made and become available on December 31 this year. This sum includes $4,646,000 for regular Federal aid; $814,000 for secondary, feeder, and farm-to-market roads, including rural mail and school-bus routes; $914,000 for elimination and protection of railroad grade crossings; and smaller amounts for public land roads, Indian roads, and forest highways and trails. More than $1,000,000 of this amount will not require matching with State funds. Incidentally, I secured the first authorization of Federal funds for building rural secondary roads, in the Hayden-Cartwright Act of 1936.

I believe many good citizens of Oklahoma appreciate, if you do not, the fact that I introduced and secured passage of legislation directing that continuous highway-planning surveys be made in every State. This has resulted in official data and factual information being assembled, available to State highway officials and the Public Roads Administration, showing impartially where road improvements are most needed, and providing a basis for fair and judicious expenditure of available road-improvement funds. In most States highway officials welcome the opportunity to plan their construction programs in accordance with the findings of accurate traffic surveys and scientific studies of road uses, rather than on personal and political influences, and this policy is receiving general public approval and support. My understanding is that one of the objections of Public Roads Administration officials was that your recently proposed Federal-aid program apparently did not attempt to serve the State's most urgent road improvement needs as shown by traffic counts and planning survey factual data.

I was glad to hear you say that you are going down in my congressional district and talk with the people. They probably won't care what you say about me, for most of them knew me before they ever heard of you. But they will be greatly interested if you will explain and justify your "nonpolitical" highway programs, and tell them, for example, just why out of a total of $2,671,591 Federal-aid highway funds apportioned to our State, you proposed to expend less than $100,000, and less than 4 percent, in the 11 counties in the Third Congressional District. There are 8 congressional districts in Oklahoma, and if the Third District received one-eighth of the funds programmed it would amount to 12.5 percent of the total. My district contains one-seventh of the 77 counties of the State. One-seventh of the program would amount to more than 14 percent of the total.

Of the total of about 275 miles of highway you proposed to build or improve with the aid of Federal funds, about 8 miles, or about 3 percent, are in the Third Congressional District. This is about one-thirty-fourth of the total mileage you proposed to improve, for approximately one-seventh of the State, which has close to 1,000 miles of roads under the jurisdiction of the State highway commission, and about 150 miles of highway of class 1 military importance, with many deficiencies. I know the people of southeastern Oklahoma will be glad to have an opportunity to discuss things like this with you.

Governor, I don't know why you want to be antagonistic to my part of the State, or why you seem to delight to attack me personally at every opportunity. It may be because I don't "cuss" loudly or recklessly, or because I don't react very well to bullying tactics. But I have tried to cooperate with you and your administration in every reasonable way, and have never done anything to try to injure or embarrass you. I am sorry that you seem to want to continually take a belligerent and antagonistic attitude toward me, for no good reason.

I repeat that I am shocked and shamed that a Governor of my State will go into profane tirades unjustifiably as you did in your 'phone conversation with me last week. And I think you ought to be ashamed of yourself.

Very sincerely yours,

WILBURN CARTWRIGHT.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. THORKELSON
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 10, 1940

EXCERPT FROM REPORT BY DAVID HIRSHFIELD

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and include an article from the report of David Hirshfield, relating to a book by Albert Bushnell Hart, LL. D., Professor of Government, Harvard University, entitled "School History of the United States."

Mr. Speaker, I have included these articles with my remarks in order to call the attention of Members of Congress and the parents of our American boys and girls to these changes in our textbooks, as I am sure all patriotic citizens are interested in retaining the true American history in our public schools.

SCHOOL HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES—REVISED, 1920

(By Albert Bushnell Hart, LL. D., professor of government, Harvard University)

This book is said to be among the history texts most extensively in use throughout the United States, and it is one of those most seriously complained against.

"Why should a new school history of the United States be written?"

This is a pertinent query. Professor Hart has recognized it as such; he has asked himself that question in the opening sentence of his preface, and answers it as follows:

"Chiefly to put at the disposition of the upper grades a book embodying a broadly national point of view and presenting adequate treatment of certain topics which hitherto have been too little stressed in the study of American history.

"The European background of our history is clearly sketched, with due recognition of our inheritance of language, law, and political methods from England. Due attention is also paid to other influences from overseas."

The objection to Professor Hart's book is that in it he has given entirely too much attention to the influences from overseas and very little to American influences.

In Professor Hart's "certain topics which hitherto have been too little stressed" appears such as these:

"The colonists liked to think of themselves as part of the British Empire. * * * They were proud of being Britons. * * * They were as well off as any other people in the world" (p. 120).

"The colonists were not desperately oppressed. They enjoyed more freedom and self-government than the people in England" (p. 126).

"The real reason for the Revolution was that, since the people were more used to free government than the English at home, they looked upon every effort of Parliament to tax them as an effort to deprive them of part of their freedom" (p. 126).

"Thousands of good people sincerely loved Great Britain and were loyal to King George. * * * The loyalists were harshly put down" (p. 145).

During the height of the official British propaganda campaign in this country, in 1916–17, designed to draw us into the World War, Professor Hart, in his New American History, edition of 1917, was teaching of the colonists that:

"They professed and doubtless felt the warmest attachment to the King, whom God and Parliament had provided for them. * * *

"The great reason for the division of the British Empire into two parts seems to be that the colonists were so free and did so many things for themselves that they could not see why they should not be relieved from almost all restraints" (p. 126).

The worthy professor seemed to overlook the fact that the real reasons for the Revolution were clearly set forth by the colonists themselves in the Declaration of Independence, and that to the remedy of these grievances and to the cause of liberty they pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor.

Although writing 145 years after the signing of the Declaration of Independence, Professor Hart and his "modern" contemporaries claim that because of their advantages of "modern historical scholarship," of "the newer tendencies in historical writing," and of "other influences from overseas," they are in a better position to know the conditions of the colonists and the causes which led to the War of the Rebellion than were the colonists themselves.

The American Declaration of Independence, which has been accepted by the world and is consecrated in the minds of the American people, must stand as the truth, at least until there shall be presented against it far better evidence than the unsupported assertions of apparently Anglicized American history revisionists.

Professor Hart in his book not only discredits the cause of the patriots, but he sweepingly defames their characters.

Samuel Adams, Alexander Hamilton, and Thomas Jefferson are slurred, and the soldiers of the Revolution are maligned, while the Tories Hutchinson and Galloway are called honest men.

Of the soldiers of the Revolution, whose patriotic zeal, devotion, and courage through terrible hardships and suffering have always been the pride and inspiration of American youth, Professor Hart tells American children that:

"Many served from the purest motives of patriotism, but others were drawn into the army by money, bounties, and promises of land" (p. 134).

Of Samuel Adams, Professor Hart teaches:

"He was a shrewd, hard-headed politician" (p. 125).

This is the only reference in the book to the personal character of the man who was the greatest single factor in bringing about the Revolution.

Professor Hart joins with Professors Muzzey, McLaughlin, and Van Tyne in teaching of Alexander Hamilton that he "is said once to have exclaimed: 'Your people, sir, is a great beast.'" (p. 151).

In referring to Thomas Jefferson, Professor Hart states that Jefferson's political opponents, the Federalists, "looked upon him as an athiest, a liar, and a demogog" (p. 190).

The professor then proceeds to state that Jefferson, however, was not an atheist, because "he liked to read the New Testament"; but as to his being "a liar and a demagogue," the author answers by explaining of Jefferson that:

"He was a reserved man and did not tell everybody all that he knew, and hence some thought him false."

The unfortunate part of all this is that the professor's first reference to Jefferson will stay in the child mind and not his explanation. That this is the main thing even in the mind of Professor Hart appears in the first of his questions at the end of the lesson, which reads:

"What did Jefferson's enemies think about him?" (p. 203.)

Such defamation of these great patriot leaders appears all the more reprehensible when brought into contrast with the same author's laudation of prominent Tories. On page 127 of his text, Professor Hart teaches that:

"Some honest men, like Governor Hutchinson, of Massachusetts, thought the colonists ought not to insist on their rights. Others, like Joseph Galloway, of Pennsylvania, were in favor of protesting and then accepting whatever decision might be made in England."

These two whom Hart sets up as "honest men" were not so regarded by the colonial patriots. Both were Tories, and it was said at that time that Hutchinson was a hypocrite and Gallawoy a spy for the British. There is abundant evidence to sustain that contention, and only historical rewriters, confessing due attention to influences from overseas, would have the nerve to transform Hutchinson and Galloway from hypocrite and spy into honest men.

Of the Battles of Lexington and Concord, where was "fired the shot heard round the world," Professor Hart tells in a single paragraph; and although all authorities are to the effect that the British fired first at Lexington, the professor in his history states that:

"A shot was fired, probably by the English" (p. 131).

The great American historians, Bancroft, Hildreth, Higginson, and Lossing, are of one mind that the British fired first, and the British historians, Green, Lecky, and Trevelyan, concur. Many good authorities are to the further effect that the British commander, Major Pitcairn, himself fired the first shot.

Fiske, who in his masterly work has summed up the facts and opinions presented by all preceding American historians concerning the beginning of the fight at Lexington, says in his account:

"'Disperse, ye villians!' shouted Pitcairn, 'Domn you, why don't you disperse?' And as they stood motionless, he gave the order to fire. As the soldiers hesitated to obey, he discharged his own pistol and repeated the order, whereupon a deadly volley slew 8 of the Minute Men and wounded 10."

In his New American History, published in 1917, Professor Hart cites the following authority for his statement that the first shot at Lexingtcn was probably fired by the English:

"It is uncertain how the fight began; an English officer who was present at the battle says: 'On our approach they dispersed, and soon after the firing began; but which party fired first I cannot exactly say, as our troops rushed on shouting and huzzaing previous to the fighting.'"

So it is solely the word of a British officer, who confessed he did not know, which Professor Hart has set up against the words of scores of American patriots who did know, and against all American historical evidences and authorities.

At the time Hart's New American History, 1917, quoting his British officer, was issued, Sir Gilbert Parker had been more than 2 years in America, with a large organized staff of British propagandists, and this was a part of their propaganda. Parker has since stated in a Harper's Magazine article (March 1918) that his work of pro-English propaganda was particularly effective in universities and colleges. The saddest part of it all is that what Parker then put over as British propaganda, many college professors still go on teaching as solemn truth.

However, at best, there is no educational value in speculation and controvery as to which side fired first. The value all lies in a vivid and stirring picture of the brave stand taken by a half-hundred undrilled minutemen against several hundred trained British troops, and not dispersing until they had paid blood tribute to the patriot cause.

To the Battle of Bunker Hill, Professor Hart gives only six lines, and these are so utterly lacking in patriotic spirit that the word "patriots" appears in quotation marks.

This first set battle of the Revolution is one of the most dramatic and decisive events in world history. The intense spirit of resistance it exemplified and engendered fused all the Colonies into one common cause. To the American writer of American school history this is the best topic afforded for inculcation of patriotic pride, devotion, idealism, and aspiration. Professor Hart dismisses it as an incident of no importance.

Professor Hart joins with other revisionists in belittling the Continental Congress. On page 150, he teaches:

"Not until after Burgoyne's army was captured did Congress pluck up courage to complete the form of union."

A state of mind is a matter, not of ascertainable fact, but of mere inference, and this particular inference, being derogatory, is improper for school history.

Concerning the causes of the War of 1812, Professor Hart teaches that the Indian outbreak in the Northwest was mistakenly supposed to be stirred up by British agents. And the finally impelling motive for the American declaration of war in 1812 is interpreted by him as follows, on page 205:

"Madison still wanted peace and so did his Secretary of the Treasury, Gallatin. * * * However, they could not stand out against the 'War Hawks,' a group of young men * * * who proposed to conquer Canada and insist on terms of peace at Quebec or Halifax. Nothing seemed easier, for by this time there were about 7,000,000 Americans and the whole population of Canada was not more than 450,000. In June 1812, therefore, war was declared by about two-thirds majority of Congress."

The indisputable fact is that Gen. William Henry Harrison, Governor of the Northwest Territory and in command on our western border, had written President Madison that he found the hostile Indians fully supplied with British army muskets and with military stores bearing the name of the British Government. Unless this official testimony of "Old Tippecanoe" is to be discarded as worthless, the Indians were not "mistakenly supposed" to be incited by the British.

The insinuation that the disproportion in population between the United States and Canada rendered the odds strongly in American favor is misleading. It was not Canada alone, but the whole powerful British Empire, with which American went to war. Canada was not won, it is true, but the whole force of the British Empire was whipped, with Jackson's glorious victory at New Orleans thrown in for good measure.

Referring to the state of the American militia during the War of 1812, Professor Hart says, on page 207:

"The crowning disgrace was the landing of a British force of about 5,000 men on the coast of Chesapeake Bay and their march overland, as though they were going to a picnic, till they captured Washington (1814). Within a circle of 60 miles from the Capital lived not less than a hundred thousand able-bodied Americans accustomed to the use of a gun, but the British were allowed to burn the public buildings and to return to their fleet almost without losing a man.

"What was the matter? Not lack of men, for in the course of the war about 500,000 different Americans were enlisted as soldiers, mostly for brief service. There was no shortness of funds, though the Government had to pay high for what it borrowed. The trouble was that Madison and his military advisers were weak and incapable. The Secretary of War, John Armstrong, was the man who was responsible for the loss of Washington. To be sure, the roads were bad and it was hard to send men and supplies to the front, but somehow the Canadians marched over just as bad roads and managed to reach the desired places."

All the so-called modern revisionists, in excuse for their omission or minimization of American victories and heroic incidents, plead that there is not enough space in school history for "battles, marches, and seiges" and for discussion of movements which belong to the science of war. Yet they seize upon every opportunity to expatiate to the derogation of America. Professor Hart in this instance devotes twice as much space to discussing a controversial question, which belongs exclusively to military science, as he gives to Lexington and Concord together, and more than three times what he gives to Bunker Hill.

It is true that the burning of Washington was "a crowning disgrace" but the disgrace rests not upon the Americans, as Professor Hart would have children think, but upon the British. The English historian Green, in his History of the English people, says of it:

"Few more shameful acts are recorded in our (British) history; and it was the more shameful in that it was done under strict orders from the Government at home."

The well-organized British force, acting under definite orders, knew exactly where it was going and what it was going to do. The unorganized American militia could not have known what was being attempted until after it had been done. It was a matter not of cowardice or incompetency on the one side, but an undreamed-of return to practices of barbarism on the other.

Lossing, in his Pictorial Field Book of the War of 1812, in writing of the British outrage of all rules of civilized warfare in burning Washington, says:

"Up to this time, the conduct of the British had been in accordance with the rules of modern warfare. Now they abandoned them, and on entering the National Capital they performed deeds worthy only of barbarians. They wantonly destroyed the public edifices having no relation in their structure to operations of war, nor used at the time for military annoyance, some of these edifices being also costly monuments of taste and of the arts, and others depositaries of the public archives, and only precious to the Nation as a memorial of its origin and its early transactions, and interesting to all nations as contributions to the general stock of historical instruction and political science.

"The British Annual Register for 1814 denounced the proceedings as 'a return to the time of barbarism.' 'It cannot be concealed,' the writer continued, 'that the extent of devastation practiced by the victors brought a heavy censure upon the British character, not only in America, but on the continent of Europe.'

"To the credit of General Ross be it said that when he was ordered to destroy the public buildings at Washington, he demurred, saying that they had carried on the war on the peninsula and in France with a very different spirit, and that he could not sanction the destruction of public or private property with the exception of military structures and warlike stores. It was not until he was warmly pressed that Ross consented to destroy the Capitol and the President's house. 'Fortunately for Ross' sensibility, there was a titled incendiary at hand in the person of Admiral Sir George Cockburn, who delighted in such inhumane work, and who literally became his torch bearer.'"

Professor Hart and several other school-history revisionists seek to excuse this English act of vandalism and shift the odium upon the American militia. In doing so they defy the facts which have been accepted on both sides for more than a century.

Professor Hart's textbook can only have a most baleful influence upon school children, for it is destructive of patriotic pride and tends to deaden patriotic spirit.

The New York City public-school committee condemned many passages in this book, but the book remains on the list of authorized texts for use in the public schools of the city.

Public Salary Tax Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS H. CASE
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 10, 1940

LETTER FROM JOHN L. SULLIVAN

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, Sept. 9, 1940.

DEAR MR. CASE: This is in reply to your letter of August 31, 1940, inquiring about the effect of the Public Salary Tax Act of 1939 on State employees paid directly or indirectly by the Federal Government.

As you doubtless know, the Public Salary Tax Act of 1939 expressly provides that the compensation of State and local government officers and employees shall be subject to the Federal income tax. However, title II of that act was designed to avoid the retroactive taxation of the compensation of State and local government officers and employees in cases where, at the time such compensation was earned, it was thought to be exempt, but which was found to be taxable because of the decision of the Supreme Court in Helvering v. Gerhardt, 304 U. S. 405 (1938). Since the Federal Government had not previously sought to tax such compensation, it was considered inequitable to apply the income tax on such income retroactively.

However, these considerations do not apply in the case of State officers and employees whose compensation was paid directly or indirectly by the United States or any agency or instrumentality of that Government. Beginning with Regulations 86, issued under the Revenue Act of 1934, the Bureau of Internal Revenue consistently took the position that such compensation was taxable. That position has been sustained in the case of Hanson v. Landy, 24 F. Supp. 535 (D. Minn., 1938). In 1935 the rule was expressly made applicable to the officers and employees of State emergency relief administrations paid directly or indirectly from funds granted to the States by the Federal Government (I. T. 2859, C. B. XIV–1, 101 (1935)).

It can be said, therefore, that State officials and employees receiving all or part of their compensation from the Federal Government or some instrumentality of that Government, had notice, prior to the enactment of the Public Salary Tax Act, that they were bound to pay Federal income tax on that part of their compensation paid by the Federal Government. The Congress has always considered such compensation taxable. Accordingly, section 205 of the Public Salary Tax Act provides that compensation of State officers and employees paid directly or indirectly by the United States or any of its agencies or instrumentalities shall not be considered as compensation within the meaning of those sections which exclude from the retroactive application of the Federal income-tax provisions the compensation of State officers and employees.

When the revenue bill of 1940 was under consideration in the Senate, an amendment was proposed and adopted which would have provided that no income tax should be assessed or collected which was attributable to compensation received prior to January 1, 1939, for personal services as a State officer or employee even though such compensation was paid directly or indirectly by the United States. However, that amendment was stricken by the conference committee and a substitute amendment was proposed and enacted. That amendment, found in section 401 of the Revenue Act of 1940, provides that, if the amount of deficiencies in income tax which is attributable to such compensation is paid with interest on or before March 15, 1941, no civil or criminal penalties shall be imposed on account of such failure to pay such amount or make return of such compensation.

As the law now stands, therefore, State employees who are paid directly or indirectly by the Federal Government are liable to pay

Federal income tax on such income earned in past years. However, if such taxes are paid before March 1, 1941, no civil or criminal penalties will be imposed on the taxpayers on account of failure to pay or make return of such compensation.

I trust that the foregoing adequately answers your inquiry.

Sincerely yours,

(Signed) JOHN L. SULLIVAN,
Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. FRANCIS CASE,
House of Representatives.

Our United States in This Backward-Moving World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SOL BLOOM
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 10, 1940

ADDRESS BY DR. NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER, PRESIDENT OF COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University, delivered at the Parrish Memorial Art Museum, Southampton, Long Island, September 1, 1940:

The human race is witnessing the greatest and most far-reaching revolution which history records and is in large part under its control. This revolution, which is primarily the outgrowth of economic problems and economic ambitions, has for more than a quarter century involved the whole world. It took on violent military form with the declaration of war on August 1, 1914. It is that war, checked for a time by an armistice and by a treaty of peace that looked backward instead of forward, which is again raging, and in far more cruel, inhuman, and destructive form. It is in every sense of the word a war of real revolution.

Whether it be generally recognized or not, what we call the civilized world, which for 700 years has been moving steadily forward in the spirit of liberalism and toward liberalism's high ideals, has now turned suddenly and violently backward. The guidance of reason and of understanding, of moral principle and of religious faith, has been shockingly and cruelly displaced by the rule of brute force. Our literally stupendous achievements in literature, in philosophy, in the arts, in the sciences, and in the comforts and conveniences of life count for nothing in the control of national policy and of national conduct, and by far the major portion of the world is now under the rule of brutal compulsion. Such portion of the world as is not in that condition may soon be struggling for its life.

Had anyone ventured a generation ago to predict that a great and highly civilized people like the Germans, with their magnificent record of accomplishment and influence in every aspect of the intellectual life, could have been reduced to mere blind and unreasoning instruments of torture and of brute force, he would have been thought quite mad. Nevertheless, just that has happened. So appalling a set of conditions and circumstances must be examined with dispassionate care in order that we may have something to guide us in judging what may be the meaning of it all and what will be its possible effect upon that which we Americans hold most dear.

One of the most influential happenings with which we have to deal and which is but little recognized is an effect on public opinion of the outstanding excellence of contemporary journalism, particularly in these United States, and of the world-wide news spread hour by hour through the radio. These powerful agencies, the press and the radio, have substituted information for knowledge. The steady flow of that information which they give so absorbs the attention of tens of millions of human beings that they have no opportunity and little temptation to give to this mass of information that critical interpretation and reflective understanding which might transform it into knowledge. We are therefore, in very large measure, living on the surface of the world's happenings. Few indeed are those who have the capacity and the ability to go beneath that surface and to grasp the real significance of the knowledge which information might, but often does not, involve and convey. It is of vital importance that we learn to look beneath the surface of things.

As a matter of fact, the path which the constructive thought of the world was treading from the beginning of the twentieth century down almost to the outbreak of the World War of 1914–1918 was the most hopeful and progressive in all modern history. Signs multiplied that statesmen and the people for whom they spoke had gained the vision of a prosperous, a contented, and a peaceful world, organized for the preservation and protection of law and order in a way that would promote all those inspiring ideals which we recognize as the spirit and guide of liberalism.

What happened? Why was this progress, so full of promise and satisfaction, brought suddenly to an end; and why were reactionary and abhorrent forces set loose, to meet with so little effective opposition that they bid fair to control the world for generations and to put it back, as no one of us had ever believed possible, to a condition which is essentially one of barbaric rule by sheer force?

Bluntly, the answer must be that the democracies, foremost among which were France, Great Britain, and the United States, showed themselves incompetent and unable to understand the new economic and political forces at work in the world, and to cooperate for their control and direction in a manner which would preserve and protect the democratic system of economic, social, and political order, as well as those free institutions which had, we thought, been safely and permanently built upon that order. During these critical years the democracies have conspicuously lacked the able, constructive, and courageous leadership which was so sorely needed. They were allowed to drift onto the shoals of disaster.

Consider for a moment the progress which was made from 1898 to 1920 in the building of a system of world organization and international cooperation that should control and guide the new economic forces which the industrial revolution had set at work. The purpose, of course, was to increase prosperity for all peoples, great and small, and to protect the foundations of international peace through international cooperation. The first note of progress in this movement was struck by the noteworthy rescript appealing for international cooperation to promote peace, issued by the Czar of All the Russias in 1898. Immediately, the progressive and liberal forces of the world rallied to respond to that appeal. It will always be a matter of pride to many of us that the Government of the United States took the lead in that great movement for world organization. It was the influence of the American delegation which gave to the First Hague Conference of 1899 the measure of success which it attained. From the speech of President McKinley made at Buffalo on September 5, 1901, containing the striking sentence, so often quoted, "The period of exclusiveness is past," down to the formal declarations by the two great political parties in the Presidential campaign of 1920, American opinion showed itself ready to take responsible leadership in guiding the world toward a peaceful solution of all international differences and difficulties. It had grasped the fact that the only possible way to avoid war and to keep out of war was to unite to remove the causes of war. The policies of Presidents Theodore Roosevelt and Taft, of Secretaries of State John Hay and Elihu Root, all reflected and expressed this spirit of world leadership. Then came, as I have often pointed out, the epoch-marking joint resolution passed in June 1910 by both Houses of the American Congress without a single dissenting vote, authorizing the President to begin negotiations with other governments in order to bring about a world organization which would establish and protect peace through the aid of an international police force composed of the combined navies of the world. How many of those who profess to represent public opinion in the United States today have ever heard of that joint resolution or know that it was passed without a dissenting vote?

The persistent assertion that the traditional policy of the United States is one of national and international isolation is contrary to every fact in our history. No people in the world have had more intimate, more constant, and more influential relationships with other peoples than ourselves. Outstanding and distinguished examples of this international relationship and international influence are Benjamin Franklin, John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, John Jay, John Marshall, John Quincy Adams, Ralph Waldo Emerson, and James Russell Lowell. The steady flow of immigration from one European country after another gave to our population long ago the many-sided character and intellectual interest which will always mark the American people. We required the military cooperation of the people and the Army of France in order to win the War of Independence. We found a way to take part in the war between Napoleon and Great Britain in what is called the War of 1812, against the protest of so outstanding a statesman and leader as Daniel Webster. Our country was invaded and public buildings at Washington were burned. When that war came to an end and the Treaty of Ghent was signed, not the slightest reference was made to those matters which had been alleged to have caused America's participation in the war. The war with Mexico was undertaken against the protest of Abraham Lincoln who, as Representative in Congress from the State of Illinois, voted against it. The Spanish-American War in 1898 was absolutely unnecessary, and if it had not been insisted upon by the belligerent press, aided by numerous influential leaders of opinion, including Theodore Roosevelt, Cuba would have become free through diplomatic arrangement with Spain and without any armed hostilities whatsoever. The cost to the people of the United States of that unnecessary war is quite appalling, since highly organized and efficient lobbies have provided for a system of pensions to persons whose relation to the war was only nominal, which have already amounted to tens of millions of dollars and will continue yet for a long generation.

Isolation is the last thing of which the American Government and the American people can be accused. Millions of American people are day by day and almost hour by hour informed and deeply interested in news from other peoples in every part of the world. No other people manifests a like international interest. American agriculture, American industry, American commerce, and American finance have penetrated and influenced the life of every nation on the globe. Moreover, it must not be forgotten that it was an American, Commodore Perry, who in 1852, under the express instructions of President Fillmore, to all intents and purposes discovered Japan and introduced its people to world trade and world relationship.

Unfortunately, the World War of 1914–18 broke before the European nations had been persuaded to accept the proposals of the American Government made by President Taft pursuant to the joint resolution of 1910. But President Wilson had a great vision, and he offered a system of world organization similar to that proposed by the American Congress, to be effective when the Great War should come to its end. Unhappily his temperament was such that he permitted personal frictions and dislikes to guide his public statements and his policies in a way which greatly weakened his influence and his leadership. Nevertheless, when the American people chose their President in 1920, they did so having before them the definite pledges of both great political parties to support an agreement among the nations to preserve the peace of the world. The statement contained in the Republican national platform was particularly clear and definite.

It is therefore obvious and of record that the American people were betrayed by the failure of those who were chosen to public office in 1920 to carry out the pledges so definitely made to them. Indeed, it is just at this point that a beginning is to be found for the causes of those appalling happenings which have in 20 years succeeded in revolutionizing so large a portion of the world. It needed the votes of but a very small group of Members of the United States Senate to deprive the American people of the safety, the benefit, and the world leadership which they had then been pledged. The construction of a world of cooperating nations should then have gone forward under American inspiration and American leadership. Had this been done, we might well be living today in a far different world from that which confronts us.

With this record of promise and with these explicit pledges before us, it may again be pointed out what nonsense it is to speak of our having had a traditional policy of isolation, and of our having no interest in what happens to our fellow men in other lands. The truth is the precise opposite. We had offered leadership to the world, and both political parties had pledged it to the American people. It was the petty politicians at Washington and their shocking disregard of moral and political obligation which threw away the great opportunity which our Government had envisaged and of which both political parties had pledged themselves to take advantage. If there be one definite cause, more explicit and more obvious than any other, of the weakness, and it may even be the downfall, of the democracies, it certainly finds expression in this disastrous record of the faithlessness of the small-minded American politician and officeholder, who had in his power for the time being the control of great public policies.

But even so, since a plan of world organization was accepted and entered upon through the establishment of the League of Nations at Geneva, there still seemed opportunity for readjustment of a constructive and progressive character in the field of international relations. But neither the Government of France nor the Government of Great Britain stood firm on the new platform which had been erected. Both consistently backed and filled and compromised and hesitated, lest some gain-seeking undertaking might be interfered with if the high ends for which the League of Nations had been organized were vigorously and courageously pursued. Nevertheless, under the inspiring leadership of M. Briand, 15 governments ratified in 1928 the famous Pact of Paris for the renunciation of war as an instrument of national policy, and no fewer than 63 governments had signed and ratified this pact by 1934. Many of us then thought that the end of war was in sight. We little realized the faithlessness of the signatory governments and that they would at once begin to prepare for war on an unprecedented scale of expenditure. Those who, in every land, had been at work for a generation upon these plans to end war by removing the causes of war, were profoundly grieved and shocked as they saw one happening after another which meant the weakening and the eventual tearing down of the structure which was then building.

Even as late as 1931, if the Government of Great Britain had supported the protest of the Government of the United States against Japan's invasion of China, much of the worst which has taken place during the past 10 years might never have happened at all. Since the Government of the United States did not then have the support of the British Government, the leaders of Nazi Germany saw no reason why they should not violate their pledges and take possession of the east bank of the Rhine, and the Fascist Government of Italy saw no reason why it should not violate its pledges and proceed to the conquest of Ethiopia. Then all barriers were down and the way was opened to the spread of the rule of brute force without the slightest regard for international law, for formal treaties and pledges or for human feeling. What has happened since is so clear and so obvious that it need not be dwelt upon.

The question which presses for an answer is why were these great democracies so incompetent? Why were they so lacking in vision, in courage, and in a spirit of cooperation? Why was it practicable for a small group of members of the United States Senate to make it impossible for the Government of the United States to carry out the pledges which had been made to the American people? What was it which to all intents and purposes paralyzed the Governments of France and of Great Britain in their support of the organized society of nations and prevented them from going forward with eagerness and vision on the constructive path of progress which had been pointed out?

The answer in the case of Great Britain may be found succinctly stated in two extraordinary volumes, one of which is a collection of speeches made during the years 1932 to 1938 by Winston Churchill, the present Prime Minister in the Government of Great Britain. In the case of France, political and economic disintegration had been proceeding at a rapid pace after the death of Briand, apparently without any effective and constructive leadership to prevent it or to save the great people of France from the literally appalling fate which has now overtaken them. Plainly, what France has lacked in recent years is constructive and courageous moral and political leadership. The French people have unfortunately been divided into economic and social groups or classes which contested with each other for the control of the government and which apparently were unable or unwilling to work together for the good of the French people as a whole and for the glory and honor of France. The result has astounded the whole world. Nothing has been more staggering to us than to watch the 42,000,000 French people sitting silently and in coma while a small group of their fellow Frenchmen signed away not only the Government of the Third Republic but that great declaration for liberty, equality, and fraternity which sounded the note of the French Revolution a century and a half ago. In each and all of the democracies there have been and are forces at work which have gravely interfered with the effectiveness of these democracies. But it is difficult, if not impossible, to look upon democracy in France as dead. It is certainly in prison at the moment; but some of us, at least, will not give up the hope and the faith that it will find a way to reassert itself in the spirit of the truly great France of bygone days.

So outstanding a scholar and statesman as the Marquess of Crewe feels that liberalism is everywhere under an eclipse, and his discussion of the subject is highly illuminating. He points out that it was in England that the plant of liberalism first took root and that its growth there was slow and intermittent. Party politics played their part sometimes in encouraging liberalism and sometimes in hampering it, but all through the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries it never died down. Then came the day when the French Revolution brought a new atmosphere to Europe and gave to liberalism the new impulse and effectiveness which lasted for a full century. Lord Crewe suggests, however, that liberalism by its very nature lacks cohesion. It promotes and invites differences of opinion and frequently calls upon public opinion to wait and see, rather than to reach a definite conclusion as to action to be immediately taken. The economic influences which began to play so large a part in national and international policy a hundred years ago gave liberalism in England its new opportunity to build itself upon a wider and more effective democratic basis in the shaping of public policy and upon freedom of international trade for the quick promotion of industry and of commerce. Toward the close of the nineteenth century, the weakening of liberalism in England began, and, as Lord Crewe points out, its eclipse has continued until this day.

Liberalism in England has certainly been able to stir the mind of the people to influence and to shape legislation in many most important ways, yet there have been forces at work, partly national and partly international, the effect of which has been to limit liberalism's power to guide and to express British public opinion. As Lord Crewe states, the present is a most harassing period for liberals, especially for those of the younger generation, who find themselves forced into the political background during their best years and to whom the prospect of political influence and political leadership seems dark indeed. Nevertheless, the closing words of his analysis are these: "But let us conclude with a confident Sursum corda."

It is in this spirit of sursum corda that we Americans must approach the grave problems which stare us in the face. We dare not be discouraged or lacking in faith, for should we be, there would be little left to hope for in the world of today.

It is perfectly evident that all those important problems and policies which we have looked upon as national or domestic are now absorbed into and made part of the world revolution. The ordinary processes of trade and commerce no longer exist, and huge expenditures are making for purposes which we had thought belonged to the past and would never again be necessary. Armaments and preparation for military war have become the dominant note in our public life. This means, of course, the diversion of labor and savings from those purposes for which we would wish to use them, to ends which are of necessity wasteful and destructive. Moreover, military war on the stupendous scale on which it is now being waged destroys in a few days the earnings and the savings of men for generations. The disastrous effect of this upon the accumulated wealth of our people will, one of these days, be quite obvious to everyone; but there is no alternative.

Indeed, so absolute and so complete is this revolution that we are yet unable fully to visualize or understand it. What are we Americans to do in order to protect and to save our own beloved institutions and the historic foundations upon which they rest? We have had ample warning of these problems and dangers, but we have paid little attention to them. It is two generations since Herbert Spencer wrote a famous essay entitled "The Coming Slavery," in which he predicted that tyranny would succeed liberty in England and probably elsewhere. He certainly did not have in mind the totalitarian state in the form in which it is now presented to us by Russia, by Germany, and by Italy, but he did have in mind a state of affairs in which the Government would control the life and occupations of the people, instead of the people controlling the policies of the government.

If we look frankly and fairly at the facts of our country's history, we cannot fail to see that there have been many signs during the past generation that all was not well with our political thinking and our political policies. So long as we had the leadership of our first six Presidents, each one of whom was an outstanding statesman of competence and of independence, the foundations of our Government and political life were unshaken. After their time, however, we entered upon a period of political and partisan struggle the effects of which, while sometimes relatively harmless, were often definitely harmful. Finally, there came the climax of our great Civil War, which apparently was unavoidable. When that was over and the country's unity permanently established, then our problems became primarily economic and social. Whenever we were given opportunity to approach these problems in a spirit of understanding and detachment from group or sectional interest, our public opinion responded to the demands made upon it with reasonably good results. But increasingly, our public opinion and our elected political representatives came under the pressure of closely organized and most persistent minority groups. These minority groups were not concerned with principles nor with the public welfare. They were concerned simply with that particular end upon which they had set their hearts and which appealed either to their imagination or to their personal or group interest. Unfortunately, the activity and influence of these minority groups have become stronger year by year at Washington and at several of our State capitals and today they are a genuine danger to our public welfare. Minority groups are able to exist and to succeed only because the majority group is indifferent and inattentive to them. Every once in a while we have evidence that American public opinion is sound and healthy and can be reached by the highest type of appeal. We have had several instances of this during the past two generations, but in every case grave damage had been done by the minority groups before public opinion effectively asserted itself.

Public opinion is the unseen product of education and practical experience. Education, in turn, is the function, in cooperation, of the family, the church, and the school. If a family fails in its guiding influence and discipline and if the church fails in its religious instruction, then everything is left to the school which is given an impossible burden to bear. It is just this situation which has arisen in the United States during the generation through which we are still passing. In overwhelming proportion the family has become almost unconscious of its chief educational responsibility. In like manner the church, fortunately with some noteworthy exceptions, has done the same. The heavy burden put upon the school has resulted in confused thinking, unwise plans of instruction, and a loss of opportunity to lay the foundations of true education, the effects of which are becoming obvious to everyone. Fundamental discipline, both personal and social, has pretty well disappeared, and without that discipline, which develops into self-discipline, education is impossible.

What are the American people going to do about it? If they do not correct these conditions, they are simply playing into the hands of the advocates of a totalitarian state, for that type of state is at least efficient, and it is astonishing to how many persons efficiency makes stronger appeal than liberty.

Then, too, we have many signs of an incapacity to understand and to interpret liberty, or to distinguish it from license. It is a long time since Moses came down from Mount Sinai bearing the Ten Commandments, the sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth of which forbade certain human conduct. Those commandments have become part of the moral law of civilized peoples, and governments treat as crimes the practices which they forbade. This means that there is a limit to liberty and that liberty ends where license begins. It is very difficult for many persons to understand this fact or to grasp its implications. If we are to have freedom of speech, freedom of thought and freedom of the press, why should we not be free to say and think and print whatever we like? The answer is that the limit between liberty and license must be observed if liberty itself is to last. To suppose, as many individuals and groups seem to do, that liberty of thought and liberty of speech include liberty to agitate for the destruction of liberty itself, indicates on the part of such persons not only lack of common sense but lack of any sense of humor. If liberty is to remain, the barrier between liberty and license must be recognized and observed.

In this backward-moving world, it may well be that leadership toward return to a new and forward-moving world is to rest with the United States. Despite our shortcomings and failures, we have written a record on the history of the last 150 years which is not only of outstanding importance, but full of promise for the future.

We have established the oldest form of government now existing in the world and we have shown its capacity to continue to exist, unaltered in principle, through all the stupendous changes of a century and a half.

We have established in permanent form the federal principle, and it is that principle which must be applied if a new, a forward-facing, a prosperous and a peaceful world is to be built upon the wreck and the ruin of that backward-moving world at which we now look.

We have established freedom of trade among these federal units and have given to each unit fullest opportunity to develop its resources and the capacity of its population. This, again, is a principle which must be recognized and accepted in a contented and a peaceful world composed of nations, some great and some small, but all proud of their independence and of their capacity for human service.

We have established the authority of an independent judicial system, which means that not force nor the gain-seeking impulse, but right and justice, shall be accepted and enforced as ruling principles of human intercourse, whether personal, group, or national. This, too, is a principle which must dominate a newly organized and a forward-moving world.

The great progress which had been made in applying these fundamental principles to world organization and world life has been, for the time being, completely stopped, but there are those of us who have faith that it will not be long before those principles will again be turned to as fundamental and controlling.

It must be remembered that the peoples held for the moment under brutal dictatorship are each and all highly civilized. They have, each and all, made literally great contributions to literature and to science, to art and to industry. Who can possibly believe that when the emotional spasm is over—and that may be earlier than we now think—they will fail to assert themselves in terms of their old ambitions and their old principles? When that time comes—and may it come soon—where can these peoples turn save to the United States, to see at work, and on the whole successfully at work, those underlying principles of government, of life, and of conduct which are the outgrowth of liberty and which alone make the continuance of liberty possible? All that we need to do is to make sure, always and everywhere, that gain seeking, whether for individuals or for groups, is subordinated to public service. Would not Washington and Hamilton, Jefferson and Madison, Webster and Lincoln, and our other great national leaders of the past, looking down from their home in high heaven, let their faces shine with contentment as they saw those principles and habits of life which they did so much to establish gaining control over what has become a wrecked and a backward-moving world, in order to turn it into a new, a contented, a prosperous, and a peaceful organized family of nations, world-wide in scope and safe beyond peradventure from the despot of tomorrow?

We may take encouragement from the little-remembered happenings of nearly a century and a half ago. For some 20 years Napoleon Bonaparte dominated by force the greater part of Europe and part of Africa and set his heart on the subjugation of liberty-loving Great Britain. To the statesmen of that day, the world upon which they looked seemed very much like the world by which we ourselves are confronted. It was liberalism which was struggling for its life and which was so gravely threatened that there was general despair concerning it. Hear these words spoken in the House of Commons by the younger Pitt on April 25, 1804, when Great Britain was arming itself to resist the invasion which Napoleon had planned, and see how absolutely they apply to what is now happening in the world:

"I need not remind the House that we are come to a new era in the history of nations; that we are called to struggle for the destiny, not of this country alone, but of the civilized world. We must remember that it is not for ourselves alone that we submit to unexampled privations. We have for ourselves the great duty of self-preservation to perform; but the duty of the people of England now is of a nobler and higher order. We are in the first place to provide for our security against an enemy whose malignity to this country knows no bounds; but this is not to close the views or the efforts of our exertion in so sacred a cause. Amid the wreck and the misery of nations, it is our just exultation, that we have continued superior to all that ambition or that despotism could effect, and our still higher exultation ought to be, that we provide not only for our own safety, but hold out a prospect to nations now bending under the iron yoke of tyranny, what the exertions of a free people can effect; and that at least in this corner of the world, the name of liberty is still revered, cherished, and sanctified."

It was 11 years later that Waterloo brought Napoleon's despotic career to an end and paved the way for the progress which European nations have since made.

May we not hope and pray that a twentieth century Waterloo is not far distant? Let us so act that when it comes the newly freed world will cry out with one voice: "God bless the United States of America and its people."

British Propaganda and Subversion of Textbooks in American Public Schools—E

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

EXCERPT FROM REPORT BY DAVID HIRSHFIELD

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and include an article from the report of David Hirshfield relating to a book by Andrew C.

McLaughlin, head of the Department of History, University of Chicago, and Claude H. Van Tyne, head of the Department of History, University of Michigan, entitled "A History of the United States for Schools."

Mr. Speaker, I have included these articles with my remarks, in order to call the attention of Members of Congress and the parents of our American boys and girls, to these changes in our textbooks, as I am sure all patriotic citizens are interested in retaining the true American history in our public schools.

A HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES FOR SCHOOLS, REVISED 1919

(By Andrew C. McLaughlin, A. M., LL. B., head of the Department of History, University of Chicago, and Claude H. Van Tyne, Ph. D., head of the Department of History, University of Michigan.)

Objections submitted and sustained against the McLaughlin and Van Tyne text are that it teaches:

That there is little use trying to learn whose fault it was that the Revolutionary War began;

That the Declaration of Independence was largely plagiarized from English writings;

That the United States Constitution was copied after the British Constitution;

That many of the long-cherished stories in American history are "yarns";

That many revered patriot leaders were disreputable characters;

That many of our most inspiriting slogans are not genuine;

That "we can afford now to laugh at our forefathers."

Objection has been made that in this textbook the British oppressions of the American colonists are so plausibly condoned or completely suppressed that no ground is left which seems to justify the statement of grievances in the Declaration of Independence or the armed resistance in Revolution.

It has been further charged that the history of the American Revolution is in this text reshaped to conform with definite British propaganda for the cultivation of the "international mind" in behalf of imperialistic interests and that its teachings to American children are poisonous to their patriotic spirit.

In the preface these authors proclaim:

"We make no apology for the omission of many of the 'yarns' of American history. * * *

"By means of this elimination we have secured space for fuller explanation and interpretation of really important events."

They omit mention of Nathan Hale, Faneuil Hall, the Green Mountain Boys, Betsy Ross and the birth of the flag, the quartering of troops, and the British attempts to bribe, and they minimize the patriot valor at Lexington, Bunker Hill, and New Orleans.

These "yarns," now omitted, have always heretofore been deemed important in American school history. They are as important now as they ever were—perhaps more important now than ever before, since the stanch national spirit they helped to engender is being insidiously undermined.

The "really important events," for which these authors secure space by omitting what they term "yarns" are such as these:

"England was, on the whole, more generous to her colonies than were other nations to theirs" (p. 139).

"Though the country must have been almost equally divided, the Whigs were most active, and succeeded in electing a Congress bent upon defending 'American liberties'" (p. 156).

"As a Tory wrote, in Washington's camp the soldier had 13 kings and no bread, and it seemed better to serve 1 king and have plenty of bread" (p. 178).

"It is from a study of this struggle between Whigs and Tories that we see the American Revolution to have been a civil war in America as well as a war between England and her rebellious colonies" (p. 183).

It is difficult to understand how any mind, or any pair of professorial minds, can regard such things as more "really important events" in American history than the inspiring incidents and heroic characters which have been omitted to make space for them.

McLaughlin and Van Tyne appear to have been the first of the Anglophile revisionists. The first edition of their school history, issued in 1911, distorts many truths regarding Anglo-American relations, to the disparagement of America and exaltation of Great Britain.

In their 1919 revision McLaughlin and Van Tyne have a complete chapter of 15 pages on How Europe Influenced America, 1607–1815, which did not appear in their 1911 edition.

In this new chapter opportunity is taken—

1. To set up Magna Carta as the chief source of our liberties;
2. To discredit the Declaration of Independence as a plagiarism;
3. To contend at length that the United States Constitution is a mere written copy of the unwritten British Constitution.

These authors devote a great deal of space in stating in detail how John Locke, an Englishman, had written about liberty long before the Declaration of Independence was formulated; that in his writings "Locke expressed essentially the same ideas" and that the same sounded "very much like what we read in the American Declaration of Independence" (p. 199).

The United States Constitution, according to this school history, differs from the English Constitution only "in that most of it is included in a single document, while the English Constitution is made up of many laws, court decisions, and customs," etc., etc. (p. 197).

The argument in support of this theory, taking up a page and a half in the new chapter, is a mere restatement of Sir Gilbert Parker's official British propaganda material with which our country has been flooded in recent years.

The chapter on the War with Spain has been revised and the 17 lines of tribute to Dewey's victory and Hobson's heroism, which appeared in the 1911 edition, were removed in 1919 to make space for the moot Diederichs incident in Manila Bay, and to expatiate how "Thus British friendship saved us."

Comparison of the two editions discloses many other alterations in the text, all conforming to up-to-date British propaganda.

Leading founders of our liberties are characterized as follows:

"It is hard for us to realize how ignorant and superstitious were most of the early colonists of America" (p. 134).

"Patrick Henry, a gay, unprosperous, and hithertc unknown country lawyer" (p. 141).

"Smuggling was so common that even a leading Boston merchant was known as the prince of smugglers" (p. 140).

"As the British soldiers who had left Boston at midnight neared Lexington in the early morning of April 19, 1775, Adams and Hancock stole away across the fields" (p. 153).

"Independence was not seriously thought of, except by a very few men like Samuel Adams. Great men and good patriots like Washington and Franklin were loath to think of such an outcome of the quarrel' '(p. 162).

"Hamilton is said to have exclaimed at a banquet once, 'Your people, sir, is a great beast'" (p. 238).

"On the 4th of July 1801 voters of a town in Connecticut drank to the toast: 'Thomas Jefferson: May he receive from his fellow citizens the reward of his merit—a halter'" (p. 249).

"We can afford now to laugh at our forefathers" (p. 262).

It is not to be denied that these great and good men, who here are so flippantly defamed, were human and had their human faults and limitations. However, it is not their personal faults that are most important to us. In their faults there is little educational value, but their transcendant virtues, heroisms, sacrifices, abilities, and achievements, peculiar to themselves, and outstanding above those of any other set of men of any period, constitute vitalizing and inspiring educational material.

Nearly all of the herein mentioned historical revisionists are found to be at every opportunity harping upon the faults or failures of American leaders. This is naturally to be expected in British histories in relation to American affairs, but its transfer from British histories to American school histories is not natural and should not be tolerated.

The truth regarding the noble characters, exalted ideals, immortal words, and heroic deeds of the founders of our Republic, as it has been handed down to us through honest American historians, is the most precious possession of any people on earth and should be transmitted unsullied to posterity.

Jackson, Monroe, Clay, and other great leaders have not escaped criticism in this McLaughlin-Van Tyne history book.

Of Jackson they teach:

That he was rough and uncultured.

That he disliked the bank because its stockholders and managers were his political enemies.

That he put the public moneys into pet banks.

That Jackson was rough and uncultured is not as important in educational value as that, despite educational limitations and handicaps, he was a great soldier, a good statesman, and a model patriot. In his force of character, directness of methods and freedom from conventionalism he was a new type, and has been well described as the first genuine representative of democracy. Jackson's intense earnestness and strict honesty have been securely woven into the very fabric of our Republic. His noble qualities of mind and heart, his unselfish purposes and his lasting achievements will fill to overflowing all the space that can be found for him in any school history.

Another of the great makers of America whom these authors "damn with faint praise" is James Monroe, twice elected President, the second time by every vote in the electoral college but one. Of him, on page 272 they say:

"He was only a gallant officer of the lower rank in the Revolution, a fairly good diplomat who happened to have a hand in the Louisiana Purchase, and only an ordinary Secretary of State under Madison, but he was the choice of the Republican Party leaders, Madison and Jefferson."

The name of Monroe, for a hundred years, has been known and respected in every civilized country, and had President Monroe never done anything else than promulgate the Monroe Doctrine he still would stand out as one of the greatest constructive forces in our national life.

Monroe was a mere boy in the Revolution, and at 18 was promoted to a captaincy because of his bravery. He was twice Governor of Virginia, Minister to England, to France, and to Spain. He was Secretary of State and later Secretary of War through the War of 1812. These facts are better fitted for school history than is a sneering comment.

Regarding Henry Clay these authors are teaching as follows:

"There had been a deal, they asserted, and Clay, 'Judas of the West,' had sold his influence to Adams for the office of Secretary of State" (p. 286).

Party strife was bitter in the days of Clay, and extremely harsh words were often used by partisans against opponents. No public character, of that, this, or any other period, is justly described in a heated phrase of a bitter opponent. Yet these authors and other history revisionists show a peculiar fondness for this unfair method of estimating the characters of American leaders. It is by this method that Thomas Jefferson is presented to school children as deserving of "a halter."

Not content with disparagement of heroic characters, these co-authors proceed to discredit their immortal words. Maxims and slogans with which every school child has been familiar in the past are now pronounced as not authentic.

Of Lawrence's last brave words, "Don't give up the ship," these authors say:

"'Fight the ship until she is sunk' seem to have been his real words, and the others are the words of the boy who took his message on deck."—Page 265.

The authenticity of this slogan was accepted by Commodore Perry when he had it emblazoned on his battle flag at the victory of Lake Erie, and this is one of the most fondly cherished slogans in the United States Navy still. No educational advantage is gained by questioning its genuineness, and the only effect on the school child's mind of such petty caviling is to weaken confidence in any truth of history.

Of Ethan Allen's demand upon the commanding officer at Ticonderoga to surrender "In the name of the Great Jehovah and the Continental Congress," these authors remark in a footnote, page 157:

"So Allen afterward declared. He had no right to demand the fort in the name of the Continental Congress, for his commission was from Connecticut."—Page 157.

Here they quibble over trifling points, to the obscuration of the splendidly dramatic manner in which Allen and his men, without firing a shot, won a fort which cost the British eight million sterling, a succession of campaigns and many lives. Allen's demand was made in the hearing of many men who confirmed all that "Allen afterwards declared."

The causes of the Revolution are in this textbook obscured, and the student seeking here the principles and motives of the colonists will find only omissions, contradictions, and confusion.

On page 144 these historians state that:

"The great objection raised by the Americans was that they were taxed by the Parliament without being represented in it."

On page 146 they go on and say that:

"The King and his obedient ministers now thought that they must crush what they considered to be a spirit of rebellion. * * * A second mistake was the sending to America of an inadequate force of soldiers, which only irritated and did not cow the colonists."

The authors frequently tell what the King thought, how his ministers felt, and what his generals hoped. In this instance the word "mistake" has application only from the British standpoint. What the authors clearly mean to teach is that if a larger British force had been sent the colonists might not have been irritated but would have been cowed.

In their endeavor to define the causes of the Revolution these authors state:

"There is little use trying to learn whose fault it was that the war began, for, as we have seen, such a long train of events led to disagreement between England and America that we should have to go back and back to the very founding of the Colonies. As in most quarrels, the blame for beginning is laid by each party on the other" (p. 152).

It is amazing that men who confess they do not know why the American Revolution began should have felt themselves called upon to write American school history.

McLaughlin and Van Tyne attempt to extract the glory from the Fourth of July. On pages 163–4 they teach:

"The reason we celebrate the 4th instead of the 2d of July is that most men thought more about the day Congress voted to accept a declaration drawn up by Thomas Jefferson explaining to the world the reasons for making the resolution of independence.

"A list of 27 grievances was given, some of which seem unreasonable now, but others constituted real wrongs."

The enthusiastic jubilation of the patriots following the declaration, July 4, 1776, is thus referred to:

"Among the Whigs, or Patriots, the news was joyfully received. Some thoughtless people went too far and did foolish things, like burning an effigy of the king or burning his portrait in a public square. In New York City the American soldiers pulled down a leaden statue of George III and melted it into bullets" (p. 164).

It was peculiarly proper that the statue of King George was turned into bullets to shoot his oppression and sovereignty out of this land. No better use for a king's statue ever was found in America.

Of France's motive in coming to the aid of America, on pages 175–6 they say:

"England and France had long been enemies. Many bitter wars had been fought between them but none more bitter than that for ownership of America, which was decided in England's favor when Wolfe captured Quebec. From that hour French statesmen watched for a time when England should be weakened and when France might avenge her shame and regain her power."

Regarding the War of 1812 these authors teach, on page 261:

"To make war on England, however, was, in fact, to join Napoleon, her implacable enemy, so that the world witnessed the strange alliance of James Madison, lover of peace, and Napoleon Bonaparte, the genius of war."

In their summary of the results of that war they state, on pages 270–271:

"Of the War of 1812 one feels like asking with Little Peterkin, 'What good came of it at last?' Some 30,000 men had been lost and about $200,000,000 had been spent on wasteful war. America's shipping was almost destroyed and trade had suffered great losses, and yet no principle for which she had fought was settled."

The fact of the matter is that the result of the War of 1812 settled forever the British claim of its right to impress American seamen. The British encouragement of Indian outrages upon our western border was ended.

Results even more important than the foregoing are cited by Carl Schurz in his Life of Henry Clay:

"The War of 1812, with all the losses in blood and treasure entailed by it, and in spite of the peace which ignored the declared causes of the war, transformed the American Republic, in the estimation of the world, from a feeble experimental curiosity into a power—a world power, full of brains and with visible claws and teeth. It made the American people, who had so far consisted of the peoples of so many little commonwealths, not seldom wondering whether they could profitably stay long together, a consciously united Nation with a common country, a great country, worth fighting for, and a common national destiny—nobody could say how great—and a common national pride, at that time filling every American heart brim-full."

The justice of the American cause in the Mexican War is more than questioned in this book. In a footnote on page 323 these authors say:

"There is still room for question as to whether we were right in fighting Mexico, and scholars differ. Our patience was sorely tried, but a little fairness, a little more patience, and a little more generosity might have made war unnecessary. Polk's method of blaming Mexico reminds one of the soldier who came into camp with a dead sheep over his shoulder, though foraging was forbidden. 'No sheep can bite me and live,' he said."

Time and events have amply vindicated the justness and necessity of the Mexican War, and the mere fact that "scholars differ"—as it ever is their chief vocation—furnishes no reason for shadowing with doubt the true motives and actions of our fathers in the minds of our children.

Space which these authors say they have secured for "really important events," by omitting old inspiriting "yarns," is lavishly devoted to a half-page reproduction of a British cartoon of the Revolutionary period, caricaturing America as a rattlesnake.

Another half-page cartoon ridicules Lincoln as being ridden on a rail.

A cartoon of Woodrow Wilson's "wonderful control" on affairs still current and controversial, occupies one-quarter of page 457.

The patriots frequently used the rattlesnake as an emblem, and their own applications of it formerly appeared in school histories. The revisionists substitute for it a hostile conception.

These cartoons, feebly conceived and crudely drawn, have no educational values. Such use of space, which has been gained by ruthless elimination of patriotic characters and incidents, would be incomprehensible but for the fact that it is in perfect accord with the Anglicized spirit and purpose, shown by these authors throughout their book, to distort, belittle, and ridicule the great leaders and vital truths in American history to the minds of American school children, the American citizenry of the future.

Acquisition of Naval and Air Bases

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SHERMAN MINTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 11 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ADDRESS BY JAMES W. RYAN

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, on September 10, 1940, before the American Bar Association's Section of International Law, meeting at Philadelphia, Pa., a distinguished international lawyer, James W. Ryan, Esq., of New York, delivered a very interesting and informative address on the action of the President in taking necessary measures to acquire nearby naval and air bases and the legality thereof. I ask unanimous consent that the address be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I shall endeavor to answer the criticisms that have been made of the so-called "method" and the legality of the President's action in acquiring the naval bases in exchange for the destroyers.

The discussion of the Hague Conventions of 1907, and particularly of articles 6 and 8 of Hague Convention XIII, is beside the point, because those conventions, and particularly Hague Convention XIII, contain an express general provision in article 28 that "The provisions of the present convention do not apply except between contracting powers, and then only if all the belligerents are parties to the convention." The conventions are therefore obviously inapplicable because one of the belligerents, England, is not a party to them. The Supreme Court of the United States decided in the case of Littlejohn & Co. v. United States (270 U. S. 215), where two articles of the Hague Conventions of 1907 were relied on, that as they were inapplicable to the United States during the World War, "In the absence of convention every government may pursue what policy it thinks best" unless there is a "uniform or commonly accepted rule of international law" on the point. There has been no such uniform or commonly accepted rule with respect to a neutral selling warships, for an adequate or equivalent consideration to a belligerent because Germany herself as late as the year 1905 was following a practice, while neutral, of selling warships to one of the belligerents (Russia) in the Russian-Japanese War. In The Santissima Trinidad (7 Wheat. U. S. 283), the sale of an armed ship was considered a simple sale of contraband.

England, in the Alabama claims case, was held liable solely because of the arbitrators' application of a special new rule to which she agreed as the basis for the arbitrators' decision, and she always maintained, and others have supported her, that that special rule did not represent actual international law or practice (United States, Papers Relating to the Treaty of Washington, vol. II, Geneva Arbitration, 1872, pp. 217–218). The gift of warships by a neutral to a belligerent, without adequate consideration, such, as I understand, General Pershing suggested, would under international law and in fact be aiding the belligerent and a violation of a neutral's duties, although as late as the end of the eighteenth century "it was considered permissible for a state to assist one belligerent without abandoning neutrality" (Jessup and Deak, "Neutrality: Its History," vol. I, p. 24 ff.), and as late as the World War the United States declared to Austria-Hungary that it was not lacking in impartiality in supplying the armed forces of England and not those of Austria-Hungary (United States Foreign Relations, 1915, Supp., p. 795); but, on the facts, that question does not arise here. Indeed, none of the questions arise here which are suggested by the President's critics and which are based on isolated, special, and subordinate rules with respect to transfer of warships to a belligerent, because underlying all of those rules and all of international law is the primary and basic principal rule that every nation in a time of national emergency may properly take necessary measures for self-protection by increasing its national defense and military strength, and that is the substance of what the President did in acquiring the naval bases in exchange for the destroyers. Even the critics have to admit that the net effect of the transaction was to make a vital and urgently necessary increase in our means of national self-protection against a danger presently threatening us.

In determining whether Congress intended by section 5 of the act of March 3, 1883 (U. S. C., title 34, sec. 492), section 3 of title V of the act of June 15, 1917 (40 Stat. 217, 222), section 14a of the act of June 28, 1940 (Public, No. 671), or other act of Congress to restrict the President's action in acquiring necessary naval bases in exchange for destroyers, there are two main questions to be considered. The first is whether Congress intended to restrict the President's powers in connection with increasing our country's national defense when in his judgment, as the Chief Executive or as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, such increase could be effected and had become urgently necessary. The second question is whether, even if such intention of Congress did exist, such statutes purporting to restrict the President's constitutional powers and action in protecting the country by action of an Executive nature in the military field and in the field of foreign relations would be valid. Those questions are the substance of the matter; and after careful consideration of the law and of the various criticisms made of the President's action, it seems to me that they must both be answered in the negative. The fact acknowledged by everyone is that the President's action was necessary to our national defense and would increase our national military strength. The statutes mentioned were limited to Congress' field of domestic relations and were intended by Congress merely, during a war when we were neutral, to prevent private citizens, subordinate officials, or aliens in this country from sending vessels equipped as warships to belligerents. Those statutes nowhere mention the President or Chief Executive, and were not intended to restrict the official or governmental acts of our Government through the Chief Executive, acting vicariously as the technical sovereign in the field of foreign relations, and were merely an incidental aid by Congress to him in prohibiting, as a matter of domestic or municipal law, private individuals from invading the constitutional field of foreign relations, in which he determines and carries out our country's policies. Those statutes had as their historical origin the efforts of countries after the Declaration of Paris in 1856 to prevent privateers or privately owned and controlled warships from participating informally for profit in a war to which their countries were not parties. They are more matters of domestic prohibitions or municipal law in this and certain other countries rather than rules of international law or settled and uniform international practice.

It is an elementary canon of legal interpretation that the Government's own executive officers are presumptively not intended to be bound by a statute unless named in it (Guarantee Title & Trust Co. v. Title Guaranty Co., 224 U. S. 152; United States v. Herron, 20 Wall. 251; In re Fowble, 213 Fed. 676). As said by Mr. Justice Story in United States v. Hoar (26 Fed. Cas. 329, 330):

"In general, acts of the Legislature are meant to regulate and direct the acts and rights of citizens; and in most cases the reasoning applicable to them applies with very different and often contrary force to the Government itself. It appears to me, therefore, to be a safe rule founded in the principles of the common law that the general words of a statute ought not to include the Government, or affect its rights, unless that construction be clear and indisputable upon the text of the act."

The rule is the same in England—that the Crown is unaffected by acts of Parliament not specifically directed against it (Dollar v. United States, 19 Wall. 227, 239). And even though the statute were clearly applicable to all Government officials functioning in the field of domestic affairs, and therefore within Congress' jurisdiction, it would still not be applicable to the President when functioning as the technical sovereign or Government representative plenipotentiary in his supreme and exclusive constitutional field of foreign relations. (See United States v. California, 297 U. S. 175, 186; and Nardone v. United States, 302 U. S. 379.) The statutes must, under the settled legal rules of interpretation, be read in the light of the fact that Congress' power in the field of foreign relations is limited by the Constitution to declaring war and regulating foreign commerce, and, in the case of the Senate, to ratifying treaties entered into by the President. Anything in the field of foreign relations short of actually declaring war, and short of making effective without Senate ratification a treaty incorporating a rule for future activities of the countries (and of their subjects) signing the treaty, is exclusively within the province of the President according to the constitutional distribution of governmental powers as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States, and every act of Congress must be interpreted accordingly and in the light of that lack of constitutional jurisdiction and power of Congress in the greater part of the field of our country's foreign relations. Congress merely possesses rule-making powers bearing incidentally on our foreign relations which are "cognate to the conduct by him (the President) of the foreign relations of the Government" (Panama Ref. Co. v. Ryan, 293 U. S. 388, 422). In the case of United States v. Curtiss-Wright Corporation, 299 U. S. 304 (at pp. 319 and 320), decided on December 21, 1936, the Supreme Court said:

"Not only, as we have shown, is the Federal power over external affairs in origin and essential character different from that over internal affairs, but participation in the exercise of the power is significantly limited. In this vast external realm, with its important, complicated, delicate, and manifold problems, the President alone has the power to speak or listen as a representative of the Nation. He makes treaties with the advice and consent of the Senate; but he alone negotiates. Into the field of negotiation the Senate cannot intrude; and Congress itself is powerless to invade it. As Marshall said in his great argument of March 7, 1800, in the House of Representatives, 'The President is the sole organ of the Nation in its external relations, and its sole representative with foreign nations.' Annals, Sixth Congress, column 613. The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations at a very early day in our history (February 15, 1816), reported to the Senate, among other things, as follows:

" 'The President is the constitutional representative of the United States with regard to foreign nations. He manages our concerns with foreign nations and must necessarily be most competent to determine when, how, and upon what subjects negotiation may be urged with the greatest prospect of success. For his conduct he is responsible to the Constitution. The committee consider this responsibility the surest pledge for the faithful discharge of his duty. They think the interference of the Senate in the direction of foreign negotiations calculated to diminish that responsibility and thereby to impair the best security for the national safety. The nature of transactions with foreign nations, moreover, requires caution and unity of design, and their success frequently depends on secrecy and dispatch.' United States Senate, Reports, Committee on Foreign Relations, volume 8, page 24.

"It is important to bear in mind that we are here dealing not alone with an authority vested in the President by an exertion of legislative power, but with such an authority plus the very delicate, plenary, and exclusive power of the President as the sole organ of the Federal Government in the field of international relations—a power which does not require as a basis for its exercise an act of Congress, but which, of course, like every other governmental power, must be exercised in subordination to the applicable provisions of the Constitution."

The President's action in acquiring the naval bases by Executive agreement, expressly purporting to be of final character, was a "governmental act" (Banco de España v. Federal Reserve Bank, United States (C. C. A. 2, July 8, 1940)) of this country which is binding, and which requires no approval by Congress or ratification by the Senate on any theory that it was a treaty or rule-announcing convention rather than an Executive agreement. The transaction was merely a purchase of leaseholds as a site for naval bases, for a consideration consisting of destroyers or property within the President's control, and no funds were required to be appropriated by Congress to make the agreement effective. Congress was therefore not a necessary or proper party in the matter. It was simply a functioning of the Chief Executive in his proper field of foreign relations. The difference between a treaty and an Executive agreement is, in substance, the same as the difference, often pointed out by the Supreme Court, between a rule, regulation, or law within Congress' jurisdiction, and an administrative act or Executive functioning within the President's exclusive jurisdiction. Panama Ref. Co. v. Ryan (293 U. S. 388, 421–423); Schechter Corporation v. United States (295 U. S. 495, 530); United States v. Shreveport Grain Co. (287 U. S. 77, 85). Congress, under the Constitution, is merely a rule-making body, and it is only when the President is agreeing on rules with foreign countries that congressional approval, through the Senate, becomes proper or necessary. This limitation exists on Congress even in domestic affairs, as the Supreme Court has many times pointed out.

On the question whether a prohibition by Congress directed against acts of private citizens or aliens in sending warships from this country is intended by Congress to also prohibit the executive officials of the Government from using their best discretion in performing their duties, several analogies suggest themselves. For instance, it is a crime to assault or attack a man. The statutes prohibit it without qualification. Yet it is no offense for a public official to use necessary force in making an arrest or otherwise performing a public duty and the general criminal statute is inapplicable to him because, as the courts put it, the legislature did not intend by the unqualified language in the general prohibitory statute to prevent the public or police official from using such force as he finds necessary to make the arrest and thus protect the community from a danger threatening it. It is also a violation of law to take money from a man without his consent. It is larceny or theft. Yet public officials take money from persons in this country without their consent in collecting taxes in the ordinary performance of the governmental function, and these taxes are collected because they, in the Government officials' opinion, are necessary to protect the community by employing policemen or firemen, or acquiring police stations, jails, fire houses, or other bases for the performance of public functions.

Nor was, as I have already indicated, the President's action in violation of international law. The Hague conventions have nothing to do with the question here involved because those conventions expressly provide that the new rules incorporated in them were not to be followed, excepting during a war in which "all the belligerents are parties to the convention." Article 28 of Hague Convention XIII of October 18, 1907, 36 U. S. Stats. at Large 2415, provides:

"ART. 28. The provisions of the present convention do not apply except between contracting powers, and then only if all the belligerents are parties to the convention."

The same provision is in article 20 of Hague Convention V of October 18, 1907 (36 U. S. Stat. L. 2310). It is common knowledge that during the present war all of the belligerents are not parties to the Hague conventions. Great Britain, one of the two principal belligerents, is not a party to any of them. By special agreement during the last war, Great Britain became a party to article 6 of Hague Convention VI of 1907 (The Blonde, L. R. (1922), 1 App. Cas. 313, at p. 325), but before the present war began it denounced that and the other articles in the Hague conventions (The Pomona, Lloyd's Reports of Prize Cases (second series), vol. 1, p. 1).

So far as evidence of what the rules of international law were preceding the Hague Conventions of 1907, and still are, the best statement of the vague and unsettled condition of those rules was made after the Hague Conventions of 1907, by William I. Hull, professor of History in Swarthmore College, who attended the conventions, and who stated at page 479 of his treaties on "The Two Hague Conferences and Their Contributions to International Law" (Ginn & Co., Boston, 1908), as follows:

"The regulation of warfare on the sea was a task full of difficulties both technical and delicate. The questions discussed were burning ones which recent bitter events had made prominent, and every one had to be considered from the point of view of both belligerent and neutral, while the interests of both continental and maritime powers had to be reconciled.

"The Congress of Paris of 1856 and the Peace Conference of 1899, with their handful of rules, were the only precursors of the Second Conference in the vast task of regulating naval warfare. To the four or five former rules, the Second Conference added a full score; and its deliberations upon questions still unsolved will undoubtedly become the basis of the future solutions of several other knotty problems."

In the recent treatise on international law by Oppenheim (Oppenheim International Law, 5th ed., vol. 2, sec. 334, pp. 574–576), it is stated that the rule of international law is that a neutral nation shall not permit its subjects or other persons within its territory to aid one of the belligerents by manning a warship with a fighting crew, "so that she can commit hostilities at once after having reached the open sea." He states that such manning with fighting crews is the test under international law of whether or not a neutral nation is permitting its ports to be used as a base of naval operations for one of the belligerents. There is no such question of "manning" involved in the present situation with respect to the destroyers. Congress, therefore, was not required by international law to enact the statute prohibiting the mere building and sending of warships to belligerents by private individuals. In this instance, as in the Neutrality Act of 1939, it went further in giving up our national rights as a neutral than it was required to do by international law. But because it did so is surely the most tenuous of grounds for contending that it was trying to hamstring the President in the performance of his constitutional functions in the field of foreign relations and in the military field in increasing our national defense to protect us from existing threats or dangers.

The President's action was both necessary for our national defense and did have the effect on the whole of greatly increasing it. The intention of the President's action, therefore, from a legal and realistic point of view was to do what he did do, namely, take necessary measures for our national defense and not merely to aid one of the belligerents. The popular conception that any action taken by a neutral which incidentally aids one of the belligerents is a violation of international law is clearly wrong, as an examination of the rules of international law in any of the leading treatises or reported court decisions will show. A notable instance of this is the fact that international law permits the citizens of neutral countries to carry on commercial trade in arms or armaments with one of the belligerents and not with the other. This was all gone over in the debates in connection with enactment of the Neutrality Act or Arms Embargo Repeal Act of 1939.

The propriety of the action of the President as the Executive or Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy in acquiring title, of a leasehold nature or otherwise, to new possessions in foreign countries for purposes of national defense or national self-preservation cannot seriously be questioned under either international law or our own Constitution and laws. And if the predominant intention was to make a necessary increase in our national defense in an emergency, the fact that the price paid for acquiring the leaseholds consisted, not of moneys, but of certain old destroyers not an essential part of our Navy, would not constitute an unneutral act under either international law or our national laws. There is no rule of international law prohibiting a nation from taking necessary action for its self-defense in a time of national emergency. Self-preservation is, in the field of international law as elsewhere, the primary law to which all other rules are subordinate. The only real question, therefore, is whether or not the action taken by the President was, in this time of emergency, necessary for our national defense and did increase our national strength. If it was necessary, and did increase our strength, then it was proper under international law.

The question whether the President or Congress is the one charged with the jurisdiction of determining whether or not the action is necessary for national defense is a mere question of domestic or local law. This point was recently reaffirmed by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals at New York, on July 8, 1940, in the case of Banco de Espana v. Federal Reserve Bank of New York. The court said: "By a 'governmental act' is meant no more than a step physically taken by persons capable of exercising the sovereign authority of the foreign nation. The officials of the then recognized Spanish Government possessed such authority. If they purported to act in their official capacity, that physical fact precludes us from examining the validity of their acts under local law." The rules of international law with respect to the duties of neutral nations and belligerents are concerned only with governmental acts.

On this secondary question, the President under our Constitution, as the representative of our country in its dealings with foreign nations, and as the Commander in Chief of our military and naval forces charged with the duty of taking action necessary for national defense, is the proper person to determine what is urgently necessary for national defense and take the necessary steps accordingly. This is, of course, unless—as is clearly not the case here—the action involved is of a treaty nature, such as an agreement with respect to future activities of a general character of the citizens or governments of both countries.

On analysis, it is evident that what the opponents of the President's action are really contending is that it is a violation of international law for a nation to take necessary steps in self-defense when danger of war and attack are threatening it. This is, I submit, an absurd position to take and wholly without foundation in international law or reason. There is no rule in any field of jurisprudence prohibiting a country or an individual from taking necessary steps in self-protection to ward off danger of attack. Nor is there, except in the case of Denmark, any instance in history in which a country has intentionally refrained from maintaining a reasonable and necessary amount of military strength because of lack of intention to resist any unwarranted attack on it by other nations. Denmark did so because of a belief that she could not make herself strong enough to successfully resist unwarranted attack by Germany. Surely our country can make itself strong enough to resist unwarranted attack and should do so in view of what we have learned of the fatal results of Denmark's policy.

The proposition that a nation which is merely making a necessary increase in its national defense in the face of imminent danger is violating international law is simply untenable, and those criticizing the President's action because of supposed violation of certain acts of Congress are really saying in substance that Congress intended to prohibit the President from making necessary increases in national defense when danger of war was threatening. There is no such language in any of those acts of Congress, nor did Congress, as a matter of historical fact, have any such intention, or even discuss that matter, unrelated to what it was doing, in the committee hearings or in the debates in Congress.

Even when setting up the Constitution of the League of Nations and the rules to be followed by nations belonging to it, it was agreed by everyone that the primary right of self-defense by each country must be preserved and wars declared for self-defense were excluded from every one of the prohibitions in the League of Nations set-up.

If the President had need of congressional action, such as an appropriation of money in order to take the action that he did, then it might be argued with some plausibility that he should have consulted with or obtained the approval of Congress because of the necessity of obtaining a congressional appropriation. But there was no such appropriation necessary here, and, furthermore, Congress had already appropriated money for a general purpose for increasing our national defense, to be expended in the President's discretion, which, if money was necessary, could properly have been used to meet our Government's needs in completing any leases to the United States of naval bases so as to make them immediately available to us. The fact, moreover, is, as reported in the press, that both the minority leader of the Senate and the minority leader of the House, as well as the majority leaders, did have actual knowledge of the executive agreement before it was effected. Furthermore the suggestion that a long delay should have been arranged, awaiting committee hearings and protracted debates in Congress so that congressional approval could be obtained in advance, assumes what is evidently not a fact, that such delay would not have deprived our country of the opportunity of effecting the agreement.

The action of the President, therefore, in acquiring the naval bases in exchange for the destroyers was proper and necessary, and did not conflict with either international law or our own Constitution and laws.

The Two Conventions, the Two Platforms, and the Two Candidates

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 11, 1940

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the 1940 Presidential campaign will be very unusual in many ways. This will be the first time any man ever asked the people to elect him to the Presidency for a third successive term. This will be the first time that any candidate dictated his own nomination although he claimed he did not want it. This will be the first time a Presidential nominee said he would refuse to accept the nomination which he had gotten for himself unless the convention would nominate his individual choice for Vice President. This was the first time that the wife of a sitting President addressed the convention in her husband's interest. And this is the first time in the history of the Nation that the people openly expressed fear that if the third-term President is elected they may never have another Presidential election.

THE TWO CONVENTIONS

Because of the distrust of political bosses the people demanded the direct primary system. Despite much agitation for a national Presidential primary, sentiment favoring it has not crystallized sufficiently yet. The recent New Deal Convention in Chicago has stirred up animosities that may be the necessary impetus to provide some system that may prevent the repetition of another such political fiasco. Honeyed words and cryptic wise cracks by Mr. Roosevelt will not assuage the wounded feelings of the Jeffersonian Democrats between now and November. The Chicago convention brought to all of us the solemn warning that the usurpation by the Executive of the powers of the other branches of our Government is becoming dangerous. Fear of another 4 years of reckless executive usurpation by Roosevelt gives justification for the fears of those who think that they may not again be permitted a free selection of candidates for the Presidency. Laying aside all consideration of partisanship and considering only the indisputable facts it must be said that the Democratic Convention at Chicago was completely dominated by one man. I repeat, one lone man many miles away controlled every action of that convention. He not only dictated his own nomination but defied the overwhelming wishes of the delegates and compelled the nomination of Mr. Wallace for Vice President. His threat of refusing his own nomination unless his wishes in this respect were granted sounded like Hitler. And this is the same man who upon the occasion of his entering upon his second term said:

I am by no means satisfied with having twice been elected President of the United States by very large majorities. I have an even greater ambition. My ambition relates to January 20, 1941. My great ambition on January 20, 1941, is to turn over this desk and chair in the White House to my successor.

Such shocking insincere usurpation has not been matched by any high public man in the history of the Republic. Such supine and abject surrender by one of the leading political parties of the United States has never before disgraced our political life. The new dealers of pink and various hues captured the citadels of democracy.

The Chicago convention was a terrible experience for the Jeffersonian Democrats. Silently, one by one, these once bright stars in democracy's brilliant firmament fade out. Silently they are placed on the shelf of history. Cactus Jack rides silently to the last round-up. No more shall his sharp commanding sentences be heard in Democratic councils or in the National Capitol. Jim Farley—genial Jim—has been purged out of the party by political paregoric prescribed by "Harold the Ick" and "Harry the Hop." But when the spotty new dealers shall have passed off into the graveyard of political pirates Jim may be heard of again. Call the roll of other Democrats who could not stomach the New Deal—John Hanes, Lew Douglas, the best financial brains in the Democratic Party; President Charles Seymour, of Yale, a great scholar, has learned a new lesson in political science; also George White, ex-Governor of Ohio, a Democrat respected by all Ohio Democrats. All these illustrious men and thousands of others to whom the New Deal is political anathema, are taking their places in the ranks of the Republican Party headed by Wendell L. Willkie, who, like themselves, is striving to unify our people and to restore America to the high estate from which she has descended through New Deal fantastic and foolish experimentation. My views as to the Chicago convention are approved by practically all the great news writers of the day. Frank Kent says:

It is certainly true that not in a generation has there been a convention of either party in which the fake was so thinly disguised. Perhaps the American people are not very discerning in these matters. Slow to suspect their heroes of duplicity, they are apt to accept at face value the statements and postures of popular men in high positions. Unquestionably they do swallow an almost incredible amount of demagogic junk. But so crude and rancid was the article served in Chicago that it seems impossible they should not at least have smelt it, even if they did not wholly understand it.

Elmer Fries, of the Columbus Dispatch, said:

And make no mistake about it. Mr. Roosevelt's contemptuous disregard for the third-term tradition, and the conspiracy of administration saboteurs in Chicago to deprive delegates of freedom of action, mean just that—the first unconcealed step on the road to dictatorship.

For superlative hypocrisy and consummate perfidy Roosevelt's message poll-parroted to the convention and the country through "Dear ALBEN" BARKLEY was the climax. It broke all records. This message is in itself so unusual as to be beyond description. Here it is:

I and other close friends of the President have long known that he has no wish to be a candidate again. We know too that in no way whatsoever has he exerted any influence in the selection of delegates or on the opinions of delegates to this convention.

Tonight at the specific request and authorization of the President I am making this simple fact clear to this convention.

The President never has and has not today any desire or purpose to continue in the office of President, to be a candidate for that office, or to be nominated by the convention for that office.

He wishes in all earnestness and sincerity to make it clear that all the delegates to this convention are free to vote for any candidate.

That is the message I bear to you from the President of the United States by authority of his word.

Of this message Raymond Clapper says:

Up to the time of that message I have had faith in Mr. Roosevelt. I have so no longer.

Of this message Hugh Johnson said:

Maybe it is possible to ride a lie to victory. Hitler says it is and seems to have proved it for the moment. If political position, patronage, and favor could pervert all delegates to a great convention, perhaps it could pervert a majority of the voters of a great people. I don't believe it.

And Frank Kent says:

The hypocrisy of that message establishes a record. * * * In view of the absolutely known facts, the falseness of the message was shocking. Not even a President should be privileged to perpetrate so obvious a fraud without having it branded.

THE PHILADELPHIA CONVENTION

The Philadelphia convention stands in striking contrast to the Chicago fiasco. No convention in the history of the Republic was more free from bossism. Everything was open and aboveboard. A few days before the convention a new name was occasionally suggested. Willkie was comparatively unknown. He had for years been a voice, crying in the wilderness, against the ruthless destruction of his business by the Government in its socialistic experiment known as the T. V. A. Congress heard his voice and in 1938 appointed a committee to make an investigation of this new experiment. This investigation brought to light some of the facts in this controversy and Willkie felt encouraged to talk back to the President. The businessmen of the country recognized Willkie as the Moses who could lead them out of their tribulations. He spoke fearlessly when others almost feared to breathe. Timorously at first they encouraged his candidacy. But when the common people began to find out about the strong warm personality of this man Willkie and to sing from every corner of the land "we want Willkie," these businessmen from all sections, especially the small-business men came forward with a rush. This momentum plus the enthusiasm of the common people, met in Philadelphia in an irresistible confluence that carried Willkie to the crest of the wave and brought him the nomination for the Presidency. So compelling was this victory that those contesting with him and their adherents, overwhelmingly convinced of the fairness of his victory unanimously accorded him the plaudits due a worthy victor. There, in that convention, well after midnight, with the whole Nation listening in, Wendell Willkie was proclaimed as the Republican nominee amid scenes of joy and friendliness that bespoke determination on the part of the people to change things in Washington. No candidate for the Presidency ever launched his campaign with a more united support of the people and of his party. The people love a fair, open contest.

THE TWO PLATFORMS

The political platforms are usually too long. Having been a member of the platform committee at the Philadelphia convention I am not surprised that it is difficult to write a brief platform. Platforms are written under pressure and are fearfully and wonderfully made.

THE NEW DEAL PLATFORM

The New Deal platform for 1940 is a picture of the legislative career of Senator WAGNER, of New York, who no doubt wrote it. It deals practically altogether with social-welfare legislation and seeks to give credit to the New Deal party for all the social advancement of our country. It fails to give credit to the many progressive social advancements made under Republican administrations. It fails to note the terrible fact that there are many millions of young men and women in America today between the ages of 20 and 28 years who came to maturity during the New Deal administration and who never at any time in their lives have had a regular job. It fails to bring any hope to those on the relief rolls who would again like to take their places in the ranks of those who enjoy the freedom of having a real job. All it promises them is a continuation of dependency. The war scare may take many thousands of the young men into the Army and the defense spending may put some men to work. But it will be remembered that history proves that dictators plunged their people into war in order to cover up their own shortcomings. War is not a prosperity that enriches.

The New Deal platform recommends a way of life similar to that advocated by Hitler and Mussolini, yet admonishes us against results such as obtain in these nations. In effect they want Hitler's power but they deny any intention to bring about Hitler's results.

In capital letters the platform claims that it is proud of the New Deal record in providing defense against outside aggression. In this it cannot be sincere. Witness the terrific expenditures for defense purposes during the past 6 years for which practically nothing by way of defense can be shown. Practically no airplanes, no tanks, no equipment of any kind. Witness also the fact that in this the present session of Congress, which convened last January, we have appropriated over $14,000,000,000 for defense. We are so far behind that we will not be able to put 2,000,000 men in the field fully equipped until the middle of 1944.

The New Deal platform has in it many very amusing sentences. It says:

We have revived confidence, opened the road to all honorable business. We have given the ordinary citizen a chance to go into business and stay in business. We promise to safeguard the farmers' foreign markets and expand his domestic market.

Past experiences have shown that platform promises mean nothing to the New Deal. In 1932 they promised:

An immediate and drastic reduction of governmental expenditures, by abolishing useless commissions and offices, consolidating departments and bureaus, and eliminating extravagance, to accomplish a saving of not less than 25 percent in the cost of Federal Government.

They did the opposite—

Maintenance of the national credit by a Federal Budget annually balanced on the basis of accurate Executive estimates within revenues, raised by a system of taxation levied on the principle of ability to pay.

They did the opposite—

A comparative tariff for revenue, with a fact-finding tariff commission free from executive interference.

They did the opposite. In 1936 they said:

We shall continue just treatment of our war veterans and their dependents.

They did the opposite—

The farmer has been returned to the road to freedom and prosperity.

This is not true—

The worker has been returned to the road to freedom and prosperity.

This is not true—

The American businessman has been returned to the road to freedom and prosperity.

This is not true.

THE REPUBLICAN PLATFORM

The Republican platform was not intended to be a catalog of alluring promises. Rather was it intended to be a fair statement of conditions and to point a fair, reasonable, and constitutional way out of our terrible economic and financial dilemma. The Republican candidate will stand on this platform. He will run on this platform. He will chart his course by this platform after he is elected. It is hoped that this platform will be like the tree that was "planted by the rivers of water" and will be "for the healing of the Nation."

The Republican platform was written before the New Deal platform. The New Deal party from the standpoint of sportsmanship at least should have been courageous enough to have made good on its boasts and to have called its convention before the Republican convention and courageously given to the world a recital of its accomplishments, if any, with a foreword for its future. It left it to the Republican Party to lay down the gage of battle.

Without equivocation the Republican platform meets the great war issue in a frontal attack. In the first paragraph, after the introduction, we say "The Republican Party is firmly opposed to involving this Nation in foreign war." The New Deal platform says:

The American people are determined that war raging in Europe, Asia, and Africa shall not come to America. We will not participate in foreign wars and we will not send our Army or Navy or air forces to fight in any foreign war outside the Americas, except in case of attack.

This statement was prepared to match the frank statement in the Republican platform but when it is considered in the light of Mr. Roosevelt's conduct of international affairs it rings of insincerity. Whatever words they employ must be interpreted in the light of Mr. Roosevelt's actions. The American people know that the President's actions have been boastful, reckless, and dangerous to our national safety.

LET US COMPARE THE PLATFORMS FURTHER

The New Deal platform says:

We pledge to continue our fair treatment of American war veterans and their dependents.

The President has always been hostile to the cause of the veterans, and the New Deal has refused to enact any legislation favorable to veterans. This platform promises to do no more than the President has done, which is to be hostile.

The Republican platform speaking on this subject says:

We pledge adequate compensation and care for veterans disabled in the service of our country and for their widows, orphans, and dependents.

The Republican Party has traditionally been the friend of the veteran.

The new dealers dispose of unemployment—one of our most important problems—by drawing around them the cloak of self-satisfaction with what they have done. They say "we have rescued millions from idleness," meaning that they put them on W. P. A. "We shall continue to recognize the obligation of government to provide work," and so forth. They then promise that they will call under the direction of the President a "national unemployment conference." If the solution is that easy, why was not such a conference called years ago? They then throw out this sop which is too childish to deceive. They say, "There is work in our factories, mines, fields, forests, and river basins, on our coast, highways, railroads, and inland waterways." Where is this work? Ten million idle persons would like to know.

Contrary to this typical New Deal view of the terrible plight of the unemployed of this country, let me read what the Republican platform says. It makes one think of what happened in America when McKinley was elected after the terrible panic during the previous Democratic administration. It says:

We propose to re-create opportunity for the youth of America and put our idle millions back to work in private industry, business, and agriculture. We propose to eliminate needless administrative restrictions, thus restoring lost motion to the wheels of individual enterprise.

This is a forthright promise to get rid of New Deal threats to business and New Deal wastefulness and give business a chance to go ahead and give employment to millions who are tired of the present system.

The Republican platform speaks out clearly on the labor question. It recognizes the great progress made by those who work in industry in advancing their economic welfare and promises to maintain that progress. It encourages collective bargaining so that those who employ and those who work may settle their own differences "directly and voluntarily across the table." The New Deal platform, in a flood of long sentences and beautiful words, makes it appear that all labor problems have been solved and that there is not much left to do. I wish the miners and many others in my district felt the same way about it. Let us not be deceived by high-sounding phrases. There are millions in organized labor out of employment and there are millions outside of organized labor who are unable to earn enough upon which to live. One-third of the workers in America live on less than $500 per year and two-thirds live on less than $1,000. Many of these are not within the protection of organized labor. They suffer just because the economic structure of our Nation has been torn down by New Deal theorists.

Promises of the new dealers to agriculture fall on deaf ears. The farmers know that their plight is a serious one, brought on by foolish experiments such as plowing up the crops and slaughtering the pigs and cattle. Mr. Wallace's doctrine of scarcity will be the mark of disgrace that time and history will put on the New Deal administration. How silly and unreasonable it is to pay for not raising a crop when millions are in dire need.

The Republican platform promises to provide employment to those millions who now are half fed and thereby stimulate the demand for the farm products. Give the consumer something with which to buy sufficient food, and the situation of agriculture will be greatly improved. The Republican platform says that—

The Republican Party will put into effect such governmental policies as will create increased consumer buying power for agricultural products.

It is common knowledge that the New Deal has its knife out for the insurance companies of the country. It wants to bring them, with their enormous resources, away from State supervision and under the supervision of the Corcorans and Cohens of the New Deal. Hidden away in the platform are these words:

We favor strict supervision of all forms of the insurance business by the several States for the protection of the policyholders and the people.

This means that they want to put insurance companies under the New Deal. They scent a chance to destroy the competition that insurance companies are giving to New Deal Government insurance of all kinds.

Contrast the forthright statement of the Republican platform. It says:

We condemn the New Deal attempts to destroy the confidence of our people in private insurance institutions. We favor continuance of regulation of insurance by the several States.

So on down through many instances that we could cite it can be seen that the New Deal platform is typically New Deal: It seeks to regiment the every activity, financial, economic, and physical, of our people.

The New Deal platform fails to mention the terrible debt under which the Nation is operating. The new dealers do not see anything worthy of mentioning in the fact that the receipts into the Public Treasury are only about sixteen million per day, yet the Government is spending nearly forty million per day. To owe the greatest debt that ever staggered any nation in the history of the world means nought to them.

Neither the international relations nor the great unemployment nor the terriffic debt worry the new dealers. Their minds are set on taking from him who has and giving to him who has not, without regard to the rights or responsibilities of either. Individual effort, individual courage, individual genius, individual thrift and sacrifice, according to the New Deal, have ceased to be American virtues. Stronger and stronger grows the Government in its power to control the every action of the individual. The New Deal platform seeks to give the individual a sedative and then to take from him his individual liberty.

THE TWO CANDIDATES

National campaigns are sometimes waged on issues and sometimes on the personality of the candidates and sometimes on both. The campaign of 1940 will have plenty of issues and plenty of personality. In 1920 when Harding and Cox, both from Ohio, waged their campaign, the personality of either was not stressed. The whole battle was waged on an issue of whether the United States should join the League of Nations. The people decided against joining the League of Nations and Harding won. The campaign of 1928 between Hoover and Al Smith was one of personalities. The people weighed the two men and appraised their character and availability. They chose Mr. Hoover not so much because of what he stood for politically as what he stood for personally. So in this campaign we will find two men with very unusual personalities. Both have charm and magnetism. Roosevelt has suavity and political cunning. Willkie has the vigor of youth, natural courtesy, warmth of personality, and a forcefulness begotten of courage and convictions.

There will be the third term, and the record made by Roosevelt, and the war situation with its future uncertain developments. Willkie will assail Roosevelt's record in many respects. Willkie's forceful character, aided by the vulnerability of the New Deal record, will put Roosevelt on the defensive. In attempting to explain his usurpation of the functions of the Government Roosevelt will be put to the limit of his sophistry. An explanation of how and when he expects to pay the colossal debt will probably require more than his usual expression "my friends." How he will remove from the minds of the people that he is, and has always been, for war, and that he has always been for universal conscription of boys and girls, will test his capacity for composing happy ambiguities. The New Deal "brain trusters" who have provided the strategy and ideas for the Roosevelt administration will be expected to furnish to their chief their best. Theorists thrive best when they are holding the political telescopes on calm water. There is where they can dream dreams and see visions. But when they are faced with stern opposition, where the waves beat high and the lightning flash and no theoretical stars can be seen, then they do not do so well. The campaign may bring Mr. Roosevelt to the realization of what a dollar means, and that the things that are are more realistic than the things that might be. This battle of personalities and issues will be one where beautiful phrases melodiously spoken must give way to sharp, short, meaningful words. Where the man on the white horse must get off and walk with the crowd. Where the chart and compass of certainty must displace the dreams of wild-eyed theorists. Willkie will demand to know by what witchery and legerdemain the New Deal has operated heretofore. The acid arrows of Ickes will not dent the shield or daunt the determination of this man Willkie who will push him back into obscurity, from whence he came. Neither the hand-picked Supreme Court nor the servile Morgenthau nor the Frankfurters nor the Altmeyers will prevent Willkie from showing the people just how the Government has been operated.

My friends, get ready for the greatest campaign of the century. A strong young man, with the convincing oratory of a Bryan, with the smashing personality of Teddy Roosevelt, is leading millions of Americans in a battle to return the Government to the people. Insincerity and excuses will not suffice. Usurpation of power and abandonment of priceless traditions of government must cease. Defiance of those homely virtues of thrift, decency, and common honesty have been carried too long and too far. Punitive government by threats and by encouraging class against class must be supplanted by a spirit of unity which will make America feel that we are again a Government of the people whose sole aim is to do what is best for the people.

Two conventions: One, with the freedom that marks things typically American, nominated the man that the delegates thought the people wanted. The other, reminiscent of Europe, listened to dictation. Who nominated Mussolini? Mussolini did. Who nominated Hitler? Hitler did. Who nominated Stalin? Stalin did. And who nominated Roosevelt? Roosevelt did. Will the analogy carry through? The fear it might is the principal reason why it will not.

The platforms: One without boasting or bombast promises to recapture the Government and restore it to the people. The other with boastful egotism justifies every act of the New Deal and promises more New Deal.

The candidates: One with a Messianic complex, from his pinnacle of power, looks down the corridors of the past and fails to see Washington or Jefferson or Jackson. He looks forward through the corridors of the future and thinks he sees himself as the indispensable man, the greatest man who ever lived.

The other, a typical country boy, who because of industry and character has been elevated to a high place in the professional and business world, having no illusions of greatness only those which may come to any American boy.

They match their wits in what promises to be a great conflict. "Mene, mene tekel upharsin." "Thou art weighed in the balances and art found wanting" once wrote the moving finger. So might it be to him who feels greater than Washington or Jefferson or Lincoln. The young man with a conviction that his cause is just has gone forth to battle. A feeling that he must save his country is his shield, and a confidence that the people expect him to champion their cause is his sword. May he remember that the strong do not always win the battle and neither do the swift always win the race, but that to the true and the faithful victory is always promised.

Allegiance to America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE L. HERRING
OF IOWA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 11 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY HON. GUY M. GILLETTE, OF IOWA

Mr. HERRING. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD an editorial embodying an able article written by my colleague, the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], appearing in the Geode Echo, a C. C. C. camp publication, New London, Iowa.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Geode Echo (C. C. C. camp publication of New London, Iowa)]

We wrote a letter to Hon. GUY M. GILLETTE, United States Senator from Iowa and an ex-service man, for an article for the Geode Echo. We are pleased to publish in this issue one of the most stirring articles that we have read in a long time. This article should have a wide circulation.

"WE ARE AMERICANS

"(By U. S. Senator GUY M. GILLETTE)

"In these troublesome times, it is well for each of us to remember that the struggle for freedom dates back through the years. Our own Nation won its independence late in the history of the world. We are the youngest of nations, and yet, we are the oldest democracy. For over 150 years our people have had great national problems and out of this fire of trouble, we have forged a great Nation. A great man wrote our Declaration of Independence, but he was only putting into written form the aspirations, hopes, struggles, and sufferings of millions of men and women with the spark of liberty in their hearts and souls. It has been the determination of our people to preserve, at any sacrifice, this heritage that has made our Nation great.

"Washington faced a seemingly hopeless struggle with his starving army at Valley Forge. Andrew Jackson had the difficulties of serious national problems. Abraham Lincoln was called to serve them when his own people were in armed conflict of brother against brother. Time and again in our short national history our people have faced grim problems. Only the courage, faith, and confidence of noble citizens prevented our ruin. Patriotism is not the voice of one man or one group. It means the contributions that you and I and every other true American make to the cause.

"As individuals we have serious problems. I have spent sleepless nights of worry. Day after day, I have listened to the sad stories of fine people; a farmer losing his homestead after a lifetime of hard work; an honest laborer with family trying vainly to find a job; a businessman forced to abandon his factory with hundreds depending upon its operation; young men full of ambition and hope stifled in their effort to find a place in life. All of us have faced these conditions. We have tried to solve our problems and we must continue to do so.

"Taking our current problems with all the courage and confidence with which Americans of the past faced their difficulties, we have made tremendous strides in the direction of full solution and the betterment of the condition of all classes of our citizens.

"As individuals we have the right to protest against incompetency, indifference, and dishonesty of our officials. As individuals we have the right of free speech, freedom to write what we please, and privileges of petition to duly constituted authority. In our individual distress, we may cry out against conditions. Yet, as individuals we must realize that enjoyment of these rights demands full allegiance to the country that makes them possible. This allegiance must be complete in action, sympathy, and loyalty.

"On many an occasion in the past few years, I have tried to emphasize this complete and undiluted allegiance to our democracy and way of life. Regardless of our forefathers, we are now Americans. It is natural that we should remember the traditions and customs of the land of our forebears, but today we cannot let even a taint of that memory interfere with the good of America. There is no such hybrid as an English-American, German-American, Irish-American, or any other kind where there is even a partial conflict in loyalty.

"Each one of us enjoys 100 percent of all the rights and privileges of an American. There is no qualification to these rights. There can be no less than 100 percent loyalty to our country. With an American there cannot be even a small corner of our heart pledged to any other land. There is no such thing as dual allegiance. In these days of conflict we must all be American in the complete sense of the word. The Stars and Stripes form the banner representing American traditions, American heritage, and American institutions and our way of life. Any citizen who permits partial allegiance to any other symbol to even subconsciously influence his action is doing himself and his country a disservice. Any man, group, or party that even by inference suggest the solution of our American problems by appeal to racial or national loyalties other than our own in these days, treads the dangerous ground of treason. Every drop of our blood must be undiluted 100 percent American. Our heritage of freedom that we now enjoy is not ours to defile. These inherited rights and liberties must be maintained and passed on to another generation of American children."

Labor and the Preparedness Program—Conscription

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 11 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

LABOR DAY ADDRESS BY JOHN L. LEWIS

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by John L. Lewis on Labor Day. In the past I have very frequently disagreed with Mr. Lewis on public questions, and doubtless will frequently disagree with him in the future; but on Labor Day I happened to tune in on a superb address on the subject of the relationship of labor with the preparedness program, and also on the subject of conscription, which I think is one of the most masterly addresses to which I have ever listened. I am glad to take this opportunity to request that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am happy to extend greetings and my sincere good wishes to the hosts of labor who are assembled in countless gatherings throughout the country today.

Labor Day in 1940 finds labor and the things in which labor believes more in jeopardy than at any time during the history of the modern labor movement. The fears and tensions created by the wars in Europe have stirred to new effort the traditional enemies of labor. Some who have called themselves labor's friends are, through fear, scurrying to join the enemies of labor, hoping to gain for themselves a sort of dubious security.

I am glad to report that the Congress of Industrial Organizations and its affiliates are stronger than ever. I am cheered by that fact. I have just returned from a trip which took me to the far corners of the country. I was deeply impressed by the growing strength of the C. I. O., by the eagerness for organization on the part of those workers who have not yet had the opportunity to organize, and by the unanimity with which the common people of the country look to the C. I. O. for leadership in these trying days.

The C. I. O. has many hundreds of thousands of new members added to its ranks since last Labor Day. Each day brings new information of workers organized, of unions created, of elections won.

It is a high tribute to the common sense and intelligence of American workers that the campaign of vituperation and false attack against the C. I. O. has failed to dim their conviction that their needs will best be served by organization into industrial unions.

The few remaining bastions of antiunionism in American industry are under fresh attack. Let me cite examples—the magnificent Steel Workers Organizing Committee is concentrating fresh efforts against that violator of workers' rights, the Bethlehem Steel Corporation. When the Bethlehem Steel Corporation finally is brought to the point of recognizing that it does not stand above all men and above all government, that phenomenon will have been brought about, not by the Government, not by the courts, but by the strength of the organized workers alone.

The great United Automobile Workers' Union, revitalized and unified, now stronger than it ever was, is joining the C. I. O. in its efforts to bring the benefits of organization to the aircraft workers of the Nation. In the aviation industry, one of the richest and most pampered of our growing industries, the workers are working 50 and 60 hours a week for hourly wages that are one-third less than those earned by their brothers at the same work in the automobile factories. Already several great aviation companies are dealing peacefully with our unions. Many more will soon be doing so. The C. I. O. will extend every effort to bring organization to the aircraft workers without interruption of production. We ask only that the aircraft companies also cooperate to this end.

The great majority of workers in the construction industry, long unorganized and neglected, are being offered the opportunity for a great industrial union by the United Construction Workers' Organizing Committee, which has just celebrated its first anniversary. That union is moving forward with increasing strength. Its success will not only benefit the workers of the construction industry, but will unloose the genius of this Nation for efficient production in the building field. Already, as the result of this union's existence, improvements in technique have taken place in building construction, which promise better and cheaper homes for the people of the United States.

I could give you the same account for a number of other unions, steadily and faithfully pursuing their aim of bringing the benefits of organization to American workers. The national C. I. O has an enlarged and strengthened headquarters staff for organization, and it is devoting all of its increased income to the work of industrial organization, so that no man or working woman of these United States who wants to be in a union with his fellow workers may go without that opportunity.

With this new and growing strength, the C. I. O. confidently offers to take its place in the national defense of the Nation. It has publicly and officially declared its desire to add all strength to sound efforts to preserve our democracy and our Nation. Our people have worked diligently that American industrial workers should play their part in effective production.

There are men in high places in the Nation today who do not want labor to participate in the national effort. They do not want labor to participate because they know that labor's voice will be raised against their efforts to pervert the idea of national defense to the service of private greed.

One cry these persons raise is the accusation that in the Republic of France, it was labor and labor's influence in the Government which prevented the effective production of war material. This falsehood has been repeated in many places. It is used to hint or to say outright that similarly in this country labor is responsible, or will be responsible, for delays in national defense.

The circulation of this vicious falsehood should be stopped now. French labor was not responsible for France's failure to arm adequately, no matter what may be the wishful thinking of some millionaire ambassadors. The French financial powers and armament kings deliberately sabotaged French arms manufacture to destroy the gains of French organized workers, and to preserve their own profitable privileges. With the connivance of the financial powers of Britain, they deliberately destroyed a government in France in which labor had a voice, heartlessly turning their nation and the working people of their nation into the hands of the French politicians who betrayed the nation to the Nazis. At the height of French preparation, only 49,000 workers were employed in the vital aircraft industry, as contrasted with the 200,000 men employed in German plants in similar production.

In Britain, too, certain arms manufacturers have refused to expand their facilities or to extend their efforts for the armament of Great Britain, because such action might disturb their easy profit. Until the Nazi Army stood on the shores of the English Channel and leaders of labor were put in the Cabinet to speed the production of arms, the British financial powers and arms manufacturers pursued their leisurely way, uninterested in anything but the most effortless profit.

Today, in the United States, the financial powers and the arms manufacturers are beginning to pursue the same course. Their agents have been placed as the responsible representatives of government and the people have no check-up on them.

For months now, large and key industries of the Nation have refused to accept national-defense orders and to expand their manufacturing facilities—because it might not be profitable enough. They have demanded of this administration and of Congress that just and proper taxes be put aside. They have served notice that they require that new plants be given to them free. They have turned aside from national-defense orders, upon which profit was limited to a meager 8 percent, that they might accept 18-percent profit upon orders from Great Britain. Openly and boldly they have served notice upon the Government that they do not intend to manufacture for national defense until their conditions are met.

Today the Government of the United States continues to enrich by extensive Government contracts many of the corporations who have most outrageously violated the law of the United States, the National Labor Relations Act. It is most incredible to me that this Government should continue to provide aid and comfort to the very violators of the laws which it is under obligation to enforce.

Your representatives have gone to the United States Congress, where three times the Senate has passed measures to end this abuse, and three times the measure has been scuttled by a small group of leaders in the House of Representatives. We have appealed to the President of the United States, asking him to take, upon what we are convinced is a sound legal basis, the proper Executive steps to prevent Government contracts being given to law violators. There has been no action from that quarter. We have called upon the National Defense Commission to rectify this continuing injustice.

It passes my understanding by what logic corporations who have boldly and openly violated the law of the United States continue to receive profitable national-defense contracts, while labor's rights are trampled underfoot.

Last year, on Labor Day, I warned our people that the Nation was drifting toward war, because the Nation's leadership, political and industrial, was too bankrupt of idea and energy to meet our domestic problems face to face. Within the year, we have moved farther down the same path, and now we stand closer to the brink of involvement in war, an involvement which labor abhors.

Labor recognizes that there are dangers abroad in the world, against which we must be prepared to defend ourselves. Let there be no doubt that American workingmen will be in the front lines against any who seek to attack the integrity of our Nation.

We believe there is now no cause for hysteria, and that those who seek to create hysteria do it for no good purpose. We can arm ourselves and train ourselves properly without excitement and without chaos. The purpose of excitement is to put over on the American people things they would never accept after calm examination. The purpose of excitement is to withdraw the minds of the people from their overpowering domestic concerns and to get them to turn their faces abroad.

One of the purposes of creating hysteria is to pass a bill providing for peacetime military conscription. All labor, church people, and the common people of the country are unified in opposition to such a measure. The proponents of such conscription knew that only through the creation of hysteria could they guarantee the passage of the bill.

The auspices under which the proposals of peacetime military conscription have been raised are very doubtful. Those who initiated the bill, and who have introduced it in Congress, are persons whose record of opposition to measures for the welfare of the people generally is consistent. Peacetime conscription has become one of the major planks in the platform of reaction, standing beside calls for repeal of the Fair Labor Standards Act, for the scuttling of the National Labor Relations Act, for the destruction of our civil liberties.

Opposition to peacetime military conscription does not mean opposition to adequate national defense. We can, in this country, with some effort and some reasonableness, establish conditions for enlistment which would guarantee an army suitable for our needs. For example, the period of enlistment should be shortened to 1 year. The pay should be raised at least to compare with that of a self-respecting workman. The right to return to private employment should be protected. Provision should be made for the continuation of social-security protection during the period of enlistment. Private debts should either be assumed or suspended. The upper ranks of the Army should be opened more freely to the ranks of enlisted men, so that an Army career is open to a private. Under conditions like these, there is no question in my mind that the young men of the country would provide by enlistment an Army sufficient to our needs. There has been no proper trial of enlistment, and the Army has made no proper attempt to make the voluntary method a success.

Military conscription now would establish the principle in this country that the lives of our young men are less privileged than the profit rights of dollars. The present program seems to call for the conscription of men while wealth retains its privileges.

Organized labor knows better than any other group in the population how quickly peacetime military conscription would break down our civil liberties. It would immediately establish the principle of compulsion by government, and in effect make opposition to government policy a crime. That would be the beginning of the end of our democratic way of life.

There is further something sinister about the attempt to force conscription upon our Nation, with no revelation of the purposes for which conscription is sought. What kind of a foreign policy, what kind of a military and naval policy demands an army of four million? The American people want to know whether the plans behind the conscript army provide for an expeditionary force.

Labor believes that national defense is more than building great armories of airplanes, tanks, and guns. Labor believes that national defense means the creation of a nation of strong, healthy, and happy people, dedicated to the belief that the democratic way is the best way of living. An army of 4,000,000 conscripts cannot save our Nation if the people doubt whether it is worth saving. Two million automatic rifles and 50,000 airplanes cannot make a nation strong whose heart is weak.

The building of arms alone will not solve our problems. There are 10,000,000 people unemployed today. The present program of arms would employ at best two or two and one-half million within the next year. Meanwhile the pressure of technology goes on apace with machines replacing men. The steel industry has reported making five and one-half million tons of steel in June 1940. In August 1937 they produced five and one-half million tons of steel. But in 1937 there were 603,000 employees; in June 1940, 535,000, fewer workers by 68,000. The building of arms will not end unemployment.

This Nation is the richest in the world, and it could be much richer if its people had their share of its riches. Last year the Nation produced a national income of $69,000,000,000. We could, with our unemployed labor and with our industrial capacity, produce at least $100,000,000,000. We could, in short, produce $6,000,000,000 of arms and still raise the national income $25,000,000,000. And next year we could increase it. A program to accomplish this end is the kind of program labor envisages for real defense of the Nation.

Our unemployed are not all going to be busy building barracks for the Army. Our industrial plants are not going to be operating at full capacity making arms. All of our vast idle farm lands are not going to be occupied growing beans for Army chow. We have the power and the capacity to be a richer nation next year, even if we have to pour 10 percent of our national income into arms.

There are plenty of men and women in this Nation who need and can well use the things that our idle men and plants and farms can produce. We must not forget that two-thirds of all our American families are receiving less than $1,500 a year, and the average of these families is only $826. Four million families in these United States received less than $312 a year. That is only about one-half of what it costs the United States Army to keep a private in the Army.

There are at least five and one-half millions of old people who have spent their lives in honest toil, and who now have earned a decent and secure old age. There are, too, four or five million young men and women out of school and eager to work, but with no opportunity offered them.

Millions of our people lack health service or proper housing, or even adequate food.

These are the holes in our national defense. In the hearts of these people are the vulnerable spots of our fortress. Let us give our people strength to fight off the invader.

Labor, too, does not forget that not from the ranks of labor in the European nations have come the traitors who aided the Fascist countries.

It requires no stupendous intellect to understand that the total defense of our Nation and its free institutions requires enthusiastic participation and cooperation of all segments of our population. Obviously, a defense program which ignores the rights of labor and fails to give its leaders adequate participation in the Nation's defense councils will be less than efficient and will contribute to the increased jeopardy of the Nation.

A defense program administered solely by profit-mad millionaires will be a failure. If our seat of government at Washington is to become a Mecca for the avaricious in finance and in industry, and if rapacity and greed in defense expenditure is to be unrestrained, then confidence will be struck down and despair and bitterness will become the portion of the people. It is time for Americans to cooperate, each with the other, upon a basis of good faith and common objectives. It is time for our statesmen and our Government to recognize the rights of labor and the common people in the emergency which is here. It is time for the Government to avail itself of the great strength of the democratic instrumentalities of our community life.

Labor demands adequate representation upon the policy-making agencies of government. Labor demands adequate representation and not on the basis that now exists of 1 lonely representative of labor to 100 millionaires. The ancient and puissant British Empire found it necessary to invoke and accept labor's aid, labor's policies, and labor's statesmen. Why should the combined forces of wealth and politics in our own land cling to the pitiful belief that they can do any less?

Within the coming months and years, labor and the common people of the country, the aged, the youth, the Negroes, have several choices to make about their leadership. They must decide whether the two major political parties, constituted and directed as they are, can fulfill the Nation's needs. These decisions will be made upon the basis of what our present political leaders do to meet the needs of our people.

Our great domestic problems remain unsolved. Unemployment, which is the greatest of the questions which confront us, still menaces our prosperity, our security, and our happiness. For years labor, farmers, and others have unceasingly called for a national conference on this subject. No steps have been taken, and no plans have been made for the abatement of this monstrous evil. Those who believe that the making of guns will solve the question of national unemployment have little comprehension and smaller understanding of the play of the world's economic forces.

With the coming of peace between the warring nations will also come a new and terrible depression of catastrophic proportions. We cannot wait until its arrival to lay plans and devise measures to meet it. It is time for Americans to take counsel. It is time for American statesmen to give some attention to their own Nation and its own problems. It is time for all Americans to become articulate and to demand consideration of American problems if America as we know it is to be preserved.

Comment by Mr. Villard on Speech of Secretary Wallace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD R. BURKE
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, September 11 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE FROM OMAHA WORLD-HERALD

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD a newspaper article under the heading "Villard Says Wallace Speech Is New Low in United States Politics," written by Oswald Garrison Villard, appearing in the Omaha (Nebr.) World-Herald of the 8th instant.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Omaha World-Herald of September 8, 1940]

VILLARD SAYS WALLACE SPEECH IS NEW LOW IN UNITED STATES POLITICS—CALLS "US OR HITLER" TALK DISGRACEFUL

(By Oswald Garrison Villard)

Two weeks ago I told a group of friends that before this campaign was over, probably in October, the President would set afloat the slogan that "a vote for Willkie is a vote for Hitler." They were not convinced, but here we have Henry Wallace in his acceptance speech actually stooping as low as to utter what amounts to that. It seems to me a new low for American politics, and I am astounded that as fine a man as Henry Wallace has been would lend himself to anything of the kind.

Of all the proofs that we have had that the United States has lost its balance, none can be more convincing than that. It is hitting below the belt. It shows that the camp of the third-termers is badly frightened, since it proves they have thrown over their last vestige of sportsmanship. They seek to identify an honorable opponent with the most utterly despicable man in the world—Hitler—and if there is any sense of fair play left among the American people it will recoil upon the heads of both Mr. Wallace and Mr. Roosevelt.

PROVOCATION NO EXCUSE

Nor can it be excused because Mr. Willkie had the bad taste to charge the President with having "unscrupulously encouraged" other countries to expect more help from us than we can give. That phrase is one of the defenses advanced by Harold Ickes in a letter to the New York Times for the violent and abusive language which he used about Mr. Willkie.

If your opponent has been guilty of bad taste, that does not excuse your doing the same thing. But Mr. Wallace's offense goes far beyond bad taste. It is also an inexcusable attribution of motives for which there is not the shadow of a reason. To assert that the Republicans are the party of appeasement and that Berlin will rejoice if Roosevelt is defeated is to make a statement for which Mr. Wallace can give no basis of fact as to his first statement, and no ethical reason for the second.

BOTH OPPOSE HITLER

Undoubtedly Hitler will be glad to see Roosevelt defeated, but to say that for the purpose of misleading the American people, in order to tie Mr. Willkie up with the Nazis and distract their attention from the domestic issues upon which they should decide the election, verges on the disgraceful.

Hitler is not the issue. Both candidates are against him, and Mr. Willkie has declared he will beat him if he comes this way. Both are for preparedness and for conscription. Mr. Willkie has been as outspoken against Hitler as Roosevelt. That he should be charged in the face of that with being a front for Hitler is to me evidence that Mr. Wallace and his partner in the third-term venture realize they have a most vulnerable front to present to the voters—that at any cost they must keep their fellow citizens from appraising their record, from objectively assaying the worth of their contributions to American life and where Mr. Wallace's farm policies from pig killing up have landed us all.

WHAT WILL EUROPE THINK?

What will Europeans think of such an exhibition? If there ever was a year in which the debate prior to the election should be on the highest plane, this is it. Never was there a better or a more needed chance to show to the despots abroad the dignity, the reasonableness, the calmness of our great people in a historic emergency—democracy at its best. Yet the welkin rings with fierce personal denunciations.

The committee headed by the venerable and once kindly William Allen White advertises all over the country that anyone who dares to doubt its belief that Hitler intends to attack the United States is "either a fool or a traitor!" One must believe absolutely with them or be branded. They alone know the truth and just what Hitler has in mind.

Well, one must, I suppose, expect that sort of thing from some of the passionate individuals who compose that committee, but that Henry Wallace should place himself on their level remains for me one of the saddest of spectacles. And I must add that the effect upon me has almost been to make me finally decide to vote for Wendell Willkie. One or two more such speeches, and I most certainly will.

Communism in the Entertainment Unions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 11, 1940

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, since my explanation on July 4 of the fundamental reason for the demise of the Federal theater project, I have received a volume of protests, commendations, and some information. I believe it is only fair that the denials and protests of those persons I named as being Communists should go into this RECORD. As mentioned in my last remarks on this subject, Mr. Alan Hewitt protested, as did Robert E. Sherwood and S. N. Behrman in his behalf. These protests follow:

PRINCETON, N. J., July 9, 1940.

Representative LAMBERTSON,
House Office Building:

I deeply resent your allegation in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that I am a Communist. Nothing I have said or done at any time in or out of meetings of the Equity Council could possibly be construed to indicate even the remotest sympathy with communism. I think I am entitled to know what were the sources of your completely erroneous information, since the Nation-wide publicity which has been given your statement has done enormous injury to my professional reputation and personal integrity. As a loyal American citizen who believes and supports the Constitution with the fullest measure of devotion, I request an immediate apology and a public retraction of your unjust, unfounded, and untrue charge.

ALAN HEWITT.

NEW YORK, N. Y., July 12, 1940.

Representative WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON,
House Office Building:

We know Alan Hewitt and can say positively that the charge of communism against him is unjust. He has never attended a Communist meeting and feels the reverse of everything implied by the term communism.

For further confirmation we can be reached at the Playwrights Co., 630 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

S. N. BEHRMAN and ROBERT E. SHERWOOD.

My reply of August 28 to Mr. Hewitt follows:

DEAR MR. HEWITT: I wish to acknowledge your protest of my characterization of you as a Communist. I have received many protests in your behalf, some from people of doubtful affiliations and many from true Americans of unimpeachable loyalty to their country.

As I have already stated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, if I have done you an injustice, I will publicly acknowledge my error gladly. My present information, however, shows you have consistently followed the Communist Party line in your conduct as an Actors' Equity Association councilor, and if you are an "innocent" in these actions, I am forced to believe you are an innocent stooge at best.

One recent example will suffice to show to what I refer.

My investigation of the Actors' Equity Association meeting of May 24 shows that a so-called neutrality resolution was introduced by William E. Watts, of the Group Theater and the Theater Arts Committee, two Communist-front organizations.

The official report of the meeting comments on this resolution: "* * * the Chair (was sustained) in its ruling that a resolution which would have committed Equity to nonparticipation in any aspect of the war, or preparation for it, was out of order."

Paul Turner, Actors' Equity Association council, said the resolution was out of order. Frank Gillmore, president emeritus, gave his opinion that the resolution was out of order. Bert Lytell, president, ruled it out of order. Then Robert Reed and Harold Bolton, known radicals, moved to overrule the president.

There were just two votes by council members in favor of this motion to overrule the president. Those two votes were Philip Loeb's and yours. I would be interested to learn why you thus voted alone among the councilors with Philip Loeb, about whose affiliations and loyalties there can hardly remain any intelligent doubt, to besmirch the name of your organization by recording it in favor of an obviously Moscow-inspired resolution.

Sincerely,

W. P. LAMBERTSON.

Mr. Hewitt probably has not had time to reply to my letter as yet. If he has an explanation I shall be glad to put it in the RECORD.

Miss Edith Van Cleve has sent me no denial of my charge of her communistic leanings. I did read in the newspapers a statement from her similar to that of Mr. Hewitt. I should like to repeat, once more, Mr. Speaker, my belief that Miss Van Cleve and Mr. Hewitt are what the Communists themselves call professional stooges. The records show that Miss Van Cleve has consistently supported the Communist element in Equity over a number of years. I am not for one moment maintaining that all members who ever supported the Forum in Equity are tainted with communism. As in all these "boring-from-within" fractions, the Communists attract and deceive and use for their own ends many liberal Americans. However, when we find a certain individual supporting Mr. Philip Loeb on purely political questions, as did Mr. Hewitt, or when we find another individual supporting Mr. Loeb, Mr. Heller, et al., on every important issue, without deviation over a long period of time, as has Miss Van Cleve, to my mind there is definite evidence of the same slavish following of the party line that is so obvious in every Communist-front group or organization.

And at this point, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that I am sick and tired of the quibbles over the exact classification of Communist Party members, Communist fellow travelers, and Communist professional stooges. They themselves purposely create these various classes as part of their obscuration tactics. As a matter of practical effect to the people of the United States, there is no difference whatsoever in the harm that all three classes inflict on us.

AN ACHIEVEMENT IN EVASION

On August 5, when I last spoke on this subject, I had been given the impression that the entire matter was to be brought to the attention of the membership of Actors' Equity Association through the pages of Equity, the official magazine of the union. I had informed the officers that if it was not desirable to give it space in Equity, the Government Printing Office would reprint my remarks at very small cost, and thus they could be sent to the membership. I received the following letter dated August 7 from Mr. Paul Dullzell, executive secretary:

DEAR MR. LAMBERTSON: At a meeting of our council yesterday, all of the correspondence between us, and the letters which our council member, Miss Maida Reade, received from you, were read, together with the opinion from our legal department concerning the material you requested to be printed in Equity magazine.

The opinion of our legal department is that as the Equity magazine circulates outside of our membership, an untrue statement or a statement which we may not be able to prove, published by us, that any of our members are Communists, which may result in some special damage suffered by such members, would lay the association open to lawsuits and claims for damages. As we read your own letters we find at least a doubt that we may publish this material with impunity, if not a direct intimation that we may be held accountable for it in an action for publishing libelous matter.

Our council, therefore, determined that it would not be wise to publish this matter at this time. After the investigation by Representative DIES or any other duly constituted agency, we will undoubtedly take the matter up again for consideration by our council.

Sincerely yours,

ACTORS' EQUITY ASSOCIATION,
By PAUL DULLZELL.

I replied as follows to Mr. Dullzell on August 13:

DEAR MR. DULLZELL:

In answer to your letter of August 7, I would appreciate a copy of the opinion from your legal department which you mention. In view of the fact that my statements were published in the New York Times, the New York Herald Tribune, Variety, and many other newspapers and periodicals, the decision puzzles and interests me. Apparently your magazine Equity is the only publication which fears to mention in print the names of your council members I have charged with communism. This seems very strange indeed.

Such lawsuits as you fear might result from your publication of my statements could only be started, if at all, by your councilors I have named; and a simple release from them would protect the Actors' Equity Association. Please inform me which of your councilors involved refused to give a release to your association.

The entire conduct of your council in this situation appears to me to be an achievement in evasion. Therefore I have concluded it of utmost importance to make my material available to your membership. As your council did not reply to my offer contained in my letter to you of August 2, to have the material reprinted by the Government Printing Office, I have decided to have this done myself and to mail it to your membership. I would therefore appreciate receiving from you a mailing list of the members of the Actors' Equity Association.

Although I sent you with my letter of July 26 a copy of my letter of July 11, I have not yet received a reply to that letter. As I had not, in my original comment, stated that the Actors' Equity Council is "dominated and controlled by Communists," I could not and do not now understand your resolution so quoting me. However, the council's action in reversing its decision to print my statements in Equity and thus attempting to conceal my charges from the membership would lead anyone to believe the council is dominated and controlled by those councilors charged with communism.

In this connection and referring to my request for the names of the councilors voting for and against your resolution of July 10, would you kindly explain the following quotation from your letter of July 25? You state as a reason the vote might not be given me "inasmuch further as these discussions made it evident that the vote was determined by matters not pertinent to the issues involved." Is this the customary method of arriving at decisions of such importance to your organization?

Please acknowledge receipt of this letter and advise me whether you will bring it to the attention of the council, and if so, when.

Sincerely,

W. P. LAMBERTSON.

Having received no acknowledgment or reply from Mr. Dullzell, I wrote the president of Equity August 21, stating that fact and enclosing a copy of my August 13 letter, asking Mr. Lytell if he would answer it and take the entire episode up at the next meeting of the council.

At the same time I wrote Actors' Equity Association headquarters enclosing a copy of the August 13 letter and asking that it be brought to the attention of another Equity official, in case Mr. Dullzell should be away, and also to the council at its next meeting.

Mr. Speaker, on this 11th day of September, I am still awaiting an acknowledgment or reply to any of these three letters. And I wish to call particular attention to the fact that in my letter of August 13 I again requested a reply to a letter of mine of July 11, a copy of which I had sent Mr. Dullzell on July 26, because he had said he had not received the original.

I have requested the postal authorities to investigate this nondelivery of my letter of July 11 to Mr. Dullzell. Since that time I have received letters from two officers of Actors' Equity Association, which may or may not be of some significance in this situation.

This is an excerpt from one letter:

I found your letter, addressed to me care of Equity, had been forwarded to my hotel; and, strange to say, it had been opened. This is the first time any of my mail has been so treated. The explanation being that it was not marked "personal"; so I would suggest that in any future correspondence you write me to the above (hotel) address.

The other letter contains this sentence:

I would suggest your writing to me at my home address.

To complete this picture, permit me to read a statement in my possession made by George Kondolf, former director of the W. P. A. Federal Theater Project in New York City:

GEORGE KONDOLF,
New York City, August 12, 1940.

On January 27, 1939, following an appearance by me at a meeting of the Council of Actors Equity Association, I wrote a letter to the association requesting that a certain committee from the council be set up to investigate and report back to the council on what to me was a serious political situation involving Equity on the Federal Theater Project of which I was the local director. When, after several days had elapsed and I had received no answer, I learned from two members of the council that they had been told the letter was never received. This in spite of the fact that I had personally verified the mailing of the letter from the project office as I felt its receipt by Equity to be most important.

On February 8, I again wrote to Equity and enclosed a copy of my original letter. This letter was acknowledged promptly.

GEORGE KONDOLF.

To go back to August 13, I wrote on that date to Mr. Bert Lytell, president of Actors Equity Association, in response to a letter from him which he asked me to keep confidential.

Since my letter raises a few questions which I believe are also in the minds of my colleagues in Congress I introduce it here:

DEAR MR. LYTELL: Thank you very much for your letter of August 8 and for the encouragement it gives me. Our conversation the other evening was also appreciated. I do believe that if the entertainment field can be rid of subversive elements in important positions, there is a good chance of the ban against a Federal theater being removed. That makes it worth while to me to carry on.

I note that you represent the Actors' Equity Association on the A. G. V. A. board, and you, no doubt, are informed regarding the resignation of eight members on that board mentioned in Variety July 24, page 37. In this connection I am enclosing a copy of a letter I have written Hoyt Haddock. I should like to know if the Council of the Actors' Equity Association is informed of this situation in A. G. V. A., as I understand the Equity Association sponsored this organization.

I appreciate your explanation of the American Jubilee matter. I was not under the impression this was a leftist quarrel. I deplored the very bad reception the Equity Association received from the press and the public in this situation. This, I think, was due to the numerous communistic controversies in which the Equity Association had figured, such as the drive against Finnish relief benefits.

Regarding your remarks on the Finnish relief benefits, I have never doubted, and have so stated many times, the patriotism and generosity of the great majority of the members of your profession. Nevertheless, as you will recall, being in the forefront of the fight, the few actors and actresses you mention who took the obviously Communist-inspired position against these benefits were able to smear the whole profession and stir up a disgraceful battle on the subject.

Your executive secretary, Mr. Paul Dullzell, expressed Equity's sentiments against the Finnish relief benefits repeatedly in the press at that time, although he was opposed by almost every reputable theatrical leader. It seems to me that in this case, which caused great trouble and attracted great attention, your executive secretary, Mr. Paul Dullzell, was fighting the battle of the Communists. I understand he has great influence in your organization. I hope to hear from you in reply to the above and also regarding the further matter you mention.

Sincerely,

W. P. LAMBERTSON.

VAUDEVILLE ACTORS TOSSED FROM WHITEHEAD TO COMMUNISTS

Mr. Hoyt Haddock was appointed executive secretary of the American Guild of Variety Artists in February of this year, over the protests of William Green and Matthew Woll of the A. F. of L. My understanding is that the American Federation of Radio Artists sponsored Mr. Haddock through its attorney, Henry Jaffe. Mr. Haddock took exception to my pinning a "red" tag to him, as follows:

AMERICAN GUILD OF VARIETY ARTISTS,
New York City, July 9, 1940.

REPRESENTATIVE LAMBERTSON: I understand that your statement of yesterday, "Hoyt Haddock, a former C. I. O. organizer of distinct Communist sympathies," while wholly untrue, is not a libelous statement; and if it were libelous, that you, because of your Congressional immunity, cannot be sued irrespective of the complete falsity of your statement and the unfair advantage which you as a Congressman can take by circulating false rumors about American citizens.

For your information, I was never a C. I. O. organizer and have never been a functionary in any C. I. O. union. With regard to the second part of your statement, I am neither a Communist nor a Communist sympathizer, and I never have been.

It is regrettable indeed that in America, where democracy is now withstanding a tremendous onslaught from foreign dictators, an official who is charged with the duties of upholding our democratic processes takes such cowardly advantage of any citizen by attempting to besmirch his character.

Since your statement is wholly unsupported in fact, it is indeed puzzling to understand how a man in your position can utter such untruths. If you are an American, and if you believe in democracy, you will publicly state that your statements are incorrect. If, on the other hand, you remain silent, you will have demonstrated that in this instance you have little respect for the truth.

Very truly yours,

HOYT S. HADDOCK,
National Executive Secretary.

Now he says that my charges are wholly unsupported in fact and charges me with uttering untruths; so, in his case, I thought it would be best to go rather fully into details. I wrote him as follows:

AUGUST 2, 1940.

Mr. HOYT S. HADDOCK,
National Executive Secretary, American Guild of Variety Artists, 1650 Broadway, New York City.

DEAR MR. HADDOCK: I have your protest of July 9 against my characterization of yourself as a Communist, and if I am in error will naturally be glad to offer a public retraction.

According to the records of the Special Committee on Un-American Activities, under the chairmanship of Hon. MARTIN DIES, you have participated in, sponsored, or were otherwise identified with the following:

National Congress for Unemployment and Social Insurance.

Petition to grant pardons to McNamara and Schmidt.

Trade Union Sponsoring Committee for a Labor Party Conference.

National Council, American Youth Congress.

I also quote from the hearings of the Dies committee, pages 6525 and 6526, as follows:

"Mr. MCCUISTION (after examining). Yes; at the extreme right of the picture is Jack Lawrenson, the only Communist that was on the Marine Firemen's, Oilers', and Watertenders' strike committee, who is at present an official of the N. M. U.

"The next picture is of Hoyt Haddock, former president of the American Radio Telegraphists' Association, and a member of the Communist Party. I recruited him into the Communist Party myself years ago, and he is at present still a Communist and the marine personnel manager for the Standard Oil in New York, working in that job now. * * *

"In connection with this * * * They made a tour of all Gulf ports and all tanker ports of the country together. That is Haddock's job; he is more or less simply a trade-union adviser.

"Mr. THOMAS. He is a sort of contact man, then, rather than a personnel man?

"Mr. MCCUISTION. He is. He is called "personnel man," but he is a contact man for the Standard Oil.

"Mr. THOMAS. Is he on the pay roll of the Standard Oil?

"Mr. MCCUISTION. He is on the pay roll of the Standard Oil admittedly, and he deals with the unions as an official of the Standard Oil. I have talked with him myself as an official of the union.

"Mr. THOMAS. You said he is a member of the Communist Party?

"Mr. MCCUISTION. Yes; an admitted member of the Communist Party.

"Mr. THOMAS. What is his full name? Give his full name, please.

"Mr. MCCUISTION. Hoyt Haddock. The Standard Oil knows it, too, because he has never denied he is a member of the Communist Party."

I should be pleased to consider any explanations you may wish to offer in connection with the above quotation.

Another reference to yourself is to be found in We Accuse, published by Jerry King, et al., and from which the following is taken:

"Charge No. 3: Wherein Joe Curran alleges that I accepted money from the Standard Oil to 'sabotage the oil agreement.' That is a lie. In my opinion, if any sabotage existed, it was planned and executed by some of the chief negotiators of that agreement, a self-admitted Communist, Jack Lawrenson, and Hoyt Haddock—who was formerly head of the A. R. T. A., and who was working for the Standard Oil Co. at the time.

"It seems more than peculiar, to say the least, that Haddock found it necessary to associate with members of union's negotiating committee so frequently at the union hall. The fact that he found it necessary to frequent the company of Tommy Ray, Al Lannon, and other well-known members of the Communist Party together with some members of the negotiating committee so often during this period should be significant, to say the least, to even the most casual observer. Why Haddock should have found it necessary to go about circulating the 'whisper' that I was a 'superlabor spy' as far back as that time—during these negotiations—also puzzles me very much, I must confess. Dozens of radio operators can verify that statement."

Pages 175–176. Hoyt Haddock:

"Comrade Hoyt Haddock, formerly president of the radio operators' A. R. T. A. now the A. C. A. has been actively associated with C. P. figures for years though carefully denying he is one of them. However, a former party member testified before a congressional committee, that he had joined Haddock up in the party several years ago."

* * * * * * *

"Esso made a very juicy investment by hiring Haddock as its 'labor consultant' as resulting events proving him a 'laborer worthy of his hire.' When he had served his purpose, they let him go. However, you can't keep a 'good' actor down. Haddock is now the executive secretary of the American Guild of Variety Artists.

"From union official to company man to union official is quite some transition, however."

* * * * * * *

Your comments on the above would also be appreciated.

Sincerely,

W. P. LAMBERTSON.

When I had received no reply to this letter by August 15, I wired Mr. Haddock. I received the following note from his secretary:

AMERICAN GUILD OF VARIETY ARTISTS,
New York City, August 19, 1940.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LAMBERTSON: In answer to your wire of last week requesting a reply from Mr. Haddock to your letter of August 2, please be advised that Mr. Haddock is out of town at present and will answer your communication on his return.

Yours very truly,

JOSEPHINE SAVAGE,
Secretary to Mr. Haddock.

However, I noticed in the August 21 issue of Variety that they were able to obtain information from Mr. Haddock on this matter at about this time.

Hoyt Haddock, who was likewise accused of communistic activities by LAMBERTSON, has drawn up a new letter to the Congressman, but will not send it until the A. G. V. A. attorney, Henry Jaffe, has gone over it for possible libel.

To date, September 11, 1940, I have received no further communication from Mr. Haddock.

DECENT A. G. V. A. MEMBERS RESIGN IN PROTEST

Another issue of Variety, July 24, 1940, carries this following statement from three of seven board members resigning from A. G. V. A.:

Three of the resigning seven board members, Dick Barclay, Ben Haskell, and Fred Pisano, submitted a signed statement explaining their reasons for doing so. It reads:

* * * * * * *

"On Thursday, July 18, we attended our regular weekly meeting of the board. Again the obstructionist tactics of the subversive element was at work. The main object of their actions seemed to be to retard progress, cause dissension, and keep the board from disposing of its duties; which is in strict accordance with the Communist Party line to create chaos and havoc in industry and labor ranks.

"We are accused of hiding behind the guise of patriotism because we cannot have our way. Yet, at a recent joint national and local board meeting Hal Sherman made a motion that the American Guild of Variety Artistes go on record as being opposed to communism, nazi-ism, and fascism. Instantly a furor was raised by this self-same element in a body who definitely opposed A. G. V. A. taking such a stand, thereby killing the motion.

"DIFFICULTY GETTING FLAG

"Since its inception the A. G. V. A. office has not had an American flag. Six weeks ago we put through a motion to buy one and display it in a prominent place in our reception room. When Fred Pisano, a board member, went to hang a borrowed flag, one of the C. I. O. office staff said, 'Why do you want to spoil the wall?' To which he replied he never knew of the American flag spoiling anything, anywhere, any time. The flag now hanging in the office was not bought by union funds, but loaned by Arthur Shields, organizer who was fired and remains fired contrary to the rule of a majority of the board to reinstate him since the records prove him totally competent and 100-percent American. To date regardless of our motion a flag still has not been purchased.

"We realize it is an awful thing to put the stigma of communism on anyone, but since we can only judge people by their actions and their affiliations this is the only conclusion we can come to.

"We, therefore, after due deliberation and consideration, have decided to follow your suggestion 'that both sides can end the battle by leaving the battlefield,' and have this day resigned from the New York local board. Having the welfare of A. G. V. A. at heart we tendered our resignations and demand the subversive element to do likewise. We also ask the A. A. A. A. if they want A. G. V. A. to prosper to give the actor the American Guild of Variety Artistes, run by American actors for American actors."

In the story accompanying this statement, Variety states:

It had been suggested that the entire local board and all local officers resign or submit to a recall vote by the membership for the sake of harmony, but thus far the remaining faction has made no such move.

Another one of the resigning board members of A. G. V. A. wrote me as follows:

NEW YORK CITY, July 23, 1940.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LAMBERTSON: You will note by the enclosed that I am keenly interested in preventing communism in the Variety field. I have been told that you have CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS containing data regarding Hoyt Haddock. I would be delighted to receive same. Also your article "Theater must be purged," in the Appendix of the RECORD, page 4452.

Thanking you in advance, from one who more than appreciates your efforts.

Yours sincerely,

ARTHUR WARD.

THE LAST STAND

As a member of the national board of A. G. V. A. now resigned, I am appealing to you, brother performers, you men who have labored years to achieve the cherished position you hold in this once great vaudeville profession.

James Barton, Milton Berle, Eddie Cantor, Edward Dowling, George Jessel, Ben Blue, Alan Cross, Bert Frohman, and J. C. Flippen, president of A. G. V. A.

Your names are being used on the stationery and on the Actors' News (the A. G. V. A. newspaper).

You have never attended a meeting, you do not know what is going on, yet you permit the use of your names, and they are and have been used. To the nonmember it naturally becomes an incentive to join when they read that the leading men and women are on the board of an organization; it must surely be a worthy one. And it would be if you had been there in person instead of by proxy.

I deeply regret that you have not attended, for the clique headed by Hoyt Haddock have practically grabbed the organization, and not for the benefit of the performers, but to use it as a springboard for political purposes; and, as you know, in the event of war the theatrical profession is a powerful machine for propaganda.

In subversive hands—dangerous and traitorous. Several months ago I discovered H. Haddock was hiring men as national local organizers, who had no theatrical background, but were good party men. I mentioned this to several members of the board, and they reminded me that H. Haddock had carte blanche. Plenary powers, the right to hire and fire. At the following meeting, which happened to be a New York local one, I proposed a resolution which was duly seconded and passed.

THAT ONLY A BONA FIDE PERFORMER COULD BE AN ORGANIZER

However, according to our Constitution, such a resolution must be ratified by the national board, but the national executive board controlled by Haddock took care of it, and it was revoked.

At a special joint meeting of the national and local boards, on June 24, I moved that the carte blanche plenary powers be taken from Hoyt Haddock, as he lacked the necessary and essential theatrical experience. It was seconded but did not pass. I had advocated the same at other meetings, also stressing the fact that it made the board a dummy board.

And as I had predicted time and again, it has now borne fruit. Haddock has placed his men, G. Dolan, in Chicago; Ken Howard, in Los Angeles; L. Litomy, in Pittsburgh; B. Edwards, in Cincinnati—all good party men.

They are the local executive secretaries. All they need now is to take over Philadelphia, Boston, and San Francisco, and it's their organization.

Hence I resigned not wanting to participate, and help mislead my brother and sister performers.

So again I say, act before it is too late.

Yours sincerely and fraternally,

ARTHUR WARD.

CROSS SECTION OF PROFESSIONAL OPINION

Mr. Speaker, I had not expected to devote to this question the time or energy that has been required. I had believed that merely a statement of the feeling in Congress which prevented the lifting of the ban against the Federal Theater would inspire a thorough house cleaning by a concerted effort of all members of the profession. However, the following letters, as a small cross section of the many I have received, will illustrate the varying points of view in the acting profession. Many prominent people seem amazingly uninformed on a matter that affects them vitally.

NEW YORK CITY, August 20, 1940.

DEAR MR. LAMBERTSON: I find that the test I personally make today in forming an opinion as to whether people are sympathetic or not to what I conceive to be a fundamental understanding of America is this: Those who fail to express sympathy for Finland or those who fail to repudiate Moscow since Stalin's alliance with Hitler are the ones who I feel do not understand America. It is in this latter group that I place the members of the Theater Arts Committee; but such inquiries as I have been able to make among the members of my profession have convinced me that you have done an injustice to certain of the people whom you have branded as Communists.

May I point out to you that world events have moved so swiftly within recent months and that the issues have been so clearly drawn that many people who were sympathetically interested in the Russian experiment have withdrawn that sympathy entirely, and that it is very dangerous to classify people today according to their affiliations of only a few years ago? I very much doubt if the Members of the Congress of the United States wish to be judged today by statements that they made as recently as 1938.

I know that my profession and the association which represents us in our business relations is sound at heart and as patriotic as any organization in the United States.

We in America are facing a critical period in which we must use all our courage and all our vision. We must look to the Congress of the United States for our leadership. It is possible that the Members of Congress do not realize that during the past several years they have been losing some of the respect of the American citizens because they have, under their legal protection, indulged themselves in making irresponsible statements and allowing irresponsible statements to be made under their auspices. At this particular time, when the emotions of the American people are being deeply stirred, when our faith in our leaders must in no way be shaken, it is of the utmost necessity that the Members of our Congress command our respect and be absolutely certain of the factual truth behind every utterance they make.

Sincerely yours,

HOWARD LINDSAY.

AUGUST 26, 1940.

DEAR MR. LINDSAY: I wish to thank you for your letter of August 20. I am in agreement with much of what you say and most particularly as to the conduct of Congressmen and other Government officials.

I think moreover that in these critical times American citizens also have an especial duty, and as always this duty falls largely on the leaders of any group.

Specifically I think you as one of the leaders of your profession owe it to your country to see to it that foreign "isms," the influence of which proved so disastrous for France, are stamped out of your organization, the Actors Equity Association.

To use only your own narrow tests, are you familiar with the numerous objections of the executive secretary of the Actors Equity Association to Finnish relief? I understand he is an authorized spokesman of the association. His objections were freely printed in the New York newspapers. Did he do this on his own responsibility or did these statements to the press by your authorized official have the support of some of your governing council? If so, which ones?

Did you attend the last quarterly meeting of your association on May 24 at which Philip Loeb made a spirited defense of the Theater Arts Committee? Your association's magazine, Equity, in its June issue has something to say about this, reporting Loeb as resenting "the ruling adopted by Equity in April, forbidding the Equity membership to resort to other organizations and specifically T. A. C., on matters of obtaining Federal relief for actors."

Loeb is further reported in this article in your association's official publication to have declared: "I do not think it incompatible to be a good member of T. A. C. and a good member of Equity."

Are you aware of the fact that right now some members of your governing council are members of T. A. C.?

As to certain people I have named who hold important positions in your association, whether or not they hold Communist membership cards and pay dues, they have seldom deviated far from the Moscow-dictated party line. You as a prominent member of the Equity Association should be more familiar with this than I. However, from data presently available for publication, I can unqualifiedly state that if there are any "innocents" among them, they are "innocent" stooges at best.

In this connection I have received many letters in defense of Alan Hewitt. Possibly he has unwittingly given his support to Communist forces. I am writing Mr. Hewitt and shall place my letter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. This explains my present position in his case.

In closing I wish to urge that if you are not informed regarding this situation that you lose no time in making a thorough investigation and that you then do something about it. You owe it to your country as well as to your association.

Sincerely,

W. P. LAMBERTSON.

NYACK, N. Y., August 24, 1940.

MY DEAR MR. LAMBERTSON: I was naturally appalled at what I read in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD about communistic activities in the theater. If it is true, then of course I am behind you wholeheartedly in your battle to rid us of such a destructive force.

However, I can't help wondering if many of these actors who are suspected of communistic leanings are merely guilty of the outstanding fault (and virtue as well) of our profession. I mean, the unquestioning willingness to help the underdog. Tell an actor a hard luck story, and he will dig in his pocket or join a cause without asking questions. This habit, I know, is careless, but that is the worst that can be said of it.

I have an uncomfortable feeling that my name even might have been included on your list, as at one time I believe I was a member of the Theatre Arts Committee, and may still be, for all I know. I remember when the organization was started that I had high hopes of its helping the theater both artistically and economically, but I am ashamed to say that I haven't followed its activities closely for the last 2 or 3 years. That, I know, has been careless of me, and I tell it to you as an example of what might have happened to some of the rest.

If there are any real Communists among those you mentioned, I hope you smoke them out.

But please do be careful.

Sincerely,

HELEN HAYES.

SEPTEMBER 5, 1940.

DEAR MISS HAYES: Thank you for your letter of August 24. You imply a point of view which I believe is held by many good Americans and seriously retards the work of cleaning out subversive organizations.

Let me quote from the testimony given before the Dies committee by Mr. J. B. Matthews:

"There are four orders of individuals who make up a Communist united front. First, there are the Communist Party members. * * * Party members invariably occupy strategic positions of control. * * * Second, there are fellow travelers who, as a rule, go along as faithfully as if they were actually party members. * * * Third, there are the stooges. These are persons of prominence whose names have considerable publicity value. They are the real decoys whose names do the work of covering up the Communist control of the united front. Finally, there are the innocents, originally called so by the Communists themselves. The innocents are supposed to make up the overwhelming number of the adherents to the united front * * *.

"When you see the denials of Communists control of these united-front organizations made by Communists or fellow travelers, you must simply note it is the perfectly natural thing for that denial to be made. The beans would be spilled if they admitted the true character of the organizations.

"On the other hand, when you find the stooges and the innocents denying the Communist control of these organizations, you must conclude that that also is natural, on the whole, because if they admitted that they had been dupes, they might look rather silly in the public mind. So there is nothing to be surprised at, whatever in this great chorus of denial of the Communist control and decisive influence in these organizations. * * * That, you see is one of the problems we face in this whole situation. There are so many Americans who are willing to put their signatures to those papers.

"Mr. STARNES. Is it another example of what you have testified to previously, that men and women of high repute are used as a front to act for them in their designs? And to decoy other decoys, or to lead millions of otherwise good, sound-thinking American citizens into a path that they would not knowingly pursue.

"Mr. MATTHEWS. Yes, sir. The League of Women Shoppers boasts of the membership of Miriam Hopkins and Bette Davis. A list of such persons could be expanded almost indefinitely. No one, I hope, is going to claim that any one of these persons is a Communist. The unfortunate fact, however, remains that most of them unwittingly serve, albeit in this slight way, the purposes of the Communist Party."

You say, Miss Hayes, "An actor * * * will join a cause without asking questions. This habit, I know, is careless, but that is the worst that can be said of it." I think you might have been right a few years ago. But in the present crisis of "mobilization" in our country, and in the light of world history of the past several years, it is a neglect that may almost be criminal.

You were the chairman in charge of the theatrical Finnish relief benefits. You were, I understand, out of New York City at the time of the opposition raised by Soviet sympathizers to those benefits. But you can hardly be unaware of the really terrific battle waged by Mr. Bert Lytell, president of Actors Equity Association; Mr. Louis Schaeffer, of Labor Stage; several managers and several members of your council to save the benefits from complete sabotage.

The Theatre Arts Committee, Miss Lillian Hellman, Mr. Paul Robeson, Mr. Robert Reed, and Mr. Herman Shumlin were among those leading the battle to stop the benefits. All were quoted in the newspapers, and the publicity was very widespread.

The most careless and uninformed must certainly have suspected the political affiliations of these who fought so determinedly against aid to the Finnish people while they had so actively urged aid to the Spanish Loyalists (not the whole Spanish people, you will remember). This controversy raged through the last week of January 1940, and yet Miss Hayes, on August 24, you inform me that you may still be a member of the Theatre Arts Committee for all you know.

In the March issue of Tac, published by the Theatre Arts Committee, I find your name heading an open letter sent out by the American Rescue Ship Campaign for Spain's Refugees, along with the names of Paul Robeson, Elliot Paul, Lillian Hellman, Rockwell Kent, widely known Communist sympathizers.

Signed to that same letter are names such as Paul Muni, Philip Merivale, Dorothy Canfield Fisher, and yours. I do not question for one moment the complete loyalty to American ideas and institutions of such people. But it has been common knowledge for several years that one of the most powerful weapons employed by the Communist Party in this country is the use of well-known liberals as a front for their organizations. I quote again from volume I, page 918, hearings of the Dies committee:

"Mr. MATTHEWS. The Communist Party relies heavily upon the carelessness or indifference of thousands of prominent citizens in lending their names for its propaganda purposes.

"Here I think you have another good example; and again I am not trying to make these persons' names stand out in any odious manner whatsoever. The Communist Party owns outright the newspaper which is regarded by many as the swankiest newspaper published in France at the present time. The name of the newspaper is Ce Soir. It is little more than a year old. On the occasion of its first anniversary recently this Communist newspaper featured greetings from Clark Gable, Robert Taylor, James Cagney, and even Shirley Temple."

This is the verbatim report of the famous Shirley Temple incident which the Communists distorted in their attempts to discredit the Dies committee.

The scream of "red" baiting is a well-known tactic, which unfortunately has succeeded only too well with thousands of people like yourself. Only a slight study of the innumerable Communist front organizations, manifestos, and open letters enables one to separate well-meaning but uninformed liberals from Communist sympathizers. What I cannot understand is your neglect to give that slight study before you give your name, your money, or your time to them.

As to your own organization, your own back yard, I enclose a copy of my letter to Mr. Alan Hewitt referred to.

I have written at this length to you, Miss Hayes, as one of the most prominent members of your profession and well known as a sponsor and worker for many worth-while causes. Do you not feel that you, with many other members of your profession, have been guilty of a very grave neglect of duty? Your obvious ignorance of the situation in your own organization, a situation which has existed for the past 8 years, can only indicate an indifference on the part of American citizens which is frightening when we consider the fate of Austria, Spain, and France.

May I ask that you call this letter to the attention of such of your friends who may have been persuaded of the "irresponsibility" of Congressmen, congressional committees, or good citizens who are fighting hard to bring into the open the great danger of communistic penetration into American institutions.

Sincerely,

W. P. LAMBERTSON.

Miss Helen Hayes, in common with many fine American citizens who have been persuaded to lend their names to cleverly concealed Communist fronts, is terrified lest she be accused of communistic sympathies. Mr. Speaker, it is a very simple matter to discover, with just a little research, who are professional party stooges, and who are warm-hearted liberals who have been deceived. However, I do believe it is the duty of every American to scrutinize all causes and make sure he is not being used to further un-American activities, as I have written Miss Hayes.

CANNONDALE, CONN., August 29, 1940.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LAMBERTSON: Thank you very much for sending me the material from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I am very definitely against Communists and Communist sympathizers in Equity or in any other organization but I am also opposed to the sort of thing that has happened recently in Hollywood, where a number of prominent members of my profession were falsely accused, given very bad publicity, and later given a clean bill of health by the Dies committee, when it was too late to undo a great deal of damage. I feel it is very important to be sure that the people you are accusing of being Communists are really Communists, otherwise it weakens your distinguished position.

I am not a very prominent member of my profession, but I shall nevertheless do what I can to stop Communist penetration in Equity.

Thanking you for bringing the matter to my attention I remain,

Very sincerely yours,

ARMINA MARSHALL (LANGNER).

This letter is discouraging. Here is a lady who quite properly advises caution to avoid falsely accusing anyone of communism and yet she, herself, has not been sufficiently painstaking to inform herself about the incident she gives as an example. For Miss Marshall's enlightenment, I reproduce here a news clipping from the New York Herald Tribune of August 28, 1940:

After hearing the categorical denials of the Hollywood actors of all association or sympathy with the Communist cause charged against them by John L. Leech, a California Communist organizer, Mr. Dies told a press conference: "The evidence is quite clear, however, that these people have permitted their names to be used, or have contributed money, or have spoken under auspices of organizations which the committee has found to be under the control of Communist leadership. While there is no evidence that their cooperation was for any other purpose except humanitarian, it is nevertheless true that these organizations used these people and their money not for the professed purposes but for purposes inimical to the best interests of this country.

"It is an illustration of how a foreign government is taking advantage of certain gullible American citizens. Among the list of such gullible persons will be found a number of government officials holding positions in high places."

NEW YORK, N. Y., August 29.

W. P. LAMBERTSON,

House of Representatives:

Katharine Cornell has been away for entire summer although she has the greatest concern about un-American element in the organization embracing her profession she doesn't feel sufficiently informed to express definite views against these members for publication.

However, she does feel it is the duty of all actors, including herself, to rid their organization of subversive elements and can only regret that our Government doesn't make this easier by refusing to recognize Communists as a legal political party.

GERTRUDE MACY,

Manager for Katharine Cornell.

HARRISON, MAINE, August 22, 1940.

Hon. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Emphatically endorse your position on communism in Equity Council, and membership at large, about which I am afraid there is no doubt. Greatly regret my absence from council due to touring. Definitely disapprove recent council action rescinding vote to print entire issue in August number Equity Magazine. Will get personally active immediately on return New York City.

FLORENCE REED.

NEW YORK CITY, August 6, 1940.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN LAMBERTSON: Thank you so much for your letter and the enclosed CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I speak not only for myself but for all the real Americans of Equity in thanking you for bringing to light the canker in our midst. You have done us a great service, and I am very honored that you mentioned my name in such a complimentary way.

I think it too bad that certain well-meaning members, in trying to protect their organization, should have tried to whitewash the guilty ones, and I wrote them to the effect that if we wanted our house put in order we should certainly substantiate and be grateful to Congressman LAMBERTSON for helping us to expose this situation.

I know that you have many vital issues at hand, but I beg of you to keep the American actors' interest at heart.

Kindest regards.

Yours sincerely,

TALLULAH BANKHEAD.

NEW YORK CITY, August 13, 1940.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LAMBERTSON: As a member of Actors' Equity Association, I wish to thank you for the courage and tenacity of your effort to expose and thereby force us to rectify the communistic infiltration in our organization.

I hope you will not be too discouraged by the reaction of the council. They wish sincerely to do their very best for Equity, but it is very difficult for many honest, liberal councilors to see clearly through the smoke screen of specious argument, and to maintain a firm and courageous stand against the threats and really horrible invective hurled by these apologists and/or agents for Soviet Russia.

However, I firmly believe that the membership of Actors' Equity will deal adequately with this situation, if they can ever be fully informed on it. The full and complete story of the charges and the full and complete defense of those charged, which was promised to the membership in their magazine, Equity, has now, as you undoubtedly have been informed, been censored in true totalitarian fashion, because some of the members you named refused to release Equity from the threat of libel suits. I hope that the Dies committee may find it possible to start an investigation of the theatrical unions in New York as speedily as possible, since it is only through such an investigation that the true and complete picture will ever reach the membership.

And I for one believe sincerely and completely, that the complete picture can do only good to Equity and its membership of loyal, generous, and patriotic citizens. It will help to rid them of the Muscovite incubus that obscures every policy and every issue in Equity today. It will clear, I believe, one or two of those you named, who in my own opinion have been stooges, more or less innocent, for the others. And it will open the eyes of all of us to the dangers and the wickedness of complacency in the face of the power wielded by Soviet sympathizers and supporters.

In conclusion, may I ask a favor of you? If you could assure us of your support in repealing the prohibition against a theater project when the next W. P. A. bill comes up, provided the members of council you name resign or are removed from office, it would help us greatly to clean house. We should be very grateful to you.

Again my sincere thanks to you.

Sincerely yours,

WINFRED LENIHAN.

AUGUST 19, 1940.

DEAR MISS LENIHAN: Thank you very much for your letter of August 13. You are very kind in your expression of appreciation of my effort to assist the theatrical unions and particularly the Actors' Equity Association to rid themselves of the subversive influence of communism.

As I have already written the president of your association, I sincerely believe there is a good chance of the ban against a Federal theater being removed, providing your association and the other theater organizations sincerely clean house, and no chance otherwise.

I do not hesitate, therefore, to assure you of my wholehearted support if this is done.

With best wishes, I am

Sincerely,

W. P. LAMBERTSON.

NEW YORK CITY, August 22, 1940.

MY DEAR MR. LAMBERTSON: As a third-generation American, I share your desire to restore Americanism to its rightful dominant place in our life, our professions, our business, and our Government.

As a member of the Actors' Equity Association, I thank you for the backbone you have put into our resistance to communistic penetration, which gained such headway under Hallie Flanagan's administration of the late Federal theater, and which is now being carried on indefatigably by the Theater Arts Committee.

As a member of the A. E. A. council, I deplore the ungracious and ungrammatical letter from our executive secretary which was our first official communication to you, and which is now spread on the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to the lasting embarrassment of the Equity membership. I resent the temerity of the executive secretary in presuming to speak for a membership which at that time he had not consulted, and which to date has had no information on this controversy through the columns of our official organ, the Equity magazine.

But, I ask in all seriousness, what can Equity do?

You fling "Stalin's 'Fifth Column' on Broadway" at us. I fling back The "Fifth Column" in Washington, a book dedicated to Franklin D. Roosevelt, to "help him discover the borers from within his own official household, before it is too late." Help him discover? Does Mr. Roosevelt need MARTIN DIES to discover, as of today, that Harold Ickes and Frances Perkins "should be driven from the Cabinet unless they change their attitude toward Trojan-horse organizations"? What has the Dies committee been doing but discover, and discover, and discover, and what has been done about it?

Again I ask, What can the Federal Bureau of Investigation do? They can investigate alleged violations of law. But it is no violation of law to be a Communist, to be a member of the Communist Party, or to engage in the activities of a communistic organization as such. Once the F. B. I. has assured itself that the agent of a foreign power has complied with the requirements of the Registration Act, it can do no more. Once registered, The Daily Worker remains The Daily Worker, to quote today's Herald-Tribune.

You are demanding, and very justly, that Equity clean house. We can, with equal justice, demand that the United States Government clean house, starting where the cleaning is most needed, and where cleaning will do the most good, with the official household in Washington.

Do you gentlemen in Congress think for a moment that Canada will conclude any joint defense agreement with this country which does not include the demand that we follow Canada's example and outlaw the Communist Party? You have had the example. Must you wait for a demand from the outside? Why not accede to the demand of thousands of 100-percent Americans within the country? If the Government doesn't do it, the people will.

I am happy to note that you have had letters of thanks and commendation from many representative Equity members. I predict that you will receive many more.

With every possible assurance of my gratitude, and of my willingness to help in every way, I beg to remain,

Faithfully yours,

CLYDE FILLMORE.

I have received denials of Communist affiliation from Messrs. Loeb, Heller, Sherman, Jaffe, and from Emily Marsh, and some interesting correspondence from the theater arts committee. I shall in the near future present these letters, together with a condensed account of my evidence as to the affiliations of these individuals and this organization, for the greater knowledge and education of the members of the Actors' Equity Association.

With other unions affiliated with the A. F. of L, such as the New York State Federation of Labor, Brotherhood of Railroad Signalmen, barring by formal resolution Communists from seeking or holding office in those unions, it seems to me that Equity certainly should fall in line.

If any doubt exists as to the justification of my charges, it should be dispelled by reading the following article from the Daily Worker of July 13, 1940, sent me by Mr. Horace Casselbury, of 45 West Forty-seventh Street, New York City, the address of Actors' Equity Association:

CONGRESSMAN ATTACKS THE BROADWAY THEATER

(By Ralph Warner)

Broadwayites were literally shocked out of their senses this week by the anti-Communist blast of Kansas Congressman LAMBERTSON, who charged Actors' Equity Association is run by Communists. LAMBERTSON, who has never had any contact with theatrical unions or theatrical life, not only attacked Equity but also slashed at the American Federation of Radio Artists and the American Guild of Variety Artists—thus proving that the intent of his blast was to pave the way for a grand-scale attack not upon Communists but upon unions in the entertainment field.

The shock to Broadway workers resulted from their own knowledge of the fact that certain Equity stalwarts have indulged in "red baiting" in recent months. Here was an example of a classic political truism of the present period: "Red baiting" by misguided liberals or trade-union misleaders always comes home to roost. Only a few months ago "red baiting" Louis Schaffer succeeded in injecting the Communist issue into the theater via the benefits for the Finnish White Guards. Actors who refused to join in these affairs, which were for the purpose of supporting Czarist, antiunion, anti-Semitic, antidemocratic, antieverything forces—such actors were called "reds." The I. L. G. W. U. Social-Democrat, supposedly representing a trade-union theater, was bellwether to the Fascist-minded sheep as he continued his attack with a venomous slander of the Theater Arts Committee.

LAMBERTSON'S attack, with its mention of Miss Bankhead's defeat, shows that this group, having been rejected by a majority of the membership in a democratic election, would like to destroy Equity's democracy by calling seven of the most active Equity officials Communists. This is the usual method of those real "fifth columnists" who, working within labor organizations and democratic governments, seek to weaken democratic organizations and trade-unions by disruption and splitting.

In point of fact, the LAMBERTSON attack, like MARTIN DIES' generalized assaults on the theater and stage, are part of the grand offensive of reaction now under way, concealed behind the smoke screen of war hysteria. LAMBERTSON and other reactionaries, aided as always by such pseudo laborites as Louis Schaffer the social democrat, seek to penalize anyone who differs from them.

Clearly the answer to such attacks as those by Lambertson & Co. is unity, unity, and more unity. The individuals attacked can best reply to LAMBERTSON by joining hands to rally together with the dispossessed actors, technicians, stage hands, and other workers who have been shut off from work relief by the Woodrums, the Dies, the Schaffers, Peglers, the Bankheads, and all those who, masking their purpose behind "red" baiting and warmania., seek to wreck the theatrical trade unions. Unity of all workers is the prime need of the theater. The answer to LAMBERTSON is to fight ever more energetically for actors' rights and a job, for a Federal Theater Project and for the end of "red" baiting from within and without the profession.

The familiar cries of "red baiting," "fascism," "antiunion," "censorship," the frantic plea for "unity," are invariably the answering scream of anguish whenever the hidden, festering sore of communism is prodded or exposed. I may say that I am proud to be the object of so much invective in the columns of the Daily Worker, registered organ of the Soviet Union in the United States.

At the last moment, as I completed the preparation of this statement, I received the following letter from Mr. Bert Lytell, president of Equity:

NEW YORK, N. Y., August 30, 1940.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LAMBERTSON: To answer the request of your last letter, I telephoned Dullzell, who has been away on a vacation, and he informed me that he had answered the letter you mentioned. As to what his answer is, I, naturally, do not know; but I will be back in town for next Tuesday's council meeting and request him to read your communication to the members.

As you have seen, no doubt, in the papers, I have had a most satisfactory visit with Congressman DIES, and I think we will get very quick action.

Sincerely,

BERT LYTELL.

Nothing has yet been received from Dullzell. I was anxious to know what happened at Tuesday's council meeting and what happened to the disappearing and unanswered letters, so phoned Mr. Lytell yesterday. He was greatly surprised to know the letter from Mr. Dullzell he mentions had not been received. And I was greatly surprised to learn from him that my letter of August 13 had not been presented to the council, as he had promised.

I think the record may be allowed to speak for itself.

British Propaganda and Subversion of Textbooks in American Public Schools—H and I

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 11, 1940

EXCERPTS FROM REPORT OF DAVID HIRSHFIELD

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and include articles from the report of David Hirshfield, relating to a book by Willis Mason West, sometime professor of history and head of the department in the University of Minnesota, and an article entitled "Resolutions of Patriotic Organizations."

HISTORY OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE—1918

(By Willis Mason West, sometime professor of history and head of the department in the University of Minnesota)

The complaints against this text from many sources are that its author is an outright propagandist, endeavoring zealously to promote the British design of an Anglo-American union.

The New York City school committee, in its report of this author, says:

"Mr. West presents only the views of the counsel for the crown.

"The writer is constantly finding defense for the course of action taken by the British Government. The American side of the argument is entirely ignored. * * *

"No Wedderburn, no crown advocate could plead the British cause in a more bitterly partisan spirit than West has done."

Notwithstanding, West's book continues on the authorized list for use in the New York schools.

Professor West proclaims in the preface to his book that the feature he has aimed first to emphasize is:

"the historical grounds for friendship between America and England, in spite of old sins and misunderstandings.

"Throughout I have not hesitated to portray the weaknesses, blunders, and sins of democracy."

He, in my opinion, herein pleads guilty to the charge of being an English propagandist.

Some of the un-American teachings running through this textbook are:

"Most of the settlers were 'servants,' and a rather worthless lot" (p. 67).

They were "a bad lot, with the vices of an irresponsible, untrained, hopeless class * * * Cheats and drunkards from this class * * * led to crime or suicide" (p. 72).

Democracy—"the meanest and worst form of government" (p. 80).

"Many of them paid themselves indirectly for their devotion to public service by what would today be called graft" (p. 132).

"Especially was the public land a source of private riches" (p. 133).

"Pettiness and ignorance on the part of the colonists" (p. 141).

"Wolfe had only 700 Americans, whom he described as 'the dirtiest, most contemptible, cowardly dogs. * * * such rascals are an encumbrance to an army" (p. 182).

"Washington declared that he would have been wholly helpless for a long time, had he not had under his command a small troop of English soldiers" (p. 183).

"Colony after colony, for time after time, had been guilty of sacrificing the safety of a neighbor to sordid parsimony or to mean jealousy" (p. 189).

Those who took part in the Stamp Act protests, the Boston Tea Party, the Boston Massacre, and the capture of the Gaspee are referred to as mobs.

Some of the Colonial leaders are called patriots, but the word is derisively saddled with quotation marks.

The colonists who resisted British tyranny are repeatedly called radicals.

At Valley Forge, "nearly a fifth of a starving army deserted to the well-fed enemy in Philadelphia" (p. 236).

"The Tories, on the whole, represented respectability and refinement" (p. 230).

"It has been said that at important periods more Americans were under arms against independence than for it" (p. 237).

In referring to the early struggle of the Colonies for independence, the book bristles with such sharply denunciatory phrases as "the most horrible form of mob violence," "corruptly managed sales," "Congress and the Federal bunch," "scoundrels graduated into national politics," etc., etc.

Professor West deplores the American Revolution as a calamity which "split the English-speaking race," and on page 178 of his book he says:

"The conquest of Canada removed the most pressing need of English protection. Farsighted men had long seen that the Colonies might be less true to the mother country if the dreaded French power should cease to threaten them from the north."

What seems to be the only hope Professor West holds out for America he expresses on page 243, in the following language:

"Now, after a century and a half, the two great divisions of the English-speaking race are coming together once more in sympathetic friendship again to 'double their influence.'"

In Professor West's recital of the causes of the Revolution the colonists are generally made to appear in the wrong. Their grievances are belittled; the British oppressions are smoothed away; the great patriot speeches of protest and the Declarations of Rights are omitted, and the high-minded resistance to English tyranny is pictured as mere ruffianism.

The influences which united the patriot colonists are presented on pages 211, 213, and 215 of this remarkable history text, as follows:

"Tar and feathers and the 'birch seal' became common means of persuasion; and moderates complained bitterly that, in the name of liberty, the populace refused all liberty of speech or action."

"The radical patriots were probably a minority; but they were aggressive and organized, and eventually they whipped into line the great body of timid and indifferent people. On the other hand, many earnest patriots of the preceding period now became tories from repugnance to armed rebellion or to mob rule.

"Of course, the tories had refused to pay any attention to the illegal elections of such provincial conventions. Indeed, in some cases, they were even excluded from voting by test oaths. In this way the radicals came to control the only governments in existence.

"The loyalists early began to accuse the patriots of aiming at independence. But, until some months after Lexington, the patriots vehemently disavowed such villainy, protesting enthusiastic loyalty to King George."

The following extracts are fairly illustrative of the impressions which Professor West desires to make upon the plastic minds of school children concerning the causes of the American Revolution and some of the patriots involved in that great struggle for American independence:

"The English colonial system had guided and guarded the colonies while they needed help and protection. It was not tyrannical. * * * Many shrewd observers believed that the Revolution was caused largely by dread of ecclesiastical interference" (p. 185).

"In growing up, America had grown away from England. * * * By 1775 European English and American English could no longer understand each other's ideas. * * * Both sections of Englishmen clung to the doctrine 'No taxation without representation,' but these words meant one thing in England and a very different thing in America" (p. 187).

"The problem, however, was not merely about taxation; it was a question, also, of maintaining the unity of the British Empire—the greatest free state the world had ever seen" (pp. 188–189).

"The American Revolution is seen imperfectly, if it is looked upon solely as a struggle between England and America. * * * It was a part of a thousand-year contest between the English-speaking people and their kings for more political liberty. * * * In many ways the Revolution was a true civil war."—Page 191.

"Englishmen of that day believed sincerely that the Revolution was the work of a group of soreheads. George Washington as a youth had been refused a coveted commission in the British Army, Sam Adams' father had been ruined by the wise British veto of a proposed Massachusetts land bank. The older Otis had failed to secure an appointment on the Massachusetts bench. Alexander Hamilton was a penniless and briefless law student, with no chance for special advancement unless by fishing in troubled waters" (p. 195).

"In the Stamp Act period the honest purpose of the English Government had been to protect the Colonies, not to oppress them" (p. 200).

Of the Boston Massacre: "The troops were subjected to constant and bitter insult. * * * The mob, no doubt, deserved blame" (pp. 201–202).

Those who studied their American history in days when it was taught for its patriotic truth, even if they have since forgotten most of it, must readily sense the purpose of the foregoing.

Of the Bills of Rights of the Revolutionary period, Professor West teaches, on page 219:

"Such as those against excessive bail, cruel or unusual punishments, arbitrary imprisonment, and the like, go back to ancient English charters, even for their wording. * * *

"About 1760 this same democratic English literature began deeply to affect a few French thinkers like Rousseau, the prophet of the later French Revolution. These men stated the old English truths with a new French brilliancy; and it is sometimes hard to say whether the American leaders drew their doctrines from the French or the older English sources."

This is quite different than what formerly was taught in American school history and at variance with the well-substantiated facts.

In a study of the sources of American institutions, Holland looms larger than England. It was from Holland that the fathers brought the town meeting, the written ballot, the self-government of towns, and their representation in a general legislature. It was from Holland whence came the doctrine of freedom of speech and worship and the separation of church and state.

In his book of more than 700 pages Professor West devotes only 47 scattered lines, equal to one page and a quarter, to the entire military and naval movements of the Revolutionary War. The space generally given to this topic in school history is about 40 pages. Even Professor Muzzey gives to it nearly 10 pages.

In his page-and-a-quarter account Professor West necessarily avoids, rather than treats, the vital subject. Most of the great characters and events are omitted.

Bunker Hill is not mentioned.

Yorktown is given a scant paragraph.

But, brief as it is, this account would have been better if briefer still, for in it the colonists' glorious deeds are eliminated, and the defamations take their place. He says:

"Among the Americans the war developed some excellent generals of the second rank—Greene, Arnold, Marion—but many officers were incompetent or self-seeking or treacherous" (p. 231).

"A terrible feature of some raids was the use of Indian allies by the English; but it must be remembered that the Americans had first tried to secure such allies" (p. 237).

"Campaigns in Europe and the West Indies drained England's resources, glorious though the results were to her arms against those tremendous odds. Meantime, in America, Congress kept its sinking finances afloat by generous gifts and huge loans from France. The Army, however, was dangerously discontented. Desertions to the enemy rose to a hundred or 200 a month" (p. 238–239).

While there was some treachery in the army, in my opinion, it is infamy to name Greene and Marion with Arnold in one connection.

To argue as to which side "first tried" to use Indians as companions in arms would only lead to aimless controversy. There can be, however, no dispute as to which side did actually make use of the Indians. According to Bancroft, as early as September 1774 the president of King's College, now Columbia, an Englishman, published the threat that if the colonists did not submit to the English there would be war and the Indians would be set upon the frontier settlements, murdering and scalping. Thus we find that in teaching early American history from the pro-British "viewpoint" and in bending his energy to direct American thought toward—so-called—"Anglo-American understanding," Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, the present president of Columbia University, is only following the footsteps of his English predecessor.

Judge Wallace McCamant, president general of the National Society of Sons of the American Revolution, made this statement concerning the use of Indians against the white settlers:

"The George Rogers Clark expedition does not stand forth pictured in all its true colors until we learn that Col. Henry Hamilton, the British commander at Detroit, had heavily subsidized the Indians on the frontier, from the Lakes to the Gulf; that it was his plan to let loose on the frontier these barbarous warriors, to the end that in 1779 men, women, and children in our frontier settlements might perish. This was the disaster averted by the heroism of the 'Hannibal of the West' and his little band of riflemen, which is not mentioned in any of these revised histories."

No one who reads the horrors of Cherry Valley and other revolting massacres of most barbarous character committed by Indians armed and encouraged by the British and Tories, and, in many instances, said to be under command of British officers, can have patience for controversy on the subject in a school history.

There is no question that large bribes were offered by the British for deserters. Gen. Joseph Reed spoke of the sentiment of the American Armies when, on receiving an offer of $50,000 if he would forsake his country's cause, he sent back the noble answer:

"I am not worth purchasing, but such as I am the King of Great Britain is not rich enough to buy me."

Sir George Otto Trevelyan, whose British history of the American Revolution is so greatly admired and so largely copied by the modern revisionists, fails them on this point, for Trevelyan in volume IV, on page 52, says:

"British veterans sorrowfully counted the handful of Americans who were attracted by the secure pay and the smart uniform of the royal service, as compared with the tens of thousands who did not shrink from the starvation and the threadbare misery which awaited them in the Continental Army."

It is worthy to note that, although Professor West has no space in his book for mention of Bunker Hill, or for Saratoga, he gives a half-page to a picture of Colonel Tarleton, whom he proclaims as "the commander of 'Tarleton's Legion,' the most famous of all the loyalist regiments" (p. 238).

"Most infamous" has always fitted better into American history. Tarleton was known in his time as the "Butcher." He desecrated a flag of truce, disregarded the rules of civilized warfare, and his bloodiest victories were over unorganized men and helpless women and children. He achieved nothing but obloquy. In an American history, Tarleton manifestly has no place with Gen. Nathaniel Greene, who crushed him, but in the West book General Greene is scarcely mentioned.

In this text Andrew Jackson, who as a captive lad was wounded by Tarleton because he would not black his boots, is pictured only in two derisive cartoons, while Lafayette, John Stark, Paul Revere, Nathan Hale, and a host of other patriot heroes are not even mentioned.

Whatever inspirational effect may be intended by this exaltation of Tarleton, is wholly misdirected. It is of a class with the praise of Benedict Arnold by another of these revisionists. Since their stated purpose is to bring about friendlier relations between America and Great Britain, it were better for them if such infamous names as that of Tarleton, instead of being exalted in our school histories, were obliterated and forgotten.

In the same manner as have the other "modern" historians whose texts are complained of, Professor West speaks disparagingly of France and her aid to the colonists. He says:

"To the despotic French Government the alliance was purely a 'League of Hatred'" (p. 235).

"To large numbers of patriots even the news of the new ally was of doubtful cheer. Many began to fear that they had only exchanged the petty annoyances of English rule for the slavery of French despotism and of the Spanish Inquisition" (p. 236).

Whatever ulterior motives, if any, may be imagined to have been hidden in the backs of the heads of the French ministers, it is beyond dispute that the assistance of France, generously given the colonists, helped incalculably toward our independence; and it is not fair to the French people of the past and of the present, nor to our own people of the present and of the future, to attempt to minimize our gratitude and friendship for France, much less destroy it by means of propaganda for British imperialism, inserted in American school history.

The great significance of the War of 1812, which completed American independence, secured undisputed standing to the United States as a nation and gave definite impulse to Americanism is grossly distorted in this book in some of the following passages:

"Our foreign relations from 1806 to 1812 were disgraceful" (p. 395).

"Our Government shilly-shallied, in impotent indecision, until the energetic part of the Nation rose wrathfully to demand that we fight someone at once to win back self-respect. Then we chose the wrong time and apparently the wrong foe. Unfortunately, too, our choice of a foe arrayed us on the side of the European despot against the only hope for European freedom" (p. 395).

"Young Republicans, or War Hawks, finally brought Madison to their side. * * * It was said that Madison yielded to secure necessary War Hawk support for his reelection in 1812" (p. 398).

"The War Hawks expected to end the war in one glorious campaign of conquest" (p. 399).

"One disgraceful episode of the war calls for mention. In 1813 an American raid burned Toronto (then York), the capital of lower Canada. A British force off our eastern coast retaliated by a raid against our capital" (p. 400).

"The war originated in blunder. It was conducted discreditably. And it was ended without mention of the questions that caused it" (p. 409).

Perry's victory is mentioned only in a one-line footnote.

The Battle of New Orleans is belittled to seven lines.

Professor West quite magnanimously excuses Great Britain and accuses the United States. America is accused of picking the wrong foe and arraying herself on the side of despotism and fighting against European freedom. This is not revision but reversal of facts. It is not history. In my opinion, it is nothing but British propaganda.

Professor West, like some of the other latter-day American historians, so-called, offers excuse for the burning of Washington in the burning of York. It never has been ascertained who fired the government buildings at York, but it is known and agreed upon by all historians, Canadian as well as American, that, while the British were evacuating York and the triumphant Americans were entering there came a terrific explosion of a British powder magazine, the location of which had been unsuspected by the Americans, and that 52 Americans were killed and 180 wounded. On the other hand, it is confessed that the burning of Washington by the British was done "under strict orders from the Government at home."

The Canadian historian, Murray, in his Historical and Descriptive Account of British America, in volume 1, page 230, says, concerning the firing by the English of the powder magazine at York:

"The firing of this mine was undoubtedly a most barbarous and unjustifiable act on the part of the British. Their defeat was already inevitable, and they knew the explosion could not affect the result. It was, therefore, a wanton destruction of life, as cowardly as it was cruel, without any expectation of benefit to themselves."

Before the destruction of York the British had destroyed Frenchtown, Frederick, Georgetown, and Havre de Grace and had committed outrages at Hampton.

There is, perhaps, no good reason why outrages should be dwelt upon in school history. There is certainly no good reason for them to be excused or for shifting the long-settled odium from the British to the Americans upon no better authority than British propaganda.

As to America's motive in the War with Mexico, Professor West teaches, on page 515:

"The West was eager for more territory and had few scruples against fighting Mexico to get it."

In an attempt to teach American children that our war for the preservation of the Union could not have been won but for English friendship, her commercial sacrifices, and "heroic support," Professor West devotes three times as much space as he does to all the military movements of the Revolution.

One sentence is expressive of the spirit of five pages:

"The North, then, had great cause, not always duly recognized, for deep gratitude to the sound heart of the English masses, who felt dimly that the Union was fighting slavery, even while Unionists denied it loudly, and who, therefore, gave the North a heroic support through cruel privations—in many ways as severe as those borne by Americans" (p. 577).

Our War with Spain, Professor West teaches our children, was won not through American strength and valor, but through the friendship of England, which prevented Germany from enlisting all Europe on the side of Spain.

Our motive in that war, as given by West, was not the liberation of Cuba, but because (p. 633):

"American capitalists had large interests in the sugar industry in the island and used powerful influences, open and secret, to secure American intervention with a view to subsequent annexation."

As to our country's safe survival of the first 3½ years of the World War, Professor West gives this familiar British explanation:

"Our fancied security, unprepared for war as we were, was due only to the protecting shield of England's Fleet" (p. 720).

From all this it appears to be Professor West's fixed purpose to imbue American school children with the idea that America is a wayward, wandering, weak, and helpless child which must return to the loving-mother arms of the British Empire.

RESOLUTIONS OF PATRIOTIC ORGANIZATIONS

Resolutions adopted unanimously by the national congress of the Sons of the American Revolution, May 15, 1922:

"The Sons of the American Revolution in national congress assembled express their deep interest in the subject of textbooks on American history in use in our public schools. We protest against the use of any textbook which lauds the tories and censures the patriots, which maligns the memory of any of the great men of the Revolutionary period or undervalues the services and sacrifices by which our national independence was won.

"Textbooks on American history should be written only by those who are in sympathy with the principles for which our forefathers fought. Every such history should adequately stress the story of the American Revolution, portray in colorful outline the heroic incidents of the struggle, and teach the priceless value of the institutions which we inherit from our forefathers.

"We protest against any textbooks which teach socialism, bolshevism, or class hatred. The committee on patriotic education is instructed to carry out this resolution and is authorized to take all needful measures to eliminate from our schools all textbooks objectionable on the above grounds."

By the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States the following resolution was unanimously adopted in the national encampment, August 24, 1922:

"The Veterans of Foreign Wars, in national encampment assembled, recognize that grave charges have been made, and proven to be true, that American history textbooks in use in public schools have lately been revised in un-American spirit.

"We indignantly protest against the use in schools of those histories which defame or ignore our Nation's founders, falsify the causes of the Revolution and the War of 1812, discredit the statement of grievances made in the Declaration of Independence, belittle the heroism, sacrifice, and idealism of our forefathers, and misinterpret the principles and purposes upon which our Republic was founded and for which it has stood.

"We declare that the whole noble history of the founding and vindication of free government on this continent has a fixed, distinctive, and exalted meaning, not only for Americans, but for all mankind; that the precepts and traditions descending to us from that heroic period are a precious heritage which we generously have shared with the whole human race, and which heritage must not now be denied to our children.

"We demand that the treason texts be thrown out of the public schools of every State, and that truthful histories be substituted instead, and we pledge our unflagging efforts to that end.

"We feel that to Charles Grant Miller, through whose patriotic service a sinister attempt to degrade our country's history has been exposed and checked, is due the gratitude not only of the members of this organization, but of all Americans of the present and future.

"In this connection your committee recommends that the national patriotic instructor, the department patriotic instructors, and post patriotic instructors be instructed to investigate the report to the chairman of the Americanization committee upon the histories now in use in the schools of the several States, and that in all States where histories are in use which do not conform to the true ideals of Americanization, the matter be taken up by the Americanization committee with the superintendent of public instruction in the several States with the view of having approved editions of American histories adopted for use in such schools."

Resolution unanimously adopted by New York State Department, Grand Army of the Republic, in annual encampment, June 7, 1922:

"Whereas the sympathetic teaching of true American history in the educational institutions of our country is essential to the retention and strengthening of our patriotic spirit and ideals; and

"Our Nation's true annals have been unfailing sources of pride and inspiration which have prompted us as a people to stanch character, unparalleled achievement and unprecedented prestige among the powers, and to world-wide influence in liberation and elevation of mankind;

"Resolved, That we condemn as unfit for school use or teaching any history, textbooks, or other books, plans, pictures, or persons which defame our Nation's founders and defenders, misrepresent the ideals and causes for which they struggled and sacrificed, or misinterpret the principles and purposes upon which our Republic was established and for which it has stood.

"We demand that our annals be preserved unimpaired as the rightful heritage of posterity, and as guaranty that the future of our Nation shall be as glorious as its past.

"We demand that our Nation's true history be presented to rising generations with a view to wholesome cultivation of patriotic spirit, solidarity, and morale, based upon right conceptions of the doctrines and traditions of American democracy.

"We protest against any school or other teachings which advance class interest, create class distinction, or inculcate class hatred."

Resolution adopted by Seattle Chapter, Sons of the American Revolution, January 27, 1922:

"Whereas, The free public school, originating and developing in America, giving American youth the education and training so necessary to a life of usefulness and good citizenship, is one of the most valuable of all American institutions, and one of the principal bulwarks of liberty and independence, and

"Whereas national safety and national unity demand the maintenance of our public-school system free from the influences, whether foreign or domestic, which tend to degrade American ideals and to corrupt our national traditions; and

"Whereas among America's richest treasures are its Revolutionary history—the Boston Tea Party, Paul Revere's Ride, Putnam leaving his plow in the field, Lexington, Bunker Hill, Patrick Henry's speech, Valley Forge, Saratoga, Yorktown—great landmarks of a heroic race, as daring in conception, as thrilling in execution, as momentous in results as anything in ancient romance, the divine birthright of every American child, in which he absorbs and lives and breathes the very spirit that made these United States; and

"Whereas indisputable evidence proves an insidious and treacherous propaganda in operation to place in our public schools American history textbooks designed to destroy faith in the forefathers and respect for American history and institutions: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That Seattle Chapter, Sons of the American Revolution, realizing that eternal vigilance is the price of peace, freedom, and security, regards with grave concern this condition in our schools, and urges upon our educational authorities (school boards, superintendents, supervisors, principals, and teachers) the vital need of a careful review of American history textbooks, that steps may be taken to bar obnoxious books from our schools, and that only such textbooks be permitted therein as teach the simple heroic truth of American history, and written not by aliens but by American historians."

The Descendants of the Signers of the Declaration of Independence, in their national congress in Independence Hall, July 4, 1922, unanimously adopted this resolution:

"It is resolved as the sense of this meeting of the Descendants of the Signers of the Declaration of Independence that, while the members would view with apprehension any tampering with the histories of the United States used in the public schools, in the interest of any country, people, races, or policies, at the same time they cannot believe that what is falsely called a truthful presentation of the other side of the case demands that the histories put in the hands of American children should boldly misrepresent the men and measures, manners, and methods and the great events of the Revolution and the subsequent periods leading up to the Constitution of 1787.

"This misrepresentation and misinterpretation being accomplished (1) by the belittling of the significance of the Declaration of Independence itself; (2) by disparaging and ridiculing signers of the Declaration and leaders in the Revolution, impugning their motives, holding them up to contempt of the youth of today as patriots and statesmen; and (3) by ignoring some of the most celebrated of our Revolutionary heroes who gave all, even life itself, for the country's great cause."

The New Jersey State Council of the Junior Order United American Mechanics, representing 80,000 members, in its 1922 convention, unanimously adopted this resolution:

"It is by the light of true American annals, ideals, principles, policies, and purposes that liberty-seeking people of all climes, all races, all religions, all colors, and all classes have in our country united together in solidarity, singleness of aspiration, and splendid morale as a Nation.

"We demand that our Nation's true history be taught to rising generations in the public schools, with a view to wholesome cultivation of virile patriotism.

"We demand that American history be preserved unimpaired, as the rightful heritage of our children and as guaranty that the future of our Nation shall be as secure and glorious as is its past.

"We pledge our hearty cooperation with the Patriot League for the Preservation of American History in the coordination of plans and activities of all patriotic organizations in driving all treason texts out of the schools of our country."

The State Council of Pennsylvania, Order of Independent Americans, in convention September 1922, unanimously adopted this resolution:

"Resolved, That the textbooks in the public schools which teach sectarian and Anglo-Saxon propaganda must be removed therefrom."

Resolution unanimously adopted by the National Society, Daughters of the American Revolution, in their annual congress held April 9, 1923:

"The National Society, Daughters of the American Revolution, in national congress, recognize that the true history of the birth of our Republic, handed down through successive generations upon the sacred word of honor of our fathers, has been unfailing source of the splendid patriotism, solidarity, morale, and peace spirit of the American people.

"This heroic story has been the strongest inspiration throughout our past, as it is at present, to 'cherish, maintain, and extend the institutions of American freedom, to foster true patriotism and love of country, and to aid in securing for mankind all the blessings of liberty.'

"We demand that our country's true annals, ideals, and principles be preserved unsullied and transmitted unimpaired to our children in the public schools, as their rightful heritage, and for the perpetuation of wholesome national spirit based upon right conceptions of the vital doctrines and traditions of American democracy.

"We condemn as unfit for school use those history texts which defame or ignore our heroic forefathers, misrepresent the consecrated causes for which they struggled and sacrificed, and misinterpret the fundamental principles upon which they established our liberties and our Nation.

"We declare that the teaching of true American history in the public schools of our country is vitally essential to the inculcation of our distinctive national spirit and ideals in our future citizenry.

"We pledge our ready cooperation with other patriotic bodies in practical measures for cleansing the public schools of false and unpatriotic teachings."

Democratic Campaign in Maryland Opens With Enthusiasm

OF

HON. THOMAS D'ALESANDRO, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 11, 1940

Mr. D'ALESANDRO. Mr. Speaker, cheering Democrats last night packed the Lyric Theater in Baltimore, Md., to the doors to hear their State campaign open in a blaze of oratory and song. There was enthusiasm aplenty, enthusiasm that was dampened for awhile when it was announced from the platform that the Speaker of the House of Representatives, Representative BANKHEAD, who was expected to give the principal address, had been taken ill at the Emerson Hotel, to the regret of the entire country.

About everybody who counts in Maryland democracy, together with many Congressmen from other States, was in the throng.

Harmony was proclaimed by every speaker. Governor O'Conor, who delivered not only his own address, as chairman of the rally, but also read that of Speaker BANKHEAD for the benefit of the Nation-wide radio hook-up, called Mayor Jackson and Senator RADCLIFFE his friends and comrades, and they returned the compliment. He urged the election of Franklin Delano Roosevelt, Henry A. Wallace, Senator George L. Radcliffe, and David Ward, William P. Cole, Jr., Thomas D'Alesandro, Jr., John A. Meyer, Lansdale G. Sasscer, and William B. Byron to the House of Representatives.

Mayor Jackson told the audience that he was present to urge upon the people of Maryland and the whole country the election of all Democratic candidates. He said that the democracy of Maryland is united and factional differences have been buried. "We will march forward in an overwhelming number behind our party and the leader of our Nation, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, and the national Democratic candidates, Roosevelt and Wallace, will carry Maryland, and with them we shall reelect GEORGE L. RADCLIFFE to the United States Senate and once more return a solid Democratic delegation to the House of Representatives."

Below is a copy of the speech prepared by Speaker Bankhead:

Governor O'Conor, Members of the congressional delegation of Maryland, and fellow citizens, I am deeply honored with your invitation to deliver a short address at the opening of the Democratic campaign in the great State of Maryland. It is always an honor to appear in this great State whose people have played such a conspicuous and distinguished part in the development of our Nation from colonial days on down to the present time and who are still carrying forward the noble traditions of their ancestors.

Within the time limit allowed me on the radio it will, of course, not be possible for me to attempt to make any extended argument on the vital political and national issues involved in this campaign and my observations will necessarily be limited to a very few of the pending issues.

I rejoice to be in the presence of this magnificent gathering of the democracy of Maryland and among the audience I trust there may be many independent voters and possibly some who have heretofore voted the Republican ticket. There has never been waged within this generation a political campaign of more profound significance to the present and future happiness and safety of the American people. I am, of course, here to present mainly the Democratic side of this issue. I am always happy to embrace an opportunity to speak in behalf of that great political organization which, since the very founding of our Republic, has played such an active and conspicuous part in the destiny of our Nation. I am also glad that in presenting the Democratic cause, particularly with reference to the record and achievements of the present Democratic administration at Washington, that I can bring to the people of Maryland, as well as to those of the country, the assurance that in all executive and legislative efforts under this administration, we have not departed from, but have adhered to, the basic and fundamental principle upon which our party was founded, "Equal rights to all men and special privileges to none."

In order to have a fair appraisal of the record of this administration and to determine whether or not, upon the whole, it has done a good or an evil job, it is, of course, only fair that we should reconsider the condition of the country when we took over the Government in 1933. It is not necessary for me to recall in detail the disastrous and calamitous state of our entire country at the close of the Hoover administration when everywhere there was the universal cry of distress, impoverishment, fear, poverty, bankruptcy, a collapsed banking system, twelve to fifteen million unemployed and hungry people walking the streets and the countryside crying for bread and clothing and shelter. It was a situation which demanded the instant exercise of vitally courageous action. For 12 years our people had endured a Republican leadership that either did not have the capacity to conceive adequate measures of relief and reform or else totally lacked the courage to sponsor and execute them, and, under such circumstances, the people of this country for their own salvation, called back into power for the first time in many years a Democratic administration. As its leader and chieftain they chose a man of great vision and courage; a man who was totally unwilling to close his eyes to the facts of a new order of conditions which had grown up in our country in the last generation and which needed drastic remedial action; a man who was wise enough to know that if our country were to survive and its basic institutions preserved, some major reforms were imperative; a man daring enough to venture into new fields of legislation to cure obvious evils; a man who, despite much bitter and vindictive criticism and hatred, despite occasional errors of action or of policy, by every present poll of public opinion, still holds the personal affection and respect of a great majority of the American people—Franklin D. Roosevelt.

In order to avert a further fall into the abyss when, as I have suggested, "unmerciful disaster followed fast and followed faster" upon the homes and hopes of the American people, it was necessary for the Congress, with the President's approval, to enact a series of beneficent laws.

I cannot in this period even attempt to catalog all of them, nor to argue their merit and necessity. In the main, they were laws to restore our national and private credit and the confidence of the people in their banking institutions, and the heroic and effective manner in which this was accomplished after the bank holiday must yet be fresh in the minds of our people, especially the bankers of the country, who at that time were sorely pleading for assistance, but many of whom are now the bitterest enemies of this administration.

Incidental to the collapse of more than 5,000 National and State banks during previous Republican administrations, we enacted the law for the guaranty of the safety of all deposits of our National and State banks which were affiliated with the Federal system up to $5,000, constituting 98 percent of the total deposits, which, of course, means that if any such bank now fails its depositors will receive 100 cents on the dollar.

Reference has been made to the orgy of rampant and unbridled speculation of former years. Under former Republican administrations the license and freedom of action was allowed promoters, stock jobbers, and gold-brick syndicates. The American people had been swindled out of billions of hard-earned savings in the purchase of securities foisted upon them by these evil combinations, who operated without conscience and without restraint. To eradicate such indefensible activities we passed the Security Exchange Commission Act, under the operation of which no fly-by-night speculative enterprise can now mulct the investing public. Every security now offered for purchase must pass the scrutiny of the Commission, which passes upon its solvency and soundness. That was a type of legislation that was conceived totally to end evil and vicious practices that an aroused public conscience was not content longer to endure.

We broke up for all time the ruthless and unconscionable holding companies allowed to flourish in all of their ugly and wanton plundering of the stockholders of their subsidiaries under former administrations, of which the infamous Insull utility empire in the Midwest was a conspicuous example and of which the Commonwealth and Southern Corporation was a smaller prototype, and it will be remembered that when this bill was pending before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the House of Representatives the plans and strategy of the opposition to the legislation was furnished by none other than the Honorable Wendell Willkie, now the Republican nominee for President.

We established the Civilian Conservation Corps. We have provided adequate temporary relief for millions of men and women out of employment and without any opportunity to secure jobs. Through the agency of the Public Works Administration we have added to the permanent wealth of the country in every single community in America by the construction of permanent utilities for their comfort and happiness.

One of the greatest achievements of this administration was the financing and foundation of the Tennessee Valley Authority, which, as a yardstick for the control of power and light rates since its establishment, has already resulted in the reduction of charges to consumers in the United States of a half billion dollars, and that enterprise was one that seems to have particularly touched the sensitive corporate nerves of the private utilities of the country and especially of the Republican nominee.

In this connection a great deal has been said about the challenge which Mr. Willkie issued to the President for a series of joint debates in the country and, in my opinion, it has been well said that the most appropriate parties to have a joint debate with reference to their respective opinions upon questions of public policy, would be the Republican nominee for President, Mr. Willkie, and his running mate, Senator MCNARY, of Oregon. Speaking to the Economic Club of New York on January 21, 1935, Mr. Willkie said:

"No duty has ever come to me in my life, even that in the service of my country, which has so appealed to my sense of social obligation, patriotism, and love of mankind as this—my obligation to say and do what I can for the preservation of public utilities privately owned."

In this speech he described Mr. Samuel Insull as a "forceful, dynamic, and attractive figure." Speaking of public ownership and the right of the people to operate public service, Mr. Willkie said:

"All I have observed, all that I know and all that I read teaches me that I could do nothing nobler for the future financial stability and political good of my country or the social and economic well-being of my fellow citizens than to stand firm and unafraid against this foolish fad and fancy of the moment."

Now here is what Senator MCNARY, Mr. Willkie's running mate, said in his speech of acceptance:

"The Federal Government accepts the responsibility to control floods and assure navigation—out of these services flows the by-product of power. The Government having made this power available should have an indisputable right to control its utilization and distribution."

He further added that the big Federal power projects were liquidating their commitments to the Government. I am wondering how on this vital problem Mr. Willkie as President would control his unregenerate running mate who would then be Vice President of the United States.

Getting back to the legislative program, I mention without elaboration the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, with its tremendous benefits to the American people, and the Federal Housing Administration giving credit to hundreds of thousands of people to finance their own homes. We guaranteed for the first time in history by law the fundamental right of labor in this country to organize and bargain for the betterment of their wages and working conditions. We established a decent wage-hour law so that men and women who toil should not be forever exploited merely as human commodities. We have helped the impoverished youth to secure opportunities for high-school and college education; and, above all else, by our remedial program we have saved the farmers of the country from absolute destruction and bankruptcy by a series of wise and provident laws, including the soil- and water-conservation program, the lowest farm interest rates in our history, rural electrification, marketing agreements, commodity loans, parity payments, research into new uses and new markets, the stamp plan, and distribution of surplus commodities. Six million farmers are voluntarily cooperating in the various wings of the program.

After a very brief and fragmentary summary of the legislation enacted by this Democratic administration, we are now confronted with one of the most remarkable phenomenon in the history of American politics. After all of the long and bitter criticism of the opposition party and its leaders of the social, economic, and agricultural program of this administration, and after a 2½-year microscopic examination of that record by Dr. Glenn Frank, we naturally supposed that when the Republican National Convention at Philadelphia adopted its platform that they would attempt to tear the Democratic record limb from limb and at least have the temerity to suggest the total repeal or substantial modification of what they were so fond of calling New Deal vagaries. But, lo and behold, when the Republican platform was agreed upon and adopted, that great party no doubt reluctantly admitted and proclaimed that they approved in principle the Democratic legislative program of this administration, after which startling confession the only leg that they have to stand on in an appeal to be placed back in power is that they could administer these laws in a better fashion. There are some who believe that the major incentive to a return to power by the G. O. P. is the jobs, the patronage, and the power. The truth of the business is that the old Republican elephant, the symbol of their party, has grown extremely cadaverous for lack of adequate political hay.

A great deal has been said already in this campaign and much more will probably be said with reference to the third-term issue, which I desire to discuss for just a moment. I contend that there is absolutely no shred of political philosophy or sound analytical reason why a President of the United States should not be reelected for a third term. The whole argument against it is based entirely upon a so-called accepted tradition or unwritten law. When one begins to seek any real or persuasive reason for such a tradition, he will find, if fairly intentioned, that none exists. Whenever I am in doubt about the basic philosophies of our Constitution and way of life, it is my habit to revert to the discussions in the Constitutional Convention which drafted our Federal organic law, and upon such recent research I find that this was a matter that was fully, fairly, and at much length discussed in the Constitutional Convention. Every possible phase of a third term, or indeed a second term, was fully analyzed and debated by those great intellects and logicians who constituted the personnel of that Convention. Their wisdom and foresight as expressed in their finished work is one of the marvels of political action for all time and although many proposals were made for limitations of the term of the Presidency and after every possible angle of the matter was thoroughly explored, it was the final wisdom of those great men to place no limitation upon the number of terms that a President should be elected. They evidently were not impressed with the argument that more than two terms would lead to a dictatorship and they most wisely left the determination of the number of terms that a President could serve to the final decision of the people themselves. We are confronted with exactly that situation in this campaign.

The opponents of a third term usually refer to the attitude of George Washington upon this question and his refusal to accept a third term. The truth is that that decision was based entirely upon personal reasons and his desire in his old age to retire to the comforts of Mount Vernon. His real sentiments were expressed in a letter to General Lafayette, from which I take the following quotation:

"Under an extended view of this part of the subject, I can see no propriety in precluding ourselves from the services of any man, who on some great emergency, shall be deemed, universally, most capable of serving the public."

The patron saint of all Democrats is, of course, Thomas Jefferson, and some Democrats who are bitterly opposed to President Roosevelt for other reasons are now declaring that they can support no Democratic candidate for a third term. While it is true that Mr. Jefferson did, in general terms, oppose the election of a President for three terms, nevertheless, we find that it was not a matter of such profound conviction with him that he would make no exception, because when Mr. Jefferson was being implored by his political friends to run for a third term, he wrote to John Taylor and declared, "I had determined to declare my intentions, but I have considered to be silent on the opinion of friends who think it best not to put a continuance out of my power in defiance of all circumstances." Undoubtedly, if circumstances had warranted, he would have accepted a third term; and if living now, it is my opinion, holding the views that he did with reference to the rights of the average man in this country, he would declare that the present circumstances justify and demand that President Roosevelt be given a third term.

I have reserved for conclusion the supreme and paramount problems now weighing most heavily upon the hearts and homes of the American people, namely, foreign affairs and our national defense. Although studious and at times vindictive efforts have been made to impress the country with the fact that President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull have gone out of their way to indulge in so-called meddling in the foreign affairs of other nations, the whole record disproves such contention and definitely establishes that although they have from time to time made vigorous protests against the action of some foreign governments that were in contravention of the laws of Nature and humanity, nevertheless, the whole undertone and substance of their appeals to the world has been for the good-neighbor policy, for peace in the world, and against the spread of war. I will give only one instance of that consistent record. When the President signed the first neutrality resolution on August 31, 1935, he did so with this statement:

"I have approved this joint resolution because it was intended as an expression of the fixed desire of the Government and the people of the United States to avoid any action which might involve us in war. The policy of the Government is definitely committed to the maintenance of peace and the avoidance of any entanglements which would lead us into conflict."

And this was followed just a few weeks before the Chicago Convention with the following statement by the President:

"That we are opposed to war is known not only to every American, but to every government in the world. We will not use our arms in the way of aggression, we will not send our men to take part in European wars."

In addition to all this, he called a special session of Congress last year after the war broke out in Europe, recommended, and the Democratic Party passed, amendments to the existing neutrality law which prohibited the shipment in American vessels of cargoes into the waters of the belligerent nations, which, if it had not been done, would doubtless long before this have inevitably drawn us into the conflict for the same reasons which induced America to go to war against the central powers in 1917. On the vote in the House of Representatives on this most vital proposal for keeping out of the European war, on the final roll call on the conference report of the neutrality bill, there were—yeas, Democrats 223, Republicans 18; nays, Democrats 29, Republicans 141.

Another matter of the most supreme and vital importance to our people in view of the threats and power of the totalitarian powers in Europe is the matter of adequate national defense for the United States and the Western Hemisphere. It is not necessary for me to go into detail or statistics with reference to the earnest efforts of this administration to prepare for any eventuality that may be thrust upon our people, but Herr Hitler has sworn that this is a world revolution and that no democracy upon the face of the earth will ultimately be spared. It is no easy thing for a great Nation like this to adequately prepare against the terrific power of the Nazi war machine, but this administration and this Congress are taking every needful step to see to it that at the earliest possible moment we will be prepared in all fields of action to preserve the integrity of the Monroe Doctrine and to safeguard at all hazards our priceless heritage of liberty and free way of life. To give assurance to our people on the preparedness program I quote the following figures prepared by Congressman CLIFTON WOODRUM of Virginia of the Appropriations Committee:

"In 1933 we had an Army of 75,000 men. Today we have equipped and under arms an Army of 241,000, and the present Congress is authorizing an increase to 1,200,000, with a possible ultimate Reserve strength of 2,000,000.

"Today we have a 1-ocean Navy of 399 warships. In 1943 we will have 521 warships afloat, and in 1946 a 2-ocean Navy.

"Today we have 5,500 war planes (production 900 per month). Nineteen hundred and forty-one production will be up to 1,500 per month. July 1942 25,000 war planes will be ready. October 1943 50,000 war planes will be on hand.

"Today we have 500 tanks. Production is 3 light tanks daily. July 1941 1,500 tanks will be ready. January 1943 200 heavy 70-ton tanks will be ready.

"By August 1941 arms and critical equipment ready for 1,000,000 men. That's 1 year hence. October 1943 complete arms and equipment ready for an Army of 1,200,000 men, and a Reserve strength that will give us 2,000,000."

Proof of Authenticity of British Secret Document—Part II

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include excerpts from magazines, press, and other publications, I shall now proceed to discuss the British Secret Document, which was addressed to the Right Honorable Lloyd George, and dated June 10, 1919. The second paragraph of this document, entitled "Preliminary Consideration," deals with Anglo-American alliance, which will eventually result in a peaceful return of the American Colonies to the dominion of the Crown of England. This has been discussed in the articles entitled "Steps Toward a British Union, World State, and International (should be Internal) Strife," August 20, parts I II, III, and IV, and August 21, parts V and VI, and September 3, parts VII and VIII, and September 5, part IX. In these remarks the reader will find much evidence to substantiate the letter sent to Lloyd George June 1, 1919. Further evidence may be found in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, under the title "Proof of Authenticity of British Secret Document," page 5547.

I shall now proceed with further discussion of this most despicable letter; a letter which holds American people to ridicule and shame by those who are now dragging this Nation into a war that the people do not want and which will, if the warmongers do not desist, lead this country into internal strife. The greatest threat to this Nation will come when the English Government moves to Canada. It is then that the various groups such as the British-Israel, Anglo-Saxon Federation, and various endowment organizations and international bankers will become the real "fifth columnists" and crusaders for Britain, to incorporate the United States in the British union. In this attempted sabotage of the Republic, the Communists will be used as they have been to date, only to be liquidated when they have served their purpose to those in power, who have bribed them and paid their way.

The New Deal is copying the political coups of South American republics, and the President no doubt hopes to establish himself as a dictator by the aid of the Army, Navy, and intelligence units in the United States, which means, of course, that there may be no election if this "coup militaire" is accomplished.

Cecil Rhodes is the Britisher, the internationalist, who supported and gave his aid to the Anglo-Saxon movement for the reunion of this Republic and the British Empire. Let me call your attention to the undermining of America, which actively began when Cecil Rhodes, in 1877, left money to establish scholarships at Oxford for the purpose of training diplomats to foster such re-union.

In the first draft of his will, which is quoted in the book Cecil Rhodes, by Basil Williams, and the book Cecil Rhodes, by Sarah Gertrude Millin, he stated:

"* * * directed that a secret society should be endowed with the following objects. 'The extension of British rule throughout the world; the colonization by British subjects of all lands where the means of livelihood are attainable by energy, labor, and enterprise; and especially the occupation by British settlers of the entire continent of Africa, the Holy Land, the Valley of the Euphrates, the islands of Cyprus and Candia, the whole of South America, the islands of the Pacific not heretofore possessed by Great Britain, the whole of the Malay Archipelago, the seaboard of China and Japan, the ultimate recovery of the United States of America as an integral part of the British Empire.' The foundation of so great a power as to hereafter render wars impossible and promote the best interests of humanity.

A new will was made:

"He substituted English-speaking peoples for actual Britons; he came to realize his limitations and reduced his scheme to a mere beginning of it, the scholarships; but yet the thought behind each successive will remained the same—the world for England, England for the world." (Cecil Rhodes, by Sarah Gertrude Millin.)

Other quotations:

"* * * but the essence of the will, as the world knows, is the Scholarship Foundation. In the end all that Rhodes can do toward extending British rule throughout the world and restoring Anglo-Saxon unity and founding a guardian power for the whole of humanity is to arrange for a number of young men from the United States, the British colonies, and Germany to go to Oxford. There are, accordingly, rather more Rhodes scholars from America than from all the British dominions put together.

"If the Union of South Africa could be made under the shadow of Table Mountain, why not an Anglo-Saxon union under the spires of Oxford?"

This also clarifies much of which is stated in the British Secret Document to Lloyd George. This movement of anglicizing America was continued by Andrew Carnegie, a Britisher who made his money in the United States, only to sell the country that made him into the hands of our greatest enemy. The author of the British Secret Document calls attention to the fact that the last chapter in Andrew Carnegie's book, Triumphant Democracy, was published in the North American Review in 1893, and now I quote from that volume. This chapter is entitled "Looking Ahead," and I may say at this point that this same chapter was removed from the 1932 edition of Triumphant Democracy.

If Britain, America, and Canada were to reunite today, the population of the reunion would be one hundred and eight millions. All other parts of the English-speaking race would not number five millions. It is into such a complete race reunion of her people that the door is now wide open for the parent land to enter and take first place—first among equals * * *

Readers will kindly note that this is a look ahead—how far ahead I shall not attempt to guess—nevertheless it is ahead, and sometime, somehow, it is to come to pass. I see it with the eye of faith, the faith of the devotee which carries with it a realizing sense of certain fulfillment.

Time may dispel many pleasing illusions and destroy many noble dreams, but it shall never shake my belief that the wound caused by the wholly unlooked for and undesired separation of the mother from her child is not to bleed forever.

Let men say what they will, therefore, I say that as surely as the sun in the heavens once shone upon Britain and America united, so surely is it one morning to rise, shine upon, and greet again the "Re-united states," British-American union.

(Signed) ANDREW CARNEGIE.

This movement of anglicizing America began with Alexander Hamilton, when he, by trickery submerged the United States Treasury under the domination of the Bank of England. It was first a British movement, but is now international, and is financed by the international bankers, who are the real rulers of England and the United States. Those who preach world union or world federation are in the pay of some of the organizations to which I have already referred in my previous remarks, the object of which is to destroy the Government of this Republic and to enslave the American people under the domination of the British rulers.

The arrogance of the British is unbelievable, and the low estimate in which we are held by these dukes and "ducklings" creeps in, I may say, in every statement which they make. As an illustration, let me again quote Sir Gilbert Parker, who, as the letter to Lloyd George states, was in charge of the British propaganda machine in the United States. (Harper's magazine, March 1918.)

Also, it should be remembered that the Society of Pilgrims, whose work of international unity cannot be overestimated, has played a part in promoting understanding between the two peoples, and the establishment of the American Officers' Club in Lord Leconfield's house in London, with His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught as president, has done, and is doing, immense good. It should also be remembered that it was the Pilgrims' Society, under the fine chairmanship of Mr. Harry Brittain, which took charge of the Honorable James M. Beck when he visited England in 1916, and gave him so good a chance to do great work for the cause of unity between the two nations. I am glad and proud to think that I had something to do with these arrangements which resulted in the Pilgrims' taking Mr. Beck into their charge.

I may say that they did take Mr. Beck into their charge, for he was a most abject worshiper of England ever since that time.

Then Mr. Parker continues:

Then it was that the Monroe Doctrine became an accepted fact, but the United States could not have made it a fact unsupported and unprotected by the British Navy. It is no exaggeration to say that the policy and prosperity of the United States had a free and fair run for over the last 90 years, because Great Britain, which had learned her great lesson in the American Revolutionary War, made her Navy the defender of the Monroe Doctrine.

No one, not even a Britisher, could have uttered a greater falsehood, for the British Government, has never been an aid to the United States, and the British have never protected our interest in South America; but have, instead, destroyed our interest by undermining American commerce in that Southern Hemisphere. This should be clearly evident to anyone, when he takes into consideration the effect upon our foreign trade when we observe the British blacklist, which is handed to us by the British Government. A statement of this kind simply makes me boil, and should start the blood surging in the arteries of every American who has the interest of this Nation at heart. However, this, as I have already said, shows the contempt in which we are held by those who are now crying for help, and whose Navy is not even able to protect the insignificant area contained within the British Isles. How is it possible for such Navy to give any aid in the protection of the Monroe Doctrine, a doctrine which we could never enforce with an Army of 5,000,000 men; yes, and with three navies as large as the one which we now have.

It is well to bear in mind that the Central and South American Republics are sovereign governments within themselves, and it is within their rights to do as they please in regard to admitting foreign people within their borders. Should we foolishly attempt to enforce an arbitrary doctrine upon them, we will in such procedure invite war with these Republics. When this war is over, we will be a nation without a single friend, either in the western continent or in any part of the world. Yes; even England herself, will give us "thumbs down" as she has always done when such necessity suits her own purpose.

The letters of Sir Cecil Spring-Rice to Balfour and others, which were published in the Saturday Evening Post, July 13, August 3 and 24, 1929, reveal, if nothing else, the manner in which our Secretary of State, Hon. William Jennings Bryan, and the President of the United States, Woodrow Wilson, were taken into camp by the British. The Secretary of State is treated with contempt in Sir Cecil Spring-Rice's correspondence, and our President, Mr. Wilson, was not treated any better. It is well to read these letters, for I believe they will be useful in reestablishing patriotism in those of our people who are now vacillating between the British Empire and the United States. I may say at this point that I have inserted some articles from the Report on Investigation of Pro-British History Textbooks in the Public Schools of the City of New York, in the RECORD. This report also authenticates the secret British document in its reference to change in our educational system and pro-British propaganda in our educational institutions and in our churches.

The author of the British document thanks Mr. Taft and Mr. Polk; and he should, because Mr. — was on the board of the League to Enforce Peace. In fact, he was the president of the league, and therefore, guilty or innocent, a tool of the British propaganda service. Mr. Frank Polk was a member of the Pilgrim Society, and so recorded in its membership list. Mr. Baker, whom the author of the British secret document also mentioned, was trustee of the Twentieth Century Corporation.

Mr. Edward Filene, of Boston, an internationalist, set up the Twentieth Century Fund, Inc., and by interlocking directorates has control over 124 trust funds, together totaling nearly a billion dollars. Included in this control are: The Carnegie, Rockefeller, the Duke and Russell Sage Foundations from which funds go subsidies to subversive communistic, socialistic and all peace movements, as well as the cooperative movements. Among activities of Twentieth Century Fund, Inc., are the following: N. R. A., S. E. C., Wagner Labor Act, International Labor Office (affiliated with League of Nations), Foreign Policy Association, Credit Unions, Cooperatives, League of Women Voters. (See Red Network, published by Elizabeth Dilling, 53 West Jackson Boulevard, Chicago, Ill., for communistic activities of these groups. Also see Yearbooks and American Foundations and Their Fields, published by Twentieth Century Fund, Inc.)

It is well to note that Messrs. Pierpont Morgan, Rockefeller, Insull, can be found among the "Pilgrims," while Cleveland Dodge belongs to the Carnegie clan.

In the London Times, July 4, 1919, appeared an article entitled, "Insurance of Peace," from which I now quote:

NEED OF PROPAGANDA

By efficient propaganda, carried out by those trained in the arts of creating public good will and of swaying public opinion toward a definite purpose, not only the natural and proper competition of interest between the two countries would be robbed of the poison of ignorant resentment, but also the malign influence of existing and potential propaganda antagonistic to British-American good will will be nullified.

What is now needed—urgently needed—is to make a beginning. Efficiently organized propaganda should mobilize the press, the church, the State, and the cinema; press into active service the whole educational systems of both countries, and root the spirit of good will in the home, universities, public and high schools, and primary schools. It should also provide for subsidizing the best men to write books and articles on special subjects, to be published in cheap editions or distributed free to classes interested. Authoritative opinion upon current controversial topics should be prepared, both for the daily press and for magazines; histories, and textbooks upon literature should be revised. New books should be added, particularly in the primary schools. Hundreds of exchange university scholarships should be provided. Local societies should be formed, in every center to foster British-American good will, in close cooperation with an administrative committee. Important articles should be broken up into mouthfuls for popular consumption, and booklets, cards, pamphlets, etc., distributed through organized channels to the public. Advertising space should be taken in the press, on hoardings, and in the streetcars, for steadily presenting terse, easily read and remembered mind-compelling phrases and easily grasped cartoons, that the public may subconsciously absorb the fundamentals of a complete, mutual understanding.

EFFORT MUST BE UNITED

This work cannot be efficiently done by individuals or by small independent societies. It must all be coordinated into one great, steady, efficient effort, and the execution of it be under the direction of men in both countries who are qualified by capacity and experience to sound exactly the right note and to employ the right media to interest the section of the public to which any particular appeal is made.

The whole expense for carrying out this enterprise in both countries should immediately be budgeted for and the necessary funds secured, to be administered by one strong administrative committee of eminent men in the United States and one in the United Kingdom. These two committees should be coordinated in one international supervisory committee. Literary matter should be secured by subcommittees of British and American journalists and publishers who know the capacity of all of those writers competent to assist in the work of interpreting one country to the other, to establish the mutuality of British-American international interest, and to impress the entire public opinion of both countries with the advantage, nay, the necessity for a world-wide unity of British-American peace effort. Ambassadors of good will should be exchanged, to meet the public in our pulpits, on our lecture platforms, and to preside in the lecture rooms of our colleges.

In the words of a great American patriot, "We must all hang together, or assuredly we shall all hang separately." If there be one who still doubts this axiomatic truth, let him carefully consider the blood-red future of the world with the British Empire and the United States in active hostility, or even engaged in consuming their existing and potential material and spiritual resources in bitter Anglo-American controversy, quarrel, and intrigue.

In reading the foregoing can anyone close his eyes to the evil effect of such propaganda, and particularly when nearly all American publications are controlled by an alien power, the interests of which are only in the conquest of America. Where are the loyal Americans who should, first of all, guard this Republic with their very lives? Where is the patriotic press that prides itself on truth? The press that should rally to the defense of America and give full support to those who, back to the wall, are fighting alien influences to save what is left of our Republic. I am astounded and shocked by public apathy and by the attitude of the American press, which is pro-English, proforeign, and prointernational; a press which has forsaken our country in its greatest hour of need.

In order to reveal the attitude of some deluded Americans, I shall quote Owen Wister, so that he may be regarded correctly as he was—pro-British (from the London Times, Friday, July 4, 1919):

The truth of it was, you had been driving us colonies with such light reins for so long that directly you tightened them we took the bit between our teeth and bolted. We mean to be our own nation and not your colonies, no matter how easy with us you might be. And you were easy, very easy, until quite late in our Revolution. So our school histories had to make out a case. They played up George III and Lord North strong, and they suppressed Burke and Pitt and the whole liberal element in England that was in sympathy with us; thought of us as free British brothers over the water who were insisting on our British rights. In short, they painted a distorted picture of England's political condition at that time.

INFLUENCE OF SCHOOL BOOKS

Generations of American schoolboys have studied this picture. To fathers and grandfathers all over our States, the names Concord, Bunker Hill, Valley Forge, mean resistance to the tyrannical enemy of liberty, England. England is still that to our schoolboys of today, though not so many. A movement to correct the school books has been started and will go on. It will be thwarted in every way possible by certain of your enemies. These will busily remind you that you burnt our Capitol in the next war we had; that you let loose the Alabama upon us during our Civil War; they will never mention the good turns you have done us. They would spoil, if they could, the better understanding that so many of us are striving for. They would pry us apart, if they could.

They will fail. Our dead over whom you strewed flowers on May 30 will help us living to defeat them. Could I name all the matters wherein we have varied much or little from you since that original Fourth of July, 143 years ago, a teeming page would be compiled. In truth, a whole book devoted to these differences, with the history of such divergence, would have that same light-throwing quality which is possessed by any great dictionary giving the evolution and successive uses of words. We vary from you, for instance, in our Protestant Episcopal prayer book, here and there; in our vocabulary, written and spoken; in the custom of primogeniture, the rule of the road, coinage, spelling, pronunciation, enunciation. Many of us speak through our noses, none of us drop our h's; omission of the g, as in shockin', denotes mostly the 'umble with us, the 'aughty with you. And so forth, and so forth.

This confirms the statements made in the letter to Lloyd George in which the author of it brags how the British changed our history in order to destroy patriotism.

To establish more indisputable evidence as to the authenticity of this document, and to the importance of the author, I shall quote a brief excerpt from the letter itself:

Suggestions for the visit: His Royal Highness, the Prince, should have a brilliant entourage of our American-born nobility. About the time of his coming the Grand Fleet might make a demonstration in American waters, preferably off Newport, R. I., so that Lady Gerard, Lady Sims, Lady Strauss, Lady Rodman, and the wives of our other knights may participate. And Field Marshal Haig, with Sir John Pershing, might review the American forces. During the visit special courtesies should be shown to the presidents and professors whom I have listed in appendix 23. I would also suggest that a complete programme of social favours be arranged for the parsons, editors, and newspaper proprietors in appendixes 20 and 26. A new order might be created to reward the celebrants of the visit, the Royal Order of the Pilgrims. It should have three degrees, Knights Grand Cross, Knights Bachelor, and Commanders. With respect to the knighted classes we could, of course, reassure the suspicious by Mr. A. Maurice Low's patent device, first described in the New York Times, August 15, 1918 (appendix 44), which safeguard the democracy of the knighted by the withholding of the accolade. Would you, however, kindly give instructions to the publishers of Whittaker's Almanac, and of the official registers, to delete, in their next issue, from their lists of British Knights, the name of Sir John Biddle, Sir Tasker Bliss, Sir P. D. Lechridge, Sir Peyton March, Sir John Pershing, Sir Hugh Rodman, Sir William Sims, Sir Joseph Strauss, and the other American knights, as their inclusion in the 1919 issue has tended to shake American faith in our Mr. Low's ingenuity?

The foregoing paragraph is correct, for the 1920 edition of Whitaker's Almanac listed the following Americans as Sir Knights:

Fershing, Gen. John, G. C. B. (U. S. Army).
Rodman, Rear Admiral Hugh, K. C. B. (U. S. Navy).
Biddle, Maj. Gen. John, K. C. B. (M) (Hon.) (U. S. Army).
Bliss, Gen. Tasker, G. C. M. G. (U. S. Army).
Marsh, Gen. Peyton, C. M. G. (U. S. Army).
Sims, Vice Admiral William Snowden, G. C. M. G. (U. S. Navy).
Strauss, Rear Admiral Joseph, K. C. M. G. (U. S. Navy).

Let me also call attention to the fact that the author of the British secret document, or letter to Lloyd George, suggested that inasmuch as these titles had shaken the confidence of the American people, that their names should be removed from the Almanac and deleted from the Royal Register. Did the Prime Minister of England comply with this request? He surely did, for the names were removed from the very next issue of the Almanac. Surely, anyone with such entree to the British Prime Minister must have been important, and particularly so when the Prime Minister of England complied with his request. His reference to Mr. Low is also correct, for in the New York Times of August 15, 1918, appears an article entitled "British Decorations," from which I shall quote a few lines:

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

So many persons have written and asked me about the decorations conferred by King George on American generals and admirals, and there is evidently a fear in the minds of some Americans that the acceptance of these decorations may insidiously sap American democracy by creating a titled class, that perhaps you will permit me to quiet their fears and explain what these appreciations signify.

Knighthood is an honor dating back to feudalism. It is conferred by the sovereign in person, who dubs his kneeling subject—the posture indicating allegiance, submission, and fidelity—by touching his shoulders with a drawn sword, and saying: "I dub thee knight; arise, Sir John," and the man who 30 seconds before knelt down as plain John Smith arises Sir John Smith. (A. Maurice Low, Washington, August 11, 1918.)

The only difference in this initiation, if I may so designate it, is in the fact that our Sir Knights were not dubbed as is the customary procedure with British subjects.

This, Mr. Speaker and Members of Congress, further authenticates the British document which some Members refused permission for insertion in the RECORD. There is not one paragraph in this letter that is not absolutely correct, and the letter was, in spite of opinions to the contrary, actually sent by some one to the Prime Minister of England. This should be clear, as one reads the evidence I have produced in order to prove this document.

Poll-Tax Regulation by Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERRON PEARSON
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 11, 1940

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Speaker, the Congress of the United States is being asked and urged to legislate upon the qualifications for voters in the election of a President, Senators, and Members of the House of Representatives in the States and to prohibit any sovereign State from requiring the payment of a poll tax as a prerequisite to voting in the election of either of these officials. Such a proposal is contained in H. R. 7534, introduced by the gentleman from California, Representative GEYER, now pending in the House Committee on the Judiciary.

This bill would only apply to the States of Tennessee, Texas, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, Arkansas, South Carolina, and Virginia.

It is unfortunate as well as passing strange that one so far removed from these States and so obviously uninformed as to conditions in them has assumed to himself the task of attempting to solve all the alleged social and political problems existing in these States while his own district, the home of Harry Bridges and many who subscribe to his philosophy, is being neglected. He could render the Nation and certainly his district a far greater service if he would evidence more concern over conditions at his own front door and busy himself in expressing at home his profound anxiety about the failure of those about him to aid in preserving and protecting those democratic principles and institutions in which he professes such an abiding interest.

I am offering no brief for requiring all voters to pay poll tax as a prerequisite to vote. In fact, I have no objection to removing it as a legal requirement, but I maintain that the States not only have the right but are charged with the responsibility of determining the qualifications of their voters, and Congress has no constitutional right to legislate upon the question.

By what constitutional provision could Congress be said to have a legal right to enact this bill?

The only provisions of the Federal Constitution directly or remotely dealing with the subject are as follows:

ART. I. SEC. 2. The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the several States and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

Amendment XVII: The Senate * * * shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people for 6 years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature. (Adopted April 8, 1913.)

ART. I. SEC. 4. The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be presented in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Amendment XIV: All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Amendment XV: The rights of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Amendment XIX: The rights of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State on account of sex.

One or more of these provisions of the Constitution must form the basis for this bill if it has any legal or constitutional justification. I propose to show conclusively that it is in contravention of all of said constitutional provisions and that the Congress of the United States has absolutely no right to say to the States what they can or cannot do with reference to the qualifications of voters in any election whether State or Federal. It is a question which can only be determined by the legislatures of the several States. We may not like what they do in this regard, but there is nothing we can do about it unless and until we amend the Federal Constitution.

Let us take the six provisions listed above in the order named, analyze them, and determine what they mean in the light of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States construing them.

ARTICLE I, SECTION 2

Under this section of the Constitution its authors provided specifically that the States should have the right to fix the qualifications of those who voted for Members of the Federal House of Representatives by stipulating that electors in such elections shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

Certainly no one will contend that any legislative body except a State legislature has any right to say what the qualifications of a voter shall be in elections to determine who shall serve in said State's legislative body except the State legislature itself. It is a right reserved to the States and over which the Federal Government has no control. If the States have the unquestionable right to fix and determine qualifications for those voting for members of the State legislature the Congress has no power to curb or interfere with the action of these States in imposing poll-tax payment as a voting qualification. If such is made a condition precedent to voting for these State officials, under the Federal Constitution, it shall likewise be a condition precedent to voting for Federal officials. Congress cannot prevent it by mere legislative act saying that it cannot be done.

If the Congress is to assume the right and power to prevent the States from requiring the payment of a poll tax as a voting qualification in electing Federal officers, then it must be done by a constitutional amendment to the Constitution and separating the power of the State to fix qualifications of the electors of the members of its most numerous branch of the State legislature from that of fixing qualifications of those voting to elect Members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States. It cannot be done in any other way.

So long as State legislatures require those who vote for members of such legislatures to pay poll tax in order to vote they must require such tax in electing Federal officials. So long as States have the right to fix qualifications for voters in elections to select members of State legislatures, just so long will they likewise determine who can vote for Members of Congress, and the Federal Constitution provides that such qualifications, when determined by the State legislatures, shall also obtain in electing Members of the House of Representatives of the Federal Congress. States are vested with the indisputable right to fix the qualifications in both State and Federal elections.

In connection with the language used in article I, section 2, I call attention to the fact that when the seventeenth amendment was adopted directing the election of United States Senators by popular vote of the people the same language was used with reference to the qualifications of electors in such election and again the States were left with the right to determine what those qualifications should be.

This is especially significant, because when this amendment was adopted many of the States were then—1913—and for 50 years prior thereto had been requiring the payment of poll tax as a prerequisite to the right to vote in choosing Members of the House of Representatives. The amendment was submitted to and adopted by the States in the light of all these years of experience and no effort made to change the language used in article I, section 2, or to apply a different rule.

These are not just dogmatic, categorical statements of mine but are legal principles firmly established by decree of the United States Supreme Court nearly 60 years ago and never questioned since.

In 1883 the Court in the case of Ex parte Yarbrough (110 U. S. 663), with reference to article I, section 2, of the Constitution, said:

> The States in prescribing the qualifications of voters for the most numerous branch of their own legislatures do not do this with reference to the election for Members of Congress. Nor can they prescribe the qualification for voters for those eo nomine. They define who are to vote for the popular branch of their own legislature, and the Constitution of the United States says the same persons shall vote for Members of Congress in that State. It adopts the qualification thus furnished as the qualification of its own electors for Members of Congress.

For the Federal Congress to say by legislative enactment that the States shall not and cannot require payment of a poll tax to vote for Members of Congress would be tantamount to forbidding such States to control the qualifications of their citizens who vote for members of State legislatures. Where can be found anyone who will contend that Congress has any constitutional right to dictate to the States how they shall qualify electors in choosing any State official?

In the case of Wiley v. Sinkler (179 U. S. 63) the Court upheld the right of South Carolina to prescribe qualifications for those voting for Federal officials and reiterated with approval the construction of article I, section 2, as set out in the case of Ex parte Yarbrough.

ARTICLE I, SECTION 4

The author of the bill under discussion has insisted that Congress has the power to enact this bill under article I, section 4, of the Constitution which provides that the States shall prescribe the time, place, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives through their legislatures but that Congress may at any time make or alter such regulations.

To say that the words "time," "place," or "manner" of holding elections mean or include qualifications of voters, such as length of residence, registration, and poll-tax payments certainly strains one's conception and understanding of these words in their common and accepted usage. It is a meaning which the Supreme Court has never given these words, and all the decisions construing this section hold that the power given Congress by the language used is to protect the act of voting, the place where it is done, and the man who votes from personal violence or intimidation.

See the following cases for a full discussion of this section and its meaning, to wit: Ohio v. Hildebrant (241 U. S. 565); Smiley v. Holm (285 U. S. 355); Koenig v. Flynn (285 U. S. 375); Carroll v. Becker (285 U. S. 380); In Re Coy (127 U. S. 731, 752); Ex parte Siebold (100 U. S. 371); Ex parte Clark (100 U. S. 399); United States v. Gale (109 U. S. 65); United States v. Moseley (238 U. S. 383); Newberry v. United States (256 U. S. 232); United States v. Wurzbach (280 U. S. 396).

It is unnecessary to review separately this long line of cases. Suffice it to say that they leave no doubt about the exclusive rights of all States under article I, section 2, and article I, section 4, of the Constitution, to fix and determine the qualifications of electors in all elections and make it absolutely clear that Congress cannot interfere with this right.

I only call especial attention to the case of Newberry v. United States (256 U. S. 232), decided in 1920, in which Justice McReynolds reviews and discusses every phase of this subject. A casual reading of this opinion will convince anyone that it is assinine for Congress to consider any bill having as its objective curbing, restricting, or interfering with the rights of sovereign States to say what shall be required of electors naming State or Federal officials.

I quote in part from that decision sections bearing on the principle involved in the Geyer bill:

We find no support in reason or authority for the argument that because the offices were created by the Constitution Congress has some indefinite undefined power over elections for Senators and Representatives not derived from section 4 (of art. I of Constitution). "The Government, then, of the United States can claim no powers which are not granted to it by the Constitution, and the powers actually granted must be such as are expressly given, or by necessary implication" (Martin v. Hunters Lessee, 1 Wheat. 304). Clear constitutional provisions also negative any possible inference of such authority because of the supposed anomaly "if one government had the unrestricted power to control matters affecting the choice of the officers of another" (256 U. S. 249).

Our immediate concern is with the clause which grants power by law to regulate the "manner of holding" elections for Senators and Representatives—not broadly to regulate them.

* * * * * * *

Who should participate in the specified elections was clearly indicated—members of State legislatures and those having "the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature." Who should be eligible for election was also stated. * * * Subject to these important limitations Congress was empowered by law to regulate the times, places and manner of holding the elections. * * * These words are used without any veiled or obscure significance, but in their natural and usual sense.

Many things are prerequisite to elections or may affect their outcome—voters, education, means of transportation, health * * * but authority to regulate the manner of holding them gives no right to control any of these (ibid., pp. 256 and 257).

The plain words of the seventeenth amendment and those portions of the original Constitution directly affected by it should be kept in mind.

* * * * * * *

As finally submitted and adopted the amendment does not undertake to modify article I, section 4, the source of congressional power to regulate the times, places, and manner of holding elections. That section remains intact and applicable both to election of Representatives and Senators.

* * * * * * *

Its authority would be expressly restricted to regulation of times, places, and manner of elections. The qualifications of the persons who may choose, or be chosen, as has been remarked on other occasions, are defined and fixed in the Constitution and are unalterable by the legislature. The history of the times indicates beyond reasonable doubt that, if the Constitution makers had claimed for this section the latitude we are now asked to sanction, it would not have been ratified (ibid., pp. 254, 255, and 256).

AMENDMENT XIV

The author of this bill, the gentleman from California [Mr. GEYER], was quoted in a recent edition of the Townsend Weekly as saying that State poll-tax requirements are a violation of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution which prohibits the States making any law abridging the privileges of citizens of the United States.

This insistence by him only goes to show that he has made no investigation of the meaning of this amendment or of its application to his bill.

As late as 1937, Mr. Justice Butler, speaking for the Supreme Court in the case of Breedlove v. Suttles (302 U. S. 278), involving the validity of a Georgia statute levying a poll tax as a prerequisite to voting, said:

To make payment of poll taxes a prerequisite to voting is not to deny any privilege or immunity protected by the fourteenth amendment. Privilege of voting is not derived from the United States but is conferred by the State and save as restrained by the fifteenth amendment (right to vote regardless of race, color, or previous servitude) and nineteenth amendment (woman suffrage) and other provisions of the Federal Constitution, the State may condition suffrage as it deems appropriate. (Citing 21 Wall. 162, 110 U. S. 651, 146 U. S. 1, and 238 U. S. 347.) The privileges and immunities protected are only those that arise from the Constitution and laws of the United States and not those that spring from other sources (citing 293 U. S. 245).

The question to which this discussion is directed was met foursquare in the Breedlove case and was definitely settled without equivocation or reservation.

I desire to say again that I am not presenting an argument in favor of the States continuing the levy of poll taxes as a necessary qualification to vote. As a matter of fact, I am not here voicing any objection to the repeal of such laws. I am simply saying that whatever is done about it is a question for each State to settle and determine for itself and that Congress has absolutely no constitutional right to act on the question. I have been cheerfully paying poll tax for nearly 30 years. In my State the revenue thus derived, though comparatively small, is used in our educational program and serves a useful purpose. If the State legislature deems it wise to repeal this tax and permit voting without such a prerequisite, I have no quarrel to find with such a course. On the other hand, I do not expect to sit idly by and permit the gentleman from California to prevail upon Congress to unlawfully attempt to meddle in the affairs of my State and take from it a right reserved to it under the Federal Constitution.

I think the State of California would have less of "ham and eggs" and E. P. I. C. programs if the gentleman who is so interested in reforming the customs of the South would apply his efforts with equal diligence to doing something about his situation at home. Perhaps a poll-tax voting qualification might save his own State from financial disaster. Who can tell?

The Minority Leader—Joe Martin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS H. CASE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 19, 1940

SPEECH OF HON. CHARLES A. HALLECK, OF INDIANA

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted by the House, I submit for the RECORD, the speech of the Representative in Congress from the Second District of Indiana, the Honorable CHARLES A. HALLECK, introducing our minority leader, the Honorable JOSEPH W. MARTIN, Jr., of Massachusetts, at the Willkie notification meeting in Elwood, Ind., August 17, 1940.

Members of the notification committee of the Republican National Convention, distinguished guests of Indiana, and my fellow Hoosiers, Indiana is proud of the place destiny has given to her today—proud that there has been called to lead this mighty Nation to safety, happiness, and prosperity a son of Indiana, Wendell Willkie.

Eighty-five years ago, the Republican Party was organized to rescue America from a tragic crisis. Today, the party is again called to service to save a Nation of 130,000,000 resourceful, energetic, and courageous people from the ravages of continuing depression within and the threat of aggression from without.

The torch of liberty, freedom, and opportunity has been handed to a native son of Indiana. He will hold it high, leading this new crusade of American principles in government and for the reestablishment of law as the ultimate guaranty of both individual and national security.

America wants to resume the march of progress. The Republican Party is the instrument through which the American people have determined to work for the reestablishment of enlightened patriotism in the administration of national affairs. Beneath our banners are rallied members of all parties. They are determined that this country shall prosper and progress according to the skill and resources with which it is blessed.

Some weeks ago it was my high honor to present the name of Wendell Willkie to the Republican Convention at Philadelphia. I nominated him with heartfelt enthusiasm because I know him to be a great American who understands the problems of all of our people—because he is a capable administrator of clear vision and great ability, and a citizen of unlimited patriotic devotion.

After the Philadelphia convention had named Wendell Willkie for the Presidency and CHARLES MCNARY for the Vice-Presidency, it passed unanimously a resolution of thanks to Congressman

JOSEPH W. MARTIN for his able and fair direction of the convention as its chairman. A week later Joe was named by Wendell Willkie to direct the Republican National Committee.

This appointment and high responsibility came to JOE MARTIN after almost 30 years of continuous service to the Republican Party. He began as a precinct worker in his native town of North Attleboro, Mass. He served in the State legislature and was in the State senate with Calvin Coolidge. He was, for a time, secretary of the Republican State Committee of Massachusetts. He next advanced to Congress, where he is now serving his sixteenth year.

Throughout the New Deal years JOE MARTIN has been a stalwart American. He served on the Rules Committee in those trying days when a New Deal majority lost all sense of responsibility and allowed the Congress to become a mere rubber stamp. But Joe never gave up the fight for constitutional principles and orderly procedures.

In 1937 he was elected chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, and in that capacity directed the 1938 campaign, which resulted in doubling the number of Republican Members in the House of Representatives and marked the turning of the tide which already signalizes a national triumph next November.

When the Seventy-sixth Congress assembled in January 1939 JOE MARTIN was unanimously elected minority leader. In that capacity he has done more to restore balanced constitutional government than any other individual in the United States. To work with him and for him has been a real privilege.

To JOE MARTIN now has been given the direction of this campaign to restore American government to the American people—to turn out an administration which has wasted billions during the last 7 years while neglecting the urgent problems of national defense—to place in the White House a man who has worked with his hands, who has won success by his own efforts, and whose heart and spirit are in tune with the aspirations of the American people for progress, security, and real recovery.

I present to you the man who will direct our victorious campaign, the Honorable JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., of Massachusetts, Republican leader in the House of Representatives and chairman of the Republican National Committee.

Keep Out of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHIL FERGUSON

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1940

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, in the next few days the Congress of the United States will have done its job and done it well. When the House sends the selective-service bill to the President without the Fish "delay" amendment, the Congress will have completed the enactment of President Roosevelt's defense program. Members of Congress can truthfully return to their districts with the comforting thought that every step has been taken to prepare this Nation against any attack. The Congress, in enacting President Roosevelt's program, has written in boxcar letters, the words "Keep Out of America," in letters that dictators can understand, and dictators can only understand "keep out" signs that are backed by real strength and preparedness.

There is no interval today between peace and war. Poland, Denmark, Holland, Norway, Belgium, were at peace one night to be destroyed by war with the dawn. There was no exchange of notes, no ultimatums, no warnings. The countries' only warnings were the bombers flying overhead. This Nation is taking no chances with an overnight destruction of its peace.

EIGHTY-SEVEN PERCENT OF REPUBLICANS FOR FISH "DELAY AMENDMENT"

I am sorry to say that a majority of the Republicans in the House in an effort to discredit our President and this administration, so vigorously opposed this last step in our defense machine, the selective-service bill. During the consideration of the bill the Republicans fought valiantly for the adoption of the Fish amendment which in my opinion destroys the effectiveness of the bill by depending on volunteers, depending on patriots alone to defend this Nation, not the democratic method of taking those best equipped and best financially able to go. One hundred and forty-three Republicans or 87 percent of those voting were in favor of delaying the training of adequate reserves for the defense of this Nation. That was not the most disheartening thing. After they were able to write this amendment into the bill they proved their insincerity by 112 or 68 percent of the Republicans voting against any measure that would provide the necessary men for our Army. To me this was purely political. How could any man vote for $10,000,000,000 as most of them did to provide equipment for an army and then refuse the legislation to provide the men and to provide the Government with the power to make the industries that refuse to cooperate, cooperate in the defense program.

COUNTRY WILL SOON BE PREPARED

The President to meet the great expansion program passed by Congress has appointed a Defense Advisory Council, headed by Mr. William S. Knudsen. Mr. Knudsen today on his return from an inspection of airplane factories had this to say:

> In spite of tremendous expansion there has been no decline in the quality of the airplanes.

After quoting figures to show the increase of production he ended with saying:

> Everybody agrees the American planes are the best in the world. I believe now we can build the most planes as well.

Equipment is being turned out and orders are being placed for complete equipment for 2,000,000 men. The Army in the last year has been almost doubled and, with taking in the National Guard, will be trebled. At the present time the Army and Navy have over 5,000 planes ready for action. Huge orders are now being built and the prospect of 35,000 planes for 1942 is almost sure to be a reality. The pilot-training program is keeping up with the production of planes.

Our Navy, already the biggest in the world, is being added to every day by new construction. New ships are completed weekly. We are making great progress toward a 2-ocean navy of 800 ships. This Navy is a personal tribute to President Roosevelt, who started with a mere skeleton in 1933 and has constantly worked for its construction, preparation, and training. The criticism of why we do not have more planes can well be answered in that the Army and Navy have been experimenting, every year making better and better planes until now military experts say that our planes that we are building and ordering now, due to these years of experimentation, are the fastest, have the longest range, and are the best-armed planes in the world.

FERGUSON SPONSORS DEFENSE BILLS

I am glad to say that I have had a small part in sponsoring this defense program in Congress. On April 10 I pointed out how fortunate the Nation was under the leadership of President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull to have realized what the world situation was, to have made friends with South America, and to have started our defense. On April 17 I pointed out to the Nation what had happened by inserting the famous Leland Stowe Trojan horse story into the RECORD, pointing out what can happen to a nation from within. On May 7 I urged the Nation to adequately equip and expand our armed forces. This has been done. Every step has meant that we are that much further away from war by invasion.

On May 24 I offered an amendment to the Military Affairs Committee bill that would have provided military training for the C. C. C. camps and training of mechanics in our schools. This amendment was rejected and I introduced a separate bill to provide training in the C. C. C. camps and the training of mechanics in our schools. The work of training mechanics is now being undertaken by the National Youth Administration, and I am still advocating military training in the C. C. C. camps.

On June 18, I believe, I was the first man to openly advocate a conscription bill on the floor of the House, and I want to quote briefly the statement I made at that time:

> Thanks to our President we have an adequate Navy or will have as soon as we can build it. Every day new ships are launched or near completion. This is the backbone of our defense to preserve the Monroe Doctrine. I hope the Members who today have urged us to vote for this measure will be as ready to vote for conscription when we are presented with that inevitable vote in the near future. By that I mean conscription of industry and resources as well as men.

FERGUSON FIGHTS DELAY ON LAW

Three months before Congress took action on this vital bill I was urging its passage. I am very grateful that its final passage will become a reality this week. On August 7, a month before the passage of the bill, I made this statement:

I hope and pray that no Member of this House in close districts will play politics with our national defense and let the political future of Members delay consideration of the vitally necessary conscription bill. Those who say they want to proceed with caution, I feel they want to see the insignia on the invading boats or airplanes. They want to see whether they are bearing the Nazi, Fascist, or some other foreign emblem on the wings of the attacking vessel before they start preparation to repel such an invasion.

My fears that some Members would play politics with the bill were borne out by the vote on the measure in the House, 87 percent of the Representatives voted for the Fish "delay amendment."

To me, no better proof could be asked of the President's wise course in acquiring the naval bases from England by trading destroyers. The men who played politics with the conscription bill would have delayed for an undetermined period the acquisition of these naval bases. No Member of Congress has opposed the acquisition of the bases, but many Members have questioned the method, and if the measure had been before the House they may have questioned the method until it was too late and those same bases were in the hands of an enemy power.

REPUBLICANS PLAY POLITICS WITH DEFENSE

Proof, the best proof I know, that the Republicans played politics in sponsoring the Fish amendment is borne out by the fact that the Republican standard bearer, Wendell L. Willkie, in yesterday's newspapers was reported as saying he was opposed to the Fish amendment and hoped it would be taken out of the conscription bill. I do not question the patriotism of the rank and file of the members of the Republican Party. But I do feel that their representation in Congress in their attempt to discredit a great President to bring about his defeat in November, have tried on this conscription bill to make it a political issue.

In my mind there is only one issue; that is, retain the prosperity of this great Nation, defend it against the world, keep the last stronghold of democracy alive in this dictator-ridden world and that job can best be done under the leadership of President Roosevelt, his great Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, and a Democratic Congress that will cooperate with the President in this defense program.

George Nicholas Seger

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT W. KEAN
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 11, 1940

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Speaker, the memory of our beloved friend and colleague, the late Representative GEORGE NICHOLAS SEGER, was paid a most fitting tribute at services held in the First Presbyterian Church of his home city of Passaic, N. J., on Sunday night, September 8. The services were held under the auspices of the veterans' organizations of the Eighth Congressional District. The eulogy was pronounced by Rev. George H. Talbott, pastor of the church, a veteran of the World War and a dear friend of Mr. SEGER. More than 1,000 veterans and other sorrowing friends heard Dr. Talbott speak, as follows:

The sudden death of Congressman GEORGE NICHOLAS SEGER at the United States Naval Hospital in Washington, early in the morning of August 26, this year, said Dr. Talbott, has cast a cloud of sorrow that has been most deeply felt in this city, but the darkness which burdens us has been felt throughout the entire congressional district, and has extended itself in varying degrees throughout our State and Nation.

Naturally his passing is most deeply mourned here in the city of Passaic, for while he was known and loved throughout the congressional district, it is here in this city where he made his home, where his children grew to maturity, where he labored in the early years of his business and political career, and it is here where he wanted to spend those sunset years of honorable retirement from public service.

It is altogether fitting and proper that this memorial service should be under the auspices of the Veterans of American Wars, and no one more than they realize that while they have taken upon themselves the responsibility for conducting a public memorial, there are truly thousands in various communities in no wise allied with veterans' organizations whose sentiments they are feebly trying to express.

BESPEAKS VETERANS' SYMPATHY

On behalf of the veterans of the Eighth Congressional District of New Jersey, said Dr. Talbott, who served overseas as a lieutenant of infantry in 1918, I convey especially to his daughter and sons our deep and heartfelt sympathy in the passing of their father. His accomplishments in public life must not in our mind overshadow the fact that above all position and beyond all honor he was a kind and devoted husband to his wife, who preceded his passing by 6 years, and although his duties as a public citizen necessarily occupied a vast amount of time, he was an affectionate and gracious father.

There are two schools of historians in the world, and these two schools have been from the beginning of time. One school of historians lays heavy emphasis upon dates and times and facts and figures. We may call this the factual school of history. There is another school that veers more toward the philosophical interpretation of those facts. This school of historians is not primarily concerned with the minute accuracy of dates and places but attempts to weigh effects and to view events in their ultimate impact upon life. It is in keeping with the second view of history I shall attempt to appraise the public life of our departed friend.

HIS SERVICE TO CITY AND NATION

After valued service to his city as a commissioner and mayor, he sat for 18 years among the leaders of our Nation and deliberated upon questions that concern our beloved land and have much to do with the course of world history in our time and in the future. In his record here and there one may find something with which to disagree, for disagreement on political matters is, I take it, still one of the few remaining rights which we have in America; but, nevertheless, the broad appraisal of his career shows the outlines of a sound statesmanlike understanding of the social and political problems that play such an important part in our workaday life. Throughout these 18 years in the Nation's service he had the advice and fidelity not only of his family but of his faithful secretary, Mr. Gordon Canfield. To him at this time I express the sympathy of the veterans.

NOT AN ORATOR OR TRICKSTER

What was there about GEORGE N. SEGER which made him Passaic's first citizen—one of the outstanding men of this State? Let me immediately dispose of some things. GEORGE N. SEGER was not an orator of the first rank. Many men have achieved political fame, and have made their contribution in history for good or ill primarily because of their gift for oratory, but GEORGE SEGER cannot be placed in that company. He spoke in plain understandable language and never indulged in fancy phrases that are designed to tickle the ear and deceive the soul. GEORGE N. SEGER was not what the public understands as a clever politician. He had no tricks—he never held before his people the glittering light of false hope. I have never heard he ever made a promise in the ear and broke it in the heart. He was not possessed of that undesirable quality, known as political necromancy, which gains a man temporarily, and in some instances a lifelong preference, only to be fully exposed at the time of his death.

It sometimes happens—in fact, it very frequently happens that while men are alive and in the full and flood tide of their power, they are able to submerge incidents and pervert the truth of their public life, which if known at the time, would have brought about universal condemnation, but which arises like spirits from the nether regions to plague their memory after death.

HE HAD NOTHING TO HIDE

No biographer, however scurrilous his character, or deep his venom, can now go from post to post, and gather bits of unexposed scandal about his life and parade them out for public consumption.

There are no stories about GEORGE SEGER that need to be covered with the remark, "Let nothing but good be said of the dead." No political chicanery comes to light. His record in death is what it was in life. He was a plain, honest, clean, sincere public servant, who was guided by his conscience and common sense, and did that which he thought was best for his district and his Nation.

Some men who aspire to serve the public believe in order to be successful they must resort to promises which they cannot fulfill and which they make only in order to secure their own personal advancement. GEORGE SEGER was successful in the realm of politics, and I challenge any man to accuse him of resorting to deceitful practices in order to secure his advancement.

MEN CAN LIVE CLEAN

We have been told, and it is quite deeply seated in the public mind that public service is of necessity laden with uncleanness and these who serve become unclean. The life of GEORGE SEGER is a standing and irrefutable argument against those who believe that. It has been said, and in some quarters it is widely believed, that in order to be a successful public servant, a man must consort with those elements in our life which are mean and vicious, and must pass on ribald stories and salacious tales to impress the man on the street that he is a regular fellow. The cleanness of GEORGE

SEGER's life and his cleanness of speech, brought him respect, admiration, and confidence amid all sections of society, and his life is a standing rebuke to those who feel that it is necessary to stir up the foul in order that they may perchance accomplish a little good.

HIS TOLERANCE

Some people believe it is necessary to arouse religious and racial and class hatred in order to advance themselves politically. Those who believe that can justly point to some who occupy high places in the world and have built themselves up in just that manner, for probably at this very hour in which I am speaking, there is more racial and religious hatred in the world than at any time within the memory of any living citizen. In truth, competent historians tell us that the waves of social and religious and class hatred, which are now engulfing the world, are greater at this time than at any time within the history of what we call modern civilization. We love and we admire GEORGE SEGER's life because no word of racial hatred, religious intolerance, or class antagonism ever escaped his lips. That is a broad statement. It is not made idly—it has been fully weighed but I challenge any man to show where he ever advanced himself politically by stirring class hatred, racial misunderstanding, or religious bigotry.

GEORGE SEGER, as near as any man I have personally known, incarnated within himself the essence of the American ideal of democracy. For many, democracy has been a hollow truth and the very word itself too often has become a platitude, but now when democracy is being challenged on all sides and important statesmen in the world are calling it the philosophy of degeneracy, it comes as a healthful breeze to realize that although our departed friend is no longer able to defend the fundamental truths of democracy as he exhibited them in his words and acts, it can be said in the language of the Scripture, "that he being dead, yet speaketh."

LOOKED TO HIS CONSTITUENTS

With GEORGE SEGER, public office was not a device to catch votes nor a means to attain power. He was a representative of his district. He heard the voice of constituents. He had confidence in the judgment of his constituents. He did not believe he was infallible. He believed that although he was intimately connected with affairs of the Nation that his own constituents, no matter how humble a station in life they held, were able to give him information and insight on national conditions that affected them vitally.

We in America today need to do much serious thinking regarding our democracy. We need to thoroughly weigh in the balance with calm, dispassionate reasoning the pros and cons of our constitutional democracy. We must be on our guard that the birthright for which our ancestors fought and for which some of us have offered our services, is not taken from our hands because of selfish motives on our part or because we have refused through laziness to guard that sacred treasure handed down to us and fragrant with the blood of many martyrs.

GEORGE SEGER AND THE VETERANS

That is the reason why veterans were dear to the heart of GEORGE N. SEGER. They stood ready to die for their country, and to him pure democracy is one of the gifts of God that may require life itself to preserve. He was not a military man. His philosophy of life had no place for force used as a means of international exploitation, but he firmly believed that the heritage which is to use one of our God-given rights was ours because men had been willing to lay down the tools of secular life and to temporarily take the instruments of war in order to guard and perpetuate those things which are dearer to us than life itself. That is the reason why it is that every veteran in this congressional district found in GEORGE SEGER a friend. It was not because at one time we veterans had belonged to the military but that we belonged to the military only because that was the means found necessary to preserve the God-given rights that we Americans want to be ours.

The strong winds of life in a very short time blow away from the memory we leave the superficial things of our character. The memory of all of us within a few short years will be bleak and gaunt. The harsh winds of life beat about our memories as the sands beat against the sphinx of Egypt, leaving only the rugged outlines which are strengthened by masses of stone.

WHAT WILL VERDICT BE?

What will be the verdict of the history of this community of the life of GEORGE N. SEGER as he lived among us, as a businessman, as a member of the board of education, as a commissioner, and mayor of our city, and as our Representative in the National Congress? It has only been a short time since his death. In fact it has been so brief that his name is spoken in the hushed tones that mark places of bereavement, but even now the permanent outlines of his character are engraving themselves upon the public mind.

I do not wish to assume the role of a prophet, but I do venture to say that the enduring memory of our friend will be the outline of a man whose outstanding characteristic was a rugged honesty, a deep devotion toward public service, a statesman of sound judgment, not carried away by every will-o-wisp of strange economic fancy, nor swayed by the breezes of false political philosophies. In a day when many brilliant men are being carried away by political ideas that history proves to be disastrous and futile, GEORGE SEGER stood out like a rock for soundness, sobriety, honesty of intention, and deep integrity.

The fact that he had but 4 short months before he would have voluntarily retired from elective office in nowise dims the glory of his achievements. It was his fond desire to retire and spend the sunset days of his life amid the scenes where his heart had its deepest attachment, with and among his friends in Passaic, and in and through this congressional district, where older men regarded him as a brother, younger men regarded him as a father, and children regarded him with honor and pride.

NO WASTE-AND-SPEND MAN

I have been told that when he superintended the construction of our high school he turned back to the city some $7,000. If the spend-and-waste philosophy of finance and economics be the true one, his act is not to his credit for he was a saving man. But, if thrift, honest wages, and honest work still are the fundamental stones of any true national economy, then let us place in that school a plaque to his memory with the words inscribed:

"To the memory of a just man, who believed you cannot secure national prosperity by national waste."

He wished to retire and pass on to younger shoulders the spotless mantle of public service he wore with such joy to himself and such honor to his district. In the providence of God, "man proposes but God disposes," and the retirement that he desired for himself has been translated by the heavenly angels to the request to come hither and higher.

The literature of this world is rich in expression of beauty of those who face the eternal with stout heart and uplifted face. From the storehouse of precious memory, what shall we choose? Shall it be Horatio's farewell to Hamlet:

"Now cracks a noble heart. Good night, sweet prince, and may flights of angels sing thee to thy rest."

Shall it be Donald Hankey's farewell to the beloved captain, dear to the heart of every veteran:

"But he lives. Somehow he lives. And we who knew him do not forget. We feel his eyes on us. We still work for that wonderful smile of his. There are not many of the old lot left now; but I think that those who 'went west' have seen him. When they got to the other side I think they were met. Someone said, 'Well done, good and faithful servant.' And as they knelt before that gracious pierced figure, I reckon they saw nearby the captain's smile. Anyway, in that faith let me die, if death should come my way, and so, I think, shall I die content."

Methinks the most appropriate leave-taking is Bunyan's death of Valiant-for-truth.

"After this it was noised abroad that Valiant-for-truth was taken with a summons and had this for his token, that the summons was true, 'That his pitcher was broken at the fountain.' When he understood that, he called his friends and told them of it. Then, said he, I am going to my Father. My sword I give to him that shall succeed me in my pilgrimage, and my courage and skill to him that can get it. My marks and scars I carry with me, to be a witness for me, that I have fought his battles who now will be my rewarder. When the day that he must go hence was come, many accompanied him to the riverside, into which as he went he said, 'Death, where is thy sting?' And as he went down deeper, he said, 'Grave, where is thy victory?' So he passed over, and all the trumpets sounded for him on the other side."

"Wherefore by Their Fruits Ye Shall Know Them"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHIL FERGUSON

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1940

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, while not what some might call a religious man, I am a member of the church and do feel there has been no greater masterpiece than the Bible. To me one of the most pertinent phrases in the Great Book is found in St. Matthew, chapter 7, verse 20: "Wherefore by their fruits ye shall know them."

As a member of the Agriculture Committee I have had a part in forming what I consider a great Democratic farm program. Before Franklin D. Roosevelt and the Democratic Party took charge, in 1932 what did the farmers of America have? They had the Farm Board and the panic. They now have soil and water conservation, low interest rates, rural electrification, marketing units, commodity loans, parity payments, the stamp plan, and the distribution of surpluses.

Before I get through with my speech today I want to point out clearly to the farmers of this Nation what part a majority of the Republicans have had in shaping this program. It had never occurred to me to have so closely observed the Republican votes on this program if the Republican convention had not practically endorsed the farm program and if the Republican candidate for the Presidency, Wendell L. Willkie, had not made this statement, as quoted by the New York Times of August 11, 1940:

I do not favor changing the present farm program unless a better one is gradually evolved. I wish to repeat that, if elected President, I will not take away any of the farm benefits gained by agriculture during the last few years.

I want you to particularly note the language used by Nominee Willkie:

I will not take away any of the farm benefits gained by agriculture during the last few years.

Of course, Mr. Willkie has never had any experience with a Republican Congress, and what a sad experience it would be for Mr. Willkie and for the farmers of the United States.

REPUBLICAN LEADERS AGAINST FARM PROGRAM

The important committee in supplying funds to carry out the agriculture program as written by the Agriculture Committee is the Committee on Appropriations. If the Republicans should elect a majority of the Congress, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] would be chairman of that powerful Committee on Appropriations. When the bill providing parity payments for the farmers was before the House this year, Mr. TABER made the following statement:

I rise to say to the gentlemen and to the membership of the House that I am opposed to parity payments, and I am going to urge every Member of the House to vote against it.

Note his language well. He urges every Member of the House to vote against this bill that provides the money for parity payments. Allow me to quote the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LAMBERTSON] another Republican member of the Appropriations Committee that provides funds for the farm program. On March 28, Mr. LAMBERTSON said:

I am going to vote against this increase of parity payments. Agriculture is not going to come into its own through parity payments. Let's vote against all of these things.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LAMBERTSON] was as good as his word. He voted against every appropriation that would provide for carrying out the farm program, against the money for farm tenancy, against the money for soil conservation, against the money for the development of our water resources, against the money for parity payments. These two men at the head of the Appropriations Committee, to their tender mercies, would be thrust the fate of the American farmers' program. There could be but one answer if the farmers of this country elected a majority of Republicans to the House of Representatives. There would be no farm program, in spite of the fact that Mr. Willkie would, with generous promises, lead the farmers into the Republican fold.

I cannot overestimate the effect Republican leadership would have on farm legislation. For 12 years the Republicans controlled the House and passed not one single constructive farm bill. Now, if by chance the farmers of this Nation vote against their interests and elect a majority of Republicans to the House, the gentleman from the industrial State of Massachusetts, JOSEPH C. MARTIN, will become Speaker of the House. He is Mr. Willkie's campaign manager. He was chosen for that position undoubtedly because he represents the views of the majority of Republicans. In the 15 years, the gentleman from Massachusetts, JOSEPH MARTIN, has served in Congress he has never voted for a single vital farm measure. He would occupy the position of Speaker of the House in a Republican Congress with almost virtual control of what legislation can come before the House. Do you think any farm legislation would be favorably considered with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN], in the Speaker's chair?

GREAT MAJORITY OF REPUBLICAN MEMBERS AGAINST FARM PROGRAM

In case you think that I have selected a few Republican leaders that happen to be opposed to the farm program, let me give you the record of the Republican membership of the House during the last session of Congress.

In the Seventy-fifth Congress, although 70 percent of the Republicans voted against most of the farm measures, they did not have enough votes to be of serious threat.

But when the number of Republicans was increased from 90 to 169 in the Seventy-sixth Congress they began to be a threat to agricultural legislation and I want to warn the farmers that an increase of 30 or 40 Republicans in the House would give them sufficient majority to strangle farm legislation.

Let me give you the votes on measures affecting agriculture in this Seventy-sixth Congress.

1. On the first vote providing for parity payments the vote was 135 Republicans against the measure. Eighty-nine percent of the Republicans in Congress opposed parity payments on a record vote.

2. The vote on crop insurance—111 Republicans voted against, or 92 percent of the voting Republicans registered their opposition to this program that has been the salvation of many wheat farmers. On the other hand, only 1 Democrat voted against this measure.

3. On the vote to extend the activities of the Extension Department which goes into the homes of many farmers, 106 Republicans voted against, or 92 percent of the Republicans voting.

4. When the House again had a chance to vote on parity payments, 131 Republicans voted against, or 85 percent of their membership still voted against equality for the farmer.

5. I want to call to your attention when money was proposed for the stamp plan 130 of the Republicans voted against, or 89 percent were opposed to giving American agricultural surpluses to the undernourished unemployed of this Nation.

6. On May 14 for the sixth time the Republicans expressed their contempt for the farmers by voting against the Bankhead-Jones farm-tenant money; 132 of the Republicans voting said "no" to the tenant farmers of America in their effort to get farm homes; 96 percent of the Republicans voting said, "We are opposed to giving the tenant farmers of the Nation a chance to own their own homes."

7. The seventh demonstration of the Republican opposition to farm aid came very close to my heart and to the hearts of the people of the western section of my district. Provisions had been made for the construction of water facilities and small irrigation projects in the semiarid sections. On June 19, 113 Republicans, or 87 percent of those voting, said to the farmers in the Panhandle of Oklahoma, "We are not in favor of developing the proper use of water that you may raise crops in dry years to care for your cattle and livestock." If the Republicans had been able to gain a few more seats in the last election, as they are striving so hard to do at this election, there would have been no such program in the Panhandle of Oklahoma.

8. And now I come to the vote on the proposition that really shows what little interest the Republicans have in the welfare of the farmer. Every wheat farmer knows today without the ever-normal granery, the plan that allows the farmer to store his wheat and get a Government loan on it, this year would have seen 25-cent wheat. The farmer would have been unable to hold his product and the speculator would have bought it at his own price, to reap a rich harvest later in the year, at the expense of our farmers.

Just before Willkie had promised the Republicans would keep the farm program, his adopted party, led by that seasoned campaigner against farm legislation, the gentleman from Massachusetts, JOE MARTIN, voted to place a dagger in the heart of American agriculture by withholding money for loans on wheat and other farm products. One hundred and six Republicans voted against providing funds for these loans. Not a Democrat voted against the loan provision.

Mr. Speaker, you can see why I turn to the Scriptures to find a passage in which the American people can put their faith. Certainly they can have no faith in Republican campaign promises and they should think very clearly, very thoughtfully, and very prayerfully about the results of a Republican victory that would place enough votes in the House of Representatives to defeat their farm program.

Farmers are not easily fooled. They will judge the Republican farm promises by the fruits of the Republican Party in the past and will take no chances on a Republican majority strangling the farm program and placing the farm industry back in the panic of 1932. We who have written the Democratic farm program realize its imperfections, but it can best be perfected in the hands of its friends, not in the hands of its enemies.

The Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States Advocate Adequate National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 11, 1940

RESOLUTION OF THE FORTY-FIRST NATIONAL ENCAMPMENT, VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, at the request of Millard W. Rice, legislative representative, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, I am inserting a copy of the resolution on national defense adopted at the Forty-first National Encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, held at Los Angeles, August 25 to 30, inclusive.

The contents of this resolution will make clear the stand taken by the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, whose membership is comprised of veterans with overseas service.

Whereas the happening of the events across the seas during the past year in particular, has clearly demonstrated the utter hopelessness of unprepared nations to withstand the onslaughts of powerfully prepared totalitarian nations which force their might against the principles of right; and

Whereas it is a well-known fact that our own country is not now sufficiently prepared properly to defend its national integrity; and

Whereas it is almost axiomatic that military, industrial, and financial preparation for war is the best assurance for the preservation of peace and our national integrity; and

Whereas the policies of aggressor nations—based on power—demand that our armed forces be promptly increased sufficiently to withstand any possible aggression against the United States, or any part of the Americas; and

Whereas it is very uncertain that reliance on voluntary enlistments can provide an adequate number of trained men quickly enough to meet the urgent need for enlarged defensive forces; and

Whereas we, as Veterans of Foreign Wars, well know that the lack of adequate military training resulted in needless sacrifice of American lives in the World war: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Forty-first National Encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That—

1. We reiterate the long-established policies of the V. F. W. vigorously advocating specific increases in trained men, and in scientifically developed, modernized, mechanized, motorized material—such as tanks, airplanes, battleships, antiaircraft guns, and other armament and equipment—for the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard of the United States, and for the National Guard, the C. M. T. C., the R. O. T. C., and various other reserve components, by liberalized authorizations and increased appropriations of sufficient magnitude to withstand any possible aggression against the Western Hemisphere.

2. We favor (a) the immediate adoption of a system of compulsory military training during time of peace, for all physically fit young men, after the completion of which they shall be transferred to a reserve component, subject to call to active duty in the event of national emergency, and (b) the adoption of a system to be applicable during time of war of universal, selective, compulsory military service as to all physically fit men, when needed.

3. We advocate that those who actively serve, and those who shall have actively served, in any compulsory military training, or compulsory service unit, be extended the same rights, privileges, benefits, and emoluments as may be provided for those who serve, or have served, in the regular armed forces of the United States, and for their dependents, and also such protection as to reemployment, seniority rights, and such other rights as may be found practicable.

4. We do hereby emphatically reaffirm our advocacy of legislation to tax the profits out of war and the preparation for war, by steeply graduated personal and corporation income taxes, so as more nearly to equalize the burdens of war.

5. The National defense committee and the national legislative committee of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States are hereby directed to make careful study as to the need for additional legislation to provide for the effective and speedy mobilization of manpower, capital, transportation, communication, and material resources, in order to be able successfully to resist aggression against the United States, or any part of the Americas, and that upon the conclusion of such study, the national legislative committee is hereby authorized and directed to sponsor, support, and cooperate with others in securing the enactment of legislation to provide for such objectives.

Far Eastern Triangle

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL HINSHAW

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 11, 1940

ARTICLE BY K. K. KAWAKAMI

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, under authority granted to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I submit an article entitled "Far Eastern Triangle," written by Mr. K. K. Kawakami, a Japanese who for many years has been the Washington correspondent of the Osaka Mainichi and the Tokyo Nichi-Nichi. Mr. Kawakami is also the author of several important books, among them being Japan Speaks, Manchoukuo: Child of Conflict, and Japan in China. This article appears in the July issue of Foreign Affairs, an American quarterly review (vol. 18, No. 4, pp. 632–645).

This article by Mr. Kawakami is most significant. Couched as it is in diplomatic language, a type of language most difficult for the average American reader who is accustomed to the newspaper and magazine style of the times, it is difficult to understand. Consequently, in reading the article every word and phrase must be studied carefully for its meaning and its import. In fact, this article is so carefully written that one could conceive of its having been written by the Japanese Foreign Office. But in any event, in all probability it had the approval of the Japanese Foreign Office before it was released.

This article evidently presents the Japanese position in respect to the present situation in the Orient. I call your attention, especially, to its reference to and explanation of the persistent difference in treatment of the situation in the Orient by Great Britain and the United States, respectively, and the fundamental difference in objective of these countries. Students of American foreign relations will recognize the lack of harmony between these objectives and the reason why British policy in the Orient continues in some respects to run counter to and afoul of the policy of the United States. This fact, coupled with the current international situation and the activities of our own Government, indicate that we may be perilously near a serious break, and if it occurs we must expect to go it alone. If this break should occur, and it is then necessary for us to go it alone, subsequent events are not likely to be brought to a conclusion in the near future, but might well run into a long period of time and end in a stalemate, which could not be to the advantage of either Japan or the United States. I believe this, although opinions differ materially on this subject. The question remains, however, are the respectively desired results worth the cost to either side?

The article by Mr. K. K. Kawakami follows:

[From Foreign Affairs for July 1940]

FAR EASTERN TRIANGLE

(By K. K. Kawakami)

Ever since the demise of the Anglo-Japanese alliance after the Washington conference of 1921–22, the far eastern policy of the United States has apparently been based upon the assumption that British and American interests in China are identical. For this reason Washington has taken it for granted that in the Orient

London will pursue a policy parallel to that of the United States. But this assumption has in fact not always been justified by events during the last 18 years, for Britain's Far East policy has often run counter to the wishes of the American Government. True, the present war in Europe has momentarily given added support to the American theory of parallel action now that Britain finds it imperative to retain the good will of the United States. Yet the irony of fate is such that the same war is bringing about England's reconciliation with Japan.

After the World War, British opinion was divided as to whether or not the Japanese Alliance should be terminated. The British people in general, and Downing Street in particular, were in favor of keeping it alive. Several leading statesmen—notably Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. Arthur Balfour, Lord Curzon, and Lord Lee of Fareham—were also of this opinion. At an imperial conference held at London in 1921, India, Australia, and New Zealand expressed themselves against the abrogation of the alliance, though Canada, presumably under American influence, insisted upon its termination. Meanwhile Washington had made up its mind to break up the alliance by any means. Secretary Hughes even intimated to the British Ambassador in Washington that if England refused to part company with Japan, Congress might register its displeasure by passing a resolution recognizing the Irish Republic.

The American Government took this firm stand against the alliance in spite of assurances from both Japan and England that under no circumstances would it be invoked against the United States. As revised in 1911 the alliance absolved England and Japan from any obligation to go to the other's aid if one of them were involved in a war with the United States. This provision was embodied in the following terms: "Should either high-contracting party conclude a treaty of general arbitration with a third power, it is agreed that nothing in this agreement shall entail upon such contracting party an obligation to go to war with the power with whom such treaty of arbitration is in force." Unfortunately, the American Senate failed to ratify the arbitration treaty which Britain concluded in order to give effect to this article of the alliance. Nevertheless, both Tokyo and London made it clear that they considered its provisions fully effective, since they held that the Bryan Peace Commission Treaty of 1914 was a general arbitration agreement. Yet this explanation did not satisfy Washington.

Why did Britain continue to desire the alliance even after the German menace had been eliminated? The answer is that England was now faced with a totally new danger, that of Communist revolution along the Asiatic fringes of her empire in Afghanistan, India, and China. In order to cope with this new peril Britain maintained friendly relations with Japan. She knew, of course, that Japan herself had become a rival, a dangerous rival, in China; but that was only added reason for regarding the alliance as essential to British interests. This reasoning was not paradoxical. England believed that she could restrain Japan's ambitions in China by befriending her. Up to the very eve of the Washington Conference, Britain and the Dominions, except Canada and South Africa, hoped the alliance could somehow be saved. With that hope in mind they proposed that an international conference convene at London to discuss the Far Eastern situation prior to the meeting at Washington. This plan was vetoed by the United States, which suspected that it was conceived in a desire to preserve the alliance. In the end the American Government scuttled the alliance at the Washington Conference and substituted the so-called Four Power Pacific Treaty.

The termination of the alliance left Japan in no happy mood, for she had come almost superstitiously to rely upon British cooperation. In China, especially, she had regarded British support as essential for maintaining her political and economic position. Quite naturally she felt as though the keystone had fallen out of her diplomatic arch when the Washington Conference tolled the knell of the alliance.

But Japanese statesmen, though they knew that the American Government was responsible for the end of the alliance, nonetheless adopted a policy of friendliness toward the United States and guided public sentiment so as to promote that policy. As they saw it, the World War had shaken the British Empire to its foundations, while the United States, on the other hand, had emerged as the greatest power in the world. Japan had to face this fact in reorienting her diplomacy. They also knew that her growing influence in China might conflict with Britain's vast interests there, while she could foresee no such conflict with the United States, whose Chinese interests were small. It was no doubt these considerations which persuaded Tokyo to pursue a policy of friendliness toward Washington in preference to London.

The Japanese public was not fully informed as to the part played by Washington in terminating the Anglo-Japanese alliance, but was allowed to gain the impression that England, having got all the good out of it, had then left Japan in the lurch. This widespread belief, coupled with a rising anti-British sentiment in China, rendered England's position increasingly difficult. Britain had consented to abrogate the alliance in the hope that China, which had vigorously opposed it, would become more friendly. She had also hoped that should her Chinese interests be seriously menaced by China or Japan, the United States, which had offered its cooperation in place of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, would come to her rescue. Neither of these hopes was fulfilled.

By the beginning of 1925 it was evident that a putsch against British interests was about to take place in China. In the fall of 1926 the Chinese Nationalists—partly financed by Moscow and guided by Borodin, Galen (later known as General Bluecher), and other Bolshevik emissaries—surged through South China and established themselves in the Yangtze Valley, long Britain's exclusive sphere of influence. They flaunted such slogans as "Down with the British," and "Away with British exploitation." Indeed, the success of the Nationalists' campaign was primarily due to their anti-British propaganda promising the masses that if British imperialism were put to rout all would be well with China. Downing Street sounded out Tokyo and Washington for help, but in vain. That Japan should be cool to the British request was understandable enough; but many Englishmen, remembering the American promise of cooperation at the Washington Conference, were disappointed with the aloofness of the United States. Under these circumstances Britain could only retreat before the Nationalist onsloughts.

And so His Majesty's government, on December 18, 1926, proposed to the powers signatory to the Washington Treaty that certain surtaxes which the Nationalists had levied on foreign trade in violation of treaty obligations be recognized and regularized. To this friendly gesture the Nationalists responded in January 1927 by forcibly seizing the British concessions at Hankow and Kiu-kiang. In March, Nationalist agitation against the British in Nanking led to the looting of several foreign consulates and many foreign firms, residences and missionary institutions, and the murder or serious injury of several prominent foreigners. The situation became so deplorable that on May 9, Sir Austen Chamberlain admitted in the House of Commons that "the Nationalist government have neither observed the spirit of the agreement signed at Hankow, nor have they made any attempt to reciprocate the friendly attitude which we have displayed toward them." And yet "His Majesty's government are," Sir Austen declared almost in the same breath, "unwilling, even under such provocation as they have received, to abandon their hope that this friendly policy will presently evoke an equally friendly response from a Chinese Government freed from foreign domination and thus, enabled to devote itself to the single-minded service of the interests of the Chinese."

Hitherto English businessmen in China had assumed that the Anglo-Japanese alliance served to advance Japanese interests at their expense, and that once this pact was dissolved, British influence and trade would again have smooth sailing. Now, however, they were sadly disillusioned, some of them frankly admitting their blunder in casting aside Japanese friendship. Boycotted by the Chinese singled out for attack by "red" agitators, and uncertain of the value of American friendship, these Britishers began to advocate a pro-Japanese reorientation in London's foreign policy.

In England, too, this sentiment found sympathizers, especially in conservative circles. Although the Government itself had no intention of reversing the policy adopted at the Washington conference, it nevertheless felt that Britain's termination of the alliance with Japan had placed her in no bed of roses. This feeling was the more poignant since the American attitude towards the English in China seemed to be one of rivalry rather than of cooperation. When Downing Street made its proposal that the powers should regularize the nationalists' illegal levy of surtaxes upon foreign imports, Washington felt—at least it was so stated in American newspapers—that Britain had stolen a march on the United States by attempting to play the big brother to China, a role it had long considered an American monopoly. In any event, Secretary of State Kellogg, in a public statement on January 26, 1927, went much further than the British in this Chinese tariff question. Mr. Kellogg emphasized American solicitude for China's "unity, independence, and prosperity," and declared that "the United States is now and has been ever since the negotiation of the Washington treaty prepared to enter into negotiations with any Government of China or delegates who can prepresent or speak for China not only for the putting into force of the surtaxes of the Washington treaty, but entirely releasing tariff control and restoring complete tariff autonomy to China." It looked as though the winning of Chinese goodwill had become a matter of rivalry between Washington and London. And indeed, on July 25, 1928, Secretary Kellogg surprised the world by making public the text of a brief treaty which had been hastily signed by Mr. T. V. Soong, the Nationalist Finance Minister, and Mr. John V. A. MacMurray, the American Minister at Peiping, and in which the United States recognized "the principle of complete national-tariff autonomy" for China—a recognition which Britain was unwilling to grant.

Such was the history of the divergences between British and American policies vis-à-vis Japan and China during the decade following the World War. These differences were thrown into still clearer relief by the Manchurian "incident" of 1931. To frustrate Japan's designs on Manchuria, Secretary of State Stimson repeatedly urged the League of Nations, whose interest in the crisis seemed only half-hearted, to take measures strong enough to check Japanese aggression. He also made several direct approaches to Downing Street. His final proposal was that England and the United States jointly invoke the Nine Power Treaty, because—as Mr. Stimson says in his book, The Far Eastern Crisis—economic sanctions against Japan "would have more chance of being adopted by Congress if it were recommended following the invocation of the Nine Power Treaty than if it had been recommended solely by the League of Nations." Several times Mr. Stimson called Sir John Simon on the trans-Atlantic telephone, and each time the British Foreign Secretary's reply was so lukewarm and uncertain that Mr. Stimson had to admit that "my plan was blocked" and that "the British nonjoinder obviously killed the possibility of any such démarche." In the British view, Manchuria was merely an outlying territory of China where British interests were small and from which England could gracefully retreat with no vital sacrifice. British statesmen believed that the part of wisdom for Britain was to keep Japanese friendship in order to preserve their much larger interests in China proper during the years to follow.

Under its nonrecognition doctrine the United States treated Manchukuo as if it were an outcast. The English, on the other hand, in 1934 sent there an economic mission led by Lord Barnby and representing the powerful Federation of British Industries. The mission was "unofficial" and "nonpolitical"; but no one, reading its highly favorable report on Manchukuo, could help attaching to it a greater significance than met the eye. A year later an American economic mission made a tour of the Far East, but studiously avoided Manchukuo and in its report said not a word about the economic prospects of that area. It is hard to believe that American businessmen could have been so sentimental except under political influence.

On April 18, 1934, the Japanese Foreign Office, through Mr. Eiji Amau, Chief of the Information Bureau and so-called spokesman, issued a statement enunciating a principle which was regarded abroad as an imitation of the Monroe Doctrine. Its English version, as given out in Tokyo, was vague in meaning and very clumsy in phraseology. The translation published the same day by the British Foreign Office was much clearer. It said in part: "* * * supplying China with war airplanes, building of aerodromes in China, and detailing military instructors or military advisers to China, or contracting a loan to provide funds for political uses would obviously tend to alienate friendly relations between Japan, China, and other countries and to disturb peace and order of Eastern Asia. Japan will oppose such projects. The foregoing attitude of Japan should be clear from policies she has pursued in the past, but on account of the fact that positive movements for joint action in China by foreign powers, under one pretext or another are reported to be on foot, it is deemed not inappropriate to reiterate her policy at this time."

The Japanese were moved to make this declaration as a result of several alarming rumors. For one thing, it was reported that powerful American interests had been supplying China with military planes and pilots and had even obtained a concession to build an airfield at a point on the Fukien coast 80 miles from a Japanese naval harbor off Formosa. For another, Sir Frederick Leith-Ross, Financial Adviser to the British Government, had been evolving a plan to give China considerable financial aid. Then, too, the League of Nations had been sending various experts to China to find out how best it could help the Nanking Government.

On April 30, Mr. Hull issued a formal statement, of which the tenor is indicated by the following sentence: "In the opinion of the American people and the American Government, no nation can, without the assent of the other nations concerned, rightfully endeavor to make conclusive its will in a situation where there are involved the rights, the obligations, and the legitimate interests of other sovereign states." The American Ambassador at Tokyo was instructed to reiterate these views to the Japanese Foreign Office.

The British Foreign Office, however, talked in another language. On May 18, 1934, Sir John Simon told the House of Commons that the Nine Power Treaty contained no provision whereby "this country undertook to respect and preserve the integrity of Chinese territory." 'It is not true," he declared, "that we have ever signed, or * * * anyone has signed, a treaty with China in which we have pledged ourselves to use all our forces to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of China including Manchuria." Furthermore, the British Foreign Office seems to have inclined to the belief that the activities of Sir Frederick Leith-Ross in China were inimical to England's friendly relations with Japan. An Associated Press dispatch, dated London, November 26, 1935, reported that the "British Foreign Office disapproves his [Sir Frederick's] whole mission and particularly disapproves the wordy exchanges * * * between him and the Japanese," and that while his activities were supported by the Treasury the "Foreign Office believes * * * that any attempt to restore China's finances is doomed until there is political agreement between China and Japan."

All this seems to justify the assumption that the abrogation of the Anglo-Japanese alliance did not change the basic principle of British policy towards Japan—that an aggressive Japan could best be restrained, not by fault-finding and nagging, but by friendliness and conciliation. Since the outbreak of Sino-Japanese hostilities in July 1937 this policy has been put to a severer test than ever before. The sinking of the British gunboat Ladybird in the Yangtze and the bombing of the motor car in which the British Ambassador to China was traveling from Nanking to Shanghai, even though accidental, taxed British pride. The Japanese blockade of the British concession at Tientsin caused Mr. Chamberlain to say in the House of Commons on August 4, 1939, that "it makes my blood boil to hear and read some things that have been happening there." And yet, in spite of all the exasperating things which have been happening in China, the indications are that England, following her traditional policy, will eventually come to terms with Japan.

At the Brussels conference, called in November 1937, to condemn Japan's acts in China, Mr. Anthony Eden, the British Foreign Secretary, was obviously content to play second fiddle to the American delegate, Mr. Norman H. Davis. The resolution adopted by the conference was mainly the work of the American delegation. The Japanese interpreted these facts as another evidence of Britain's reluctance to make herself the butt of Japan's enmity, a reluctance that became more and more pronounced as the European situation deteriorated.

On July 15, 1939, the British Ambassador at Tokyo, Sir Robert Craigie, opened conversations with the Japanese Foreign Minister, Mr. Hachiro Arita. The British authorities at Tientsin had rejected a Japanese demand that four Chinese terrorists, who at a point inside the British Concession had assassinated the pro-Japanese superintendent of the Tientsin Customs, be handed over to the local Chinese court for trial. The Japanese had replied on June 15 by blockading the Concession. In reality, England hoped that the settlement of the Tientsin affair would prove a starting point for the improvement of Anglo-Japanese relations along broader fronts.

By July 24 the conferees had agreed upon general principles applicable not only to the Tientsin imbroglio but to the Chinese situation as a whole On that day Sir Robert therefore signed the following memorandum:

"His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom fully recognise the actual situation in China where hostilities, on a large scale, are in progress, and note that, as long as that state of affairs continues to exist, the Japanese forces in China have special requirements for the purpose of safeguarding their own security and maintaining public order in regions under their control and that they have to suppress or remove any such acts or causes as will obstruct them or benefit their enemy. His Majesty's government have no intention of countenancing any act or measures prejudicial to the attainment of the above-mentioned objects by Japanese forces and they will take this opportunity to confirm their policy in this respect by making it plain to British authorities and British nationals in China that they should refrain from such acts and measures."

When the British memorandum was made public, Washington was agog. Outwardly the State Department maintained a decorous silence. Nevertheless, on July 26, 2 days after the Craigie-Arita understanding had been made public, it notified the Japanese Embassy of its decision to abrogate the American-Japanese Commercial Treaty of 1911. Was there any connection between this sudden American move and the Anglo-Japanese agreement at Tokyo? In Tokyo, at any rate, the American notification has been interpreted as a move to bolster the wavering British. The Japanese Foreign Office, in response to persistent public clamor, let Mr. Seijiro Yoshizawa, chief of the American Affairs Bureau, explain the American move over the nation-wide broadcasting system. "On July 26, at 4 p. m. (July 27, 5 a. m. Tokyo time)," he said, "the State Department handed to the Japanese Embassy a very brief note for treaty termination with the verbal advice that the document spoke for itself, that no further explanation was necessary, and that it would be given to the press at once. Only at the Embassy's request was its publication withheld for a few hours to give the Tokyo Foreign Office just enough time to receive the note before it was flashed across the Pacific by the press." Why, asked Yoshizawa, was the abrogation done so suddenly? "Perhaps," he suggested, "the American move had something to do with the Anglo-Japanese conversations which had been in progress in Tokyo."

The Craigie memorandum of July 24 was duly communicated to Washington by the British Government. To the questions which the State Department doubtless asked, the British apparently replied with assurances that though no change was contemplated in their policy of Anglo-American cooperation, they regretted that the European situation did not permit them to pursue in China a course exactly parallel to that of the United States. This much at least was gathered from Mr. Chamberlain's address before the House of Commons on August 5, 1939, when he declared that "if the British Government says it does not regard this formula (the Craigie-Arita memorandum) as making any change in our policy, as indeed it does not, that is much more important than the alteration of words in a formula which has been arrived at after much difficulty and hours of discussion." In reply to a question as to why Britain could not follow the American example and denounce her commercial treaty with Japan, Mr. Chamberlain pointed to the "fundamental difference of the United States of America and its isolation from Europe and this country," and said that "we would much rather settle our differences with the Japanese by discussion and negotiation." The Prime Minister concluded with these words: "We shall endeavor to show patience and to exercise reasonable moderation, recognizing that behind all these outrageous things (done by the Japanese) there may be some genuine suspicion on the part of the Japanese in China about our treatment of them, but above all let us not forget that there may be even graver and nearer problems to be considered in the course of the next few months."

Besides the threat of war across the Channel, Downing Street had to consider the possibility, even probability, of Japan's joining the Berlin-Rome axis, not only to combat the Comintern but to form a united military front against England and France. Even while Mr. Chamberlain was uttering the above-quoted words, Berlin and Rome were moving heaven and earth to obtain a quick and favorable decision from Japan. In Tokyo too a powerful group had been vigorously working to push Japan into the projected triple alliance. What would become of Hong Kong and of Britain's tremendous investments in China, were Japan to ally with Germany? Worse, what would happen in India if Japan were to sweep British influence from East Asia? Would not Australia, New Zealand, and the British possessions in the South Pacific be opened to an attack by the Japanese Navy? Certainly these questions received a most serious consideration at Whitehall during the critical days of August 1939.

Hitler's scuttling of the anticomintern league by joining hands with Stalin made the situation even more ominous, for Berlin now urged Tokyo to come to terms with Moscow so that a great bloc extending from the Rhine to the Pacific might be created. This, coupled with the abrogation of the American commercial treaty with Japan, was a portent which England could not ignore. Indeed, history does not lack instances in which American pressure or antagonism drove Japan into Russia's arms. Secretary Knox's famous Manchurian railway scheme to "smoke Japan out," as he expressed it, led to the Russo-Japanese Convention of 1911. The hostility of the United States toward the Sino-Japanese agreement resulting from the so-called "twenty-one demands" was largely responsible for the virtual alliance between Tokyo and Moscow in 1916. The enactment in 1924 of the American immigration law with Japanese exclusion clauses was followed by Japan's recognition of Soviet Russia.

The Anglo-Japanese conversations at Tokyo were suspended soon after the United States notified Japan that it was terminating the treaty, largely because—so the Japanese believed—Downing Street was momentarily heartened. But the suspension was short lived, for following the outbreak of the European war in September 1939, England has felt more keenly than ever the need for better relations with Japan. But before Britain can establish such relations she must meet Japan half way in the spirit of the Craigie-Arita memorandum of July 24, even if this runs counter to American wishes In July Britain had already consented to hand over to the native police the four Chinese terrorists and had also agreed to certain measures of cooperation between the British concession police and the Japanese authorities at Tientsin. What remains for further discussion is the Japanese demand that the silver worth about £8,000,000 held by a nationalist bank in the concession be turned over to the Japanese sponsored new Chinese Government at Peiping and that the fapi. or legal currency of the Chiang Kai-shek regime, be prohibited within the said concession.

At this writing both the silver and fapi questions seem about to be settled. And when these matters are out of the way the blockade of the British and French concessions will be lifted, even though the Japanese forces on the spot may prove recalcitrant.

On March 28, 1940, only 2 days before the inauguration of Wang Ching-wei's secessionist government at Nanking, Ambassador Craigie surprised the Japanese—and the Americans—by making a very significant speech, plainly bidding for Japan's friendship. Said Sir Robert:

"Bearing in mind the declared intentions of the Japanese Government and the measure of success already achieved, I have a definite feeling of confidence in the future of Anglo-Japanese relations. * * * Japan and Great Britain are two maritime powers on the fringe of great continents, and they are vitally concerned with the covenants in those continents. * * * Methods may differ but both are ultimately striving for the same objective—a lasting peace and the preservation of our institutions from extraneous and subversive influences. It is surely not beyond the powers of constructive statesmanship to bring the aims of their national policies into full harmony."

Again there was a stir in Washington. What a difference, in tone and implication, between Sir Robert's address and Ambassador Grew's famous "straight from the horse's mouth" speech delivered in Tokyo the previous October. But London took pains to explain that the Craigie speech had no political significance. Lord Halifax, in the House of Lords, and Mr. Butler, in the House of Commons, stated that there was no question of any change in British policy in China, though they added that this attitude was not incompatible with a wish to see an improvement in Anglo-Japanese relations. Nevertheless, neither Sir Robert nor his government could have failed to foresee that the Japanese were bound to read political significance into such a speech. Three days after it had been delivered Secretary Hull issued a statement denouncing, in language more vigorous than he had used in any of his previous statements on China, the inauguration of the Wang Ching-wei regime. Meanwhile, Downing Street was eloquently silent on the advent of the new Nanking Government. Here was a clear indication of the relative position of London and Washington vis-à-vis the Sino-Japanese situation.

Today, while the United States is buzzing with talk of an embargo against Japan, the British are thinking of extending their trade with her. The Anglo-Iranian Oil Co., whose stock is mostly owned by the British Government, has agreed to sell Japan a million barrels of crude oil—an agreement likely to be expanded. The British Foreign Office may be cautious in taking advantage of the American abrogation of the commercial treaty with Japan; but the Treasury and the Ministry of Economic Warfare are understood to be in favor of developing trade opportunities in and with Japan and China. It is considered quite possible that Britain will increase her purchases of Japanese foodstuffs and also reduce tariffs on Japanese textiles imported into India, thus giving Japan the necessary exchange to purchase cotton, oil, machinery, and other goods from the British Empire.

Many Americans may regard Britain's concessions to Japan as shocking, as a betrayal of her promise to cooperate with the United States. They have been wont to believe that British and American interests in China were identical. It has seldom occurred to them that this community of interests is subject to severe restrictions. Great as is Britain's stake in China, it sinks to relative insignificance when compared with her infinitely greater stakes in other parts of the world, above all, in Europe. The position of the United States is quite different. Free from European entanglements and blessed with an advantageous geographical position, it can concentrate its attention upon the Far East.

Yet the United States has no stake in east Asia other than the Philippines and the open door in China. Neither of these interests is vital to the United States; but because it has no other interests in the Far East, it can, if it wishes, devote an undivided attention to them. Particularly in regard to China, it can take vigorous measures against Japan as a sort of hobby, confident that no matter what the Japanese do in retaliation, none of its vital interests will be hurt. On the other hand, England's interests in China are of such magnitude that she cannot apply pressure upon Japan without exposing them to grave danger.

Both the Japanese and the Wang Ching-wei Governments have repeatedly promised to respect the legitimate rights and interests of third powers in China. Much significance attaches to the qualifying word "legitimate." Is extraterritoriality legitimate? Are foreign settlements and concessions legitimate? Even if the Wang Ching-wei regime considers them illegitimate, it will take no precipitate action to abolish them, but will allow time for readjustment. Are not the powers themselves, including the United States, committed to the termination of these imperia in imperio within a reasonable time? As for Britain, she evidently believes that her purely or essentially economic interests can best be served by friendliness toward Japan Take, for instance, the British attitude toward the Yangtze River trade. There were 35 British ships, totaling 68,000 tons, engaged in that trade, as compared to 8,400 tons of American, and 35,000 tons of Japanese shipping. Yet England has never protested to Japan against the temporary closing of the Yangtze as a military measure so vigorously as has the United States. Washington received from Japan prompt apologies and a check for $2,214,007 for the sinking of the gunboat Panay and for the damage done to 3 Standard Oil ships by Japanese bombers along the Yangtze on December 12, 1937; London is still waiting for a settlement due for the sinking of the gunboat Lady-bird on the same occasion.

On Japan's part there is now a perceptible tendency to appreciate the British attitude, particularly as she feels that her traditional policy of preserving American friendship has proved futile. For economic and other reasons Japan's natural preference is for American rather than for British good will. Since the beginning of the hostilities in China she has endeavored to respect, as far as practicable under the exigencies of military operations, American property and American rights, while she has shown no such solicitude for British interests. Now she feels herself forced to reorient her course. If her relations with England improve, the latter's vested rights in China will be treated with more respect. For one thing, vast British railway loans to China which have been in default for many years will be resuscitated if the railways, with the assistance of Japanese technicians and experts, emerge from chaos. England no doubt finds encouragement in this respect in what the Japanese have done for the British-financed Mukden-Skanhaikwan Railway in Manchuria. For many years prior to the creation of Manchukuo under Japanese guidance, the income of this railway had been misappropriated by the local warlords, leaving nothing for interest or sinking fund. Promptly upon the appearance of Manchukuo in 1932, the new Government, acting upon Japanese advice, paid all back interest and has since been punctually paying the sums necessary to service the British loan.

Japan, though discouraged by the United States' adamantine attitude toward her, still sees a ray of hope in the statement made by Secretary Hull on March 30 of this year. This statement, while it condemns the inauguration of the Wang Ching-wei regime, contains a significant sentence: "This Government again makes full reservation of this country's rights under international law and existing treaties and agreements." This idea is the leitmotif running through all of Mr. Hull's pronouncements on the Sino-Japanese situation. It is not a new idea; it simply follows America's traditional policy of the open door in China enunciated by John Hay 40 years ago. That policy looks upon China's open door and territorial integrity as a means to an end—and that end is the preservation and promotion of American commercial interests. Secretary Hay himself raised no objection to spheres of influence already established as long as they did not prejudice the equal commercial opportunity of other nations. Japan believes that if American policy can be made to conform to this tradition there is still hope, given reasonable time, for a rapprochement with Washington.

Transfer of Military Equipment to the Allies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 11, 1940

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, many inquiries have been made to Members of Congress soliciting information as to the amount of military equipment sent the Allies since the outbreak of the present European war.

On August 22, 1940, I requested by letter from Gen. George C. Marshall, Chief of Staff, United States Army, the amount and type of critical military equipment turned over to the Allies and Great Britain since the beginning of the war September 5, 1939. I received the following reply dated August 30, 1940:

The War Department had withheld the information requested in your letter of August 22, 1940, because its release is believed to be contrary to the public interest. The arms made available for transfer to the Allies were not classified as critical. They consisted in general of nonstandard or obsolete types of equipment. For example, the rifles were the substitute World War type, inferior both to the Springfield and Garand and surplus to our probable requirements for training and mobilization. The machine guns were principally caliber .30 Lewis and Maxim guns, nonstandard types procured during the World War and surplus because our supply of standard caliber .30 Browning machine guns is adequate to meet our needs.

The attention of the membership of the House is directed to the above letter in which General Marshall analyzes the type of equipment but refrains from showing the amount of such equipment "because its release is believed to be contrary to public interest."

Realizing that Members of Congress as Representatives of the American people are entitled to know the amount of equipment sent the Allies, the following information was developed from authoritative sources:

Materials sent to Allies since September 5, 1939: Planes—1,700 planes including trainers remain for use of United States Army after shipment of above number—2,200 (from Army, Navy, and Marine Corps); .30 caliber rifles (Lee-Enfields), 500,000; .30 caliber ammunition (Lee-Enfields), 150,000,000 rounds; .30 caliber machine guns, 70,0000; 75 millimeter field artillery guns, 600.

England until a few days ago had 7,000 first-line planes while Germany has between 16,000 and 17,000 first-line planes.

The above information indicates that the United States has been aiding the Allies in a practical way and refutes the assertion often heard that America is merely extending sympathy to our British neighbors.

Our Pacific Frontier

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL HINSHAW

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 11, 1940

ARTICLE BY JOHN GUNTHER

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, under authority granted to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I submit an article entitled "Our Pacific Frontier" by Mr. John Gunther, which appeared in the July issue of Foreign Affairs, an American quarterly review, volume 18, No. 4, pages 583–600. Mr. Gunther is a noted former correspondent in Europe of the Chicago Daily News, and is the author of two recently published books Inside Europe, and Inside Asia.

This article by Mr. Gunther presents a summary of statistical and tactical information which should be of considerable interest to the readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and particularly so during these troubled times.

The article by Mr. John Gunther follows:

[From Foreign Affairs for July 1940]

OUR PACIFIC FRONTIER

(By John Gunther)

Where is the American frontier in the Pacific Ocean? What are our vital interests in this vast region? How adequately are we prepared to defend them? What is our present policy in regard to them? These questions are of peculiar urgency at a moment when warfare is lacerating both Europe and Asia. In a way, these two wars are the same war, and it is our great good fortune that this continent stands apart, guarded by two oceans. But modern warfare can expand unpredictably, and there are times when fire jumps over water.

As these lines go to press the full weight of the Nazis' furious "total war" has been unleashed against France and Britain in the west. For the moment we cannot foresee the outcome. Yet, obviously, the measure of German success already achieved makes it doubly imperative that we in America survey our national-defense problem with stern, relentless realism. More than ever before it has become necessary for us clearly to determine just what our interests and commitments are; in other words, to see where our frontiers really lie. In this article we shall take only the Pacific area for our immediate province, though, of course, Pacific problems are necessarily interlocked with others farther afield.

The Pacific is the greatest of the world's five oceans. It measures almost 10,000 miles from east to west at its broadest point and about 7,000 from north to south. It has an area of, roughly, 68,000,000 square miles, or nearly one-half of the total water surface of the globe. Along its northern rim the Soviet Union and the United States are less than 60 miles apart. It is flanked by 3 British dominions, Canada, Australia, and New Zealand; by 11 American republics in addition to the United States; by the 4,072 volcanic islands that form the Japanese archipelago; and by China, the Philippine Islands, and the Dutch East Indies. It is a tremendous repository of wealth and commerce, the crossroads of a dozen trade routes, the scene of multitudinous adventures in national policy, and a possible nexus of future conflict.

Before we proceed, let us define very briefly what we mean by "policy." In the abstract, one might say, policy is merely the defense and furtherance of "national interests." But this term "national interests" must also be broken down. It can include anything from a missionary stranded in a Chinese village to a corporation worth a hundred million dollars. It comprises sympathies, aspirations, atavisms, phobias, as well as concrete items like geography, military establishments, and cold dollars and cents. American foreign policy, especially in regard to the Far East, has traditionally been based on two general concepts. First, we sympathize with the right of nations to preserve their independence. Second, we maintain and support the right of our citizens and our commerce to equal treatment everywhere.

More specifically, our attitude toward far eastern and Pacific problems is dominated by three explicit policies, each of which is so familiar that we need merely mention them: (1) The open-door policy enunciated by John Hay in 1899. In its simplest definition this means equality of opportunity for citizens of all nations to trade at will in China. (2) The Washington Treaties of 1921–22. Under the terms of the Naval Treaty the principal maritime Powers of that time agreed to maintain certain naval ratios. The United States also promised in the Four Power Pact not to alter the status quo in regard to fortifications and military bases in the western Pacific, while in the Nine Power Pact signed at the same time Japan undertook to respect the territorial integrity of China. Though this treaty has, as everyone knows, been flagrantly violated by Japan, we still adhere to it. (3) The Stimson doctrine of nonrecognition. This policy, enunciated following the Japanese occupation of Manchuria in 1931, states that we refuse to recognize "any situation, treaty, or agreement which may be brought about by means contrary" to the Kellogg-Briand Pact.

To support its policy, to protect its frontiers, a nation has to maintain diplomatic, military, and naval establishments. Every country, we might say, has four or five different frontiers. First, at home, its actual geographical frontier. Then, either coterminous with this or beyond it, depending on the size and power of the nation, comes the military frontier, the specific line which it is prepared to defend with its military and naval forces. Third, there comes what might be called the economic frontier. For instance, our economic frontier certainly includes coffee in Brazil and tin in Bolivia. Fourth, a diplomatic frontier, which presumably protects our interests and explores any possible danger to them in areas considerably beyond the geographical frontier. Fifth comes the moral frontier, as is suggested by such a phrase as the "white man's burden," or for that matter the "open door." Viewed from this angle, the whole world is everybody's frontier.

Generally speaking, the diplomatic frontier of a country roughly represents its policy at a given moment, while the military frontier represents its power to defend that policy. The purpose of this article is to discuss these two frontiers in regard to American interests in the Pacific. What are these interests, and how well are we prepared to defend them? Where is our diplomatic frontier? Where is our military frontier? Obviously, they do not correspond. Should, then, our diplomatic frontier be pulled back? Or should our military frontier be pushed forward? Or is it unnecessary that the two frontiers coincide?

II

First, let us outline our interests in the Pacific area. These we may classify into several fields.

1. Territorial. We own various Pacific islands, like the Hawaiian group, Guam, Midway, Wake, and part of the Samoan group. (The Commonwealth of the Philippines is not included in this list because our control over it is to end in 1946, according to the Tydings-McDuffie Act.) Recently we embarked on a system of joint control with Great Britain over Canton and Enderbury Islands, in the Phoenix group below Hawaii.

2. Nationals: About 7,000 American citizens live in China, some 8,000 in Japan. There are also many Americans in the Philippines, and smaller numbers in the Netherlands Indies (625), and the Straits Settlements (525). Of our nationals in the Orient, those in China cause our State Department the most worry. Presumably, it is the duty of every civilized nation to give protection to its nationals. If we permit traders and missionaries to go abroad, we cannot avoid a certain responsibility for their welfare. Yet in recent years we have become much less assiduous in bearing this responsibility and our neutrality legislation seeks to reduce the number of Americans who live or travel in agitated countries.

3. Investments: Figures are difficult to procure, and they differ widely. A reasonable estimate would put our investments in China at about $250,000,000, those in Japan at perhaps $350,000,000. But as Japan pushes forward in China, our opportunities for investment in the Orient will become increasingly limited. However, the approximately $750,000,000 which we have invested throughout the Far East represents only about 6 percent of our total foreign investments.

4. Trade: In 1938 American exports to China amounted to about $35,000,000, our imports to $47,000,000. Our exports to Japan were very much greater, almost $240,000,000, and our imports—mostly silk and cotton goods—were $126,820,000. Much of our export trade to Japan consists of potential war material like machinery, scrap iron, and petroleum. That we thus help to make Japan's war against China possible is a glaring anomaly in view of our traditional friendship for the Chinese people. Our trade with the Philippines is considerable, amounting to $86,000,000 in exports and $94,000,000 in imports.

5. The air factor: Civil aviation not only follows established trade routes but opens up new ones. It unlocks the door to future trade. Pan-American's air route across the Pacific is important both for its commercial and its prestige value. It also constitutes a distinct American military interest, since pilots obtain training over Pacific waters as well as valuable information on weather conditions and the like. The bases built by Pan-American along the Honolulu-Midway-Wake-Guam-Manila run are of potential military importance.

6. Beyond these categories is another which can best be termed cultural. In China, particularly, we have important interests represented by such educational institutions as Yale in China, Peking Union Medical College, and the multifarious smaller schools, missions, hospitals, and so on, which have done so much to give America a good name in the Orient. The United States could not withdraw its political influence from the Far East without sacrificing this important and valuable, even if intangible, interest.

7. Finally, politics. The world is interlocked, and events in Finland or in the Low Countries have repercussions in Singapore, Java, or Honolulu. All over the world, and particularly in the Far East, the United States carries a political burden based on its power and prestige. By protecting that prestige in the Far East and in Pacific waters, we contribute to political stability throughout the world. If the United States should, for instance, surrender its far eastern position, it would cardinally weaken Great Britain vis-à-vis both Japan and Russia. Our status and our policy in regard to Japan and China will, moreover, inevitably be decisive factors in our future relationship to Europe, and in particular to Germany if she is victorious.

III

All this, then, is what we have to protect. In what position are we to protect it?

To answer this question one must first discuss the putative enemy. In the present state of world politics, as far as the Far Eastern and Pacific areas are concerned, this can only be Japan. Should Germany win the European war, the situation might radically change. Then indeed we would have to alter all our defense conceptions. We might find Japan confronting us in one ocean, while a greatly expanded and strengthened Germany confronted us in the other. But at the moment the only possible antagonist we have to fear in the Pacific is Japan. This is not to say that Japan intends at some future date to make war on the United States. Most sane critics regard the possibility of any such adventure as still remote. Nevertheless, every country, when planning its national defense and its ultimate political aims, must take account of whatever potential enemy is in the field. Under present circumstances Japan is the only nation that can possibly threaten our Pacific interests, the only power—with or without allies—with whom a Pacific war is conceivable. Therefore American military and naval policy in the Pacific is predicated on the assumption that Japan is the principal "enemy" to be faced.

Should, in fact, war unhappily occur between Japan and the United States, the Japanese would presumably strike first at our exposed outposts in China. Our forces there are isolated from any possibility of substantial defense. We have 1,100 marines in Shanghai, which since 1927 have cooperated with the troops of other nations to defend the International Settlement. In northern China we have another 500 marines, divided between Peiping and Tientsin. We have 4 gunboats in the Yangtze area and 1 near Canton. The Asiatic fleet, based on either Shanghai or Manila, depending on the season, consists of only one 10,000-ton cruiser, one old 7,000-ton cruiser, a dozen over-age destroyers, 12 submarines, and a few small auxiliary ships. We do not station any capital ships or aircraft carriers in the Far East. In the past we have not even based our fleet on Hawaii, its natural pivot, because we did not wish to annoy Japan. If it is now stationed at Pearl Harbor, the obvious reason is that we are using its presence there to help persuade Tokyo not to attack the Netherland East Indies. In any event, our fleet stays well this side of the one hundred and eightieth meridian, which bisects the Pacific.

The Philippines might very well be the first object of a Japanese attack if war should come. The question of our capacity to defend these islands has been hotly debated by many experts. The majority opinion is that they could not be held against a sustained or large-scale Japanese assault. Gen. Douglas MacArthur, head of the Philippine military establishment, holds naturally enough a contrary view; he makes an elaborate case with particular emphasis on the growing strength of the Philippine Army, which is training 40,000 recruits a year. But most observers in the United States sharply disagree with General MacArthur. Few of our generals and admirals think we could hold the Philippines; most of them do not think we should even make the attempt.

Their arguments are as follows. First, the Philippines are in effect located in Japanese home waters, whereas our nearest base for serious operations, Pearl Harbor, is about 5,000 miles away. Second, our present armed force in the islands is exceedingly small. On land we have perhaps 4,500 regular troops, including Philippine scouts, and on the sea only the minuscule Asiatic fleet. Third, our coastal defenses are inadequate, although Corregidor in Manila Bay is heavily fortified, and some experts hold that Manila itself could hold out 30 days. But it would be extremely difficult to prevent Japanese landings at several points.[1] Fourth, the Philippines have no munitions industry sufficient to maintain warfare for any length of time. Fifth, the Philippines—as at present defended—provide no satisfactory base for major operations by the United States Fleet. Cavite, near Manila, has scarcely been improved since the Spanish-American War and has no repair facilities for big ships. There is a good natural harbor at Olongapo, in Subic Bay, some 60 miles north of Manila, but it is not adequately fortified. We keep there a floating drydock, the Dewey, because Cavite is too shallow to hold it. Although the Dewey has been in Philippine waters for 30 years, it is still in operating condition. But it will not dock ships exceeding 10,000 tons; in other words, it could handle a damaged cruiser, but not a big aircraft carrier or battleship—vessels of this size would have to go back to Pearl Harbor or borrow Singapore.

To make the Philippines impregnable would probably cost at least $1,000,000,000, a sum that no American Congress in present circumstances would dream of appropriating for such a purpose. Our best experts say that, in order to make the islands even reasonably possible of defense, we should have to maintain there a garrison of 100,000 men, amply protected by at least 500 aircraft, and with a substantial naval force. In the event of war, it is estimated that we should need 3,000,000 tons of merchant shipping—roughly one-quarter of our entire merchant fleet—to keep the islands in steady and effective communication with the American mainland. We should also need a much more powerful navy, since doubtless we would be risking important ships close to Japan.

Under the terms of the Tydings-McDuffie Act, which will presumably liberate the Philippines in 1946, we are bound to give up the Cavite and Olongapo bases. The question of American naval bases (Cavite and Olongapo are technically defined as military bases) in the islands after we withdraw is left open by the act. One school of American naval opinion feels very strongly that we should reserve the right to build future bases at three or four strategic points after we leave the islands. These points, it is suggested, should be held in perpetuity as "restricted but undefended areas," somewhat on the model of Guantanamo in Cuba, which we hold but do not fortify. Such suggested points, outside of Manila Bay, are Dumanquilas Bay in Mindanao, Coron Bay, Malampaya Sound, the Tawi-Tawi area, and Polillo on the east coast of Luzon. The Japanese are, on their side, very quick to see the potential importance of bases of this sort. For instance, they have occupied an atoll called Pratas Reef, just north of Luzon, where they are reported to have established a radio station.

So much for our comparatively weak position in China and the Philippines. It is quite clear that in case of war with Japan our main reliance would have to be on our line of defense in the mid-Pacific. That line of defense is, and must always be, the United States Navy

IV

As of January 1, 1940, the comparative naval strengths of the United States and Japan—insofar as we know what Japan has been building—were the following:

	United States		Japan
	Number	Tonnage	Number	Tonnage
Battleships	15	464,300	9	272,070
Aircraft carriers	5	120,100	6	88,470
Heavy cruisers	18	175,200	12	107,800
Light cruisers	19	157,775	15	97,555
Destroyers	182	236,070	84	113,476
Submarines	63	71,175	35	52,432

[1] The Japanese, incidentally, have a remarkable facility for landing operations. In August 1937 they got 75,000 troops to Shanghai in 10 days, a feat most military experts thought would have been impossible.

It should be understood that of these ships, one of our battleships, 2 light cruisers, 115 destroyers, and 32 submarines are technically listed as "over-age," i. e., nearing obsolescence. Of the Japanese total, 1 battleship, 5 heavy cruisers, 8 light cruisers, 36 destroyers, and 19 submarines are over-age.

American ships under construction on January 1, 1940, include 8 new battleships (300,000 tons estimated), 2 aircraft carriers (34,700 tons), 6 light cruisers (44,000 tons), 1 large mine layer, 31 destroyers (49,980 tons), and 15 submarines (20,820 tons). The building program of the Japanese is unknown in its complete details; they make a fetish of naval secrecy. But, as far as we can tell, it consists—including ships building and appropriated for—of 4 battleships, 2 aircraft carriers, 5 light cruisers, 9 destroyers, and 3 submarines. The new Japanese battleships will apparently average around 40,000 tons. In fact, our naval experts are convinced not only that the new Japanese ships are of this unprecedented size, but that Japan may have 4 or even 8 of them under way.[2] The United States has replied to this challenge in kind. Of our new ships, six will displace 35,000 tons, two 45,000 tons. These are bigger than anything we now have afloat. They will also be faster and more powerful. Moreover, as quoted by the New York Times, Admiral Stark stated that the two additional battleships provided for in the 1941 appropriations may be "somewhat larger," possibly reaching 52,000 or even 55,000 tons. There is, however, a limit to the size American ships can reach, a limit imposed by the 110-foot width of the present locks in the Panama Canal.

Late in April 1940 the Senate passed a $963,797,478 Navy bill, the largest in our history except for the war years 1918 and 1919. The bill, which provided for an 11-percent increase in the Navy, was approved by the Senate by a vote of 63 to 4 after only 4 days of debate. Eleven percent is a considerable augmentation, but the Navy does not consider it enough. Admiral Stark thinks that we need a flat 25-percent increase not merely to achieve security, but actually in order to reestablish the old 5–5–3 ratio which collapsed when the Japanese began their heavy secret building in 1936. As these lines are written, President Roosevelt, under the shattering impact of Hitler's "blitzkrieg," has asked Congress to vote an additional billion and a half dollars for the Navy.

If war should come between Japan and the United States, the giant navies of the two countries would be somewhat like two heavyweights sparring but unable to come to grips. It is almost inconceivable that the Japanese would risk a fleet action in American waters or that we would send our fleet to attack Japanese home stations. Presumably the Japanese plan of campaign would be to seize the Philippines and perhaps the Netherland Indies, and to harass American merchant shipping in the Pacific. If this effort were successful, we would probably lose most of our imports from the Indies area. Our most serious losses would be rubber, tin, quinine, and coconut shell, which provides the best charcoal for gas masks. Rubber we could manufacture synthetically, but only at an uneconomic cost. The production of raw rubber in South America might be increased; however, at present that continent supplies only about 2 percent of the world's output. Tin we could obtain from Bolivia, though here again there would have to be a drastic speeding up of production, since the present output of that country is less than half the American demand. Meantime the Japanese could pinprick our advanced forces from bases in their mandated islands. Conceivably, they might attack the Panama Canal with aircraft based on carriers, though that possibility is remote; they might even, by going around Cape Horn, establish commerce raiders in the Atlantic. Beyond this, it is difficult to see what Japan could do, unless she were to have the active support of "fifth column" elements in one of the small republics near the Canal. Any frontal attack by her on Hawaii or our Pacific coast is considered by most military experts to be literally impossible. Nor could an assault on Alaska promise greater success.

The American forces, on their side, would in the first instance attempt to frustrate these Japanese designs. We have submarines capable of cruising from American bases to Japanese waters and back, and presumably we would attempt to cut the absolutely vital Japanese imports of oil from the Netherland Indies. American warships based on the Philippines could attack and destroy Japanese commerce in this and other areas, and by so doing enforce a virtual blockade against Japan. The Japanese could, it is true, import enough foodstuffs from China and Manchuria to keep from starving; an effective blockade, however, would in time very seriously cripple—if it did not completely crush—Japanese economy. We could meantime proceed cautiously to the laborious and dangerous task of mopping up the Japanese mandated islands and thus expand the area safe for American naval operations. Until these islands had been made innocuous, we would find it extremely difficult to send our capital ships much beyond the one hundred and eightieth meridian. Our activity beyond Hawaii would, at least in the opening stages of the war, consist mostly of commerce raiding.

The Japanese mandated islands, formerly belonging to Germany, cover a vast area in the southwestern Pacific. They consist of 4 main groups, the Palaus, the Marianas, the Carolines, and the Marshalls, and there are 1,400 of them. But the total land area of all is only 829 square miles. Most of them are quite insignificant coral atolls; only a few have any military importance. One group, that centering on Truk, has a good harbor and is believed to be fortified; another potential or actual base is at Saipan, north of Guam. In 1939 the Japanese opened a commercial air service from Yokohama to Saipan and on to the Palaus. For years Japan has stringently forbidden foreigners to visit these islands, or to traverse the area; consequently very little is known about them, especially whether or not they are being fortified. To attack these islands, which even unfortified afford excellent hide-and-seek facilities for submarines, would obviously be no easy matter.[3]

In essence, then, two probabilities seem implicit in a war between the United States and Japan. First, we would have, in time, a chance of blockading Japan to her knees. Second, Japan would have very little chance of blockading us or causing us deep injury. If, however, the Japanese took the Philippines and then, as it were, called off the war by simply suspending further hostilities, a long deadlock might ensue. If we were to break it by trying to reconquer the Philippines, we would find ourselves launched on a long and arduous campaign.
